This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

This edition of LEMPRIERE'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARY, after having undergone such enlargements and improvements as may render it less unworthy of his name, is respectfully inscribed, by his very often and very much

THE EDITOR.

PREFACE

TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

The peculiar circumstances under which the present edition of Lempriere's Classical Dictionary is offered to the public, and the changes which have been introduced into the plan of the work, and still more in its execution, appear to demand from the editors an exposition of the views by which they have been governed, and a justification of the various alterations which they have ventured to make. They feel, however, that no apology can be required for the liberties which they have taken with the text of Lempriere. The design of his work, the most comprehensive of all the publications of the class that have appeared, either in this country or in England, and which has secured to it an unequalled popularity, can hardly atone for the many glaring and pernicious inaccuracies which deface the detail; inaccuracies misleading the mind, and sometimes mixed with grosser failings, to pervert the moral sense and feeling of the youthful inquirer who may have recourse to its pages. It was first in this city that the attention of the public was called to these defects, and that some attempt was made to correct them; and the last American Edition may be considered, by the approbation with which it was received, to have ascertained and collected the public voice in favour of further amendments. More recently, the Quarterly Journal of Education undertook the task of reviewing the original book; and that paper, published under the authority of names beyond all competition in letters, among which are those of Lord Brougham, Lord John Russel, Sir T. Denman, Hallam, Hobhouse, Maltby, Mill, and Pattison, appears to have set on it the final seal of absolute reprobation. Impressed with a full conviction of the utter worthlessness of an authority so universally sought after, and so incessantly consulted, the editors of the present edition had long contemplated the publication of a volume which should resemble Lempriere's in nothing but in the outline of its plan; in embracing, namely, a general account of antiquity. With this view, they proceeded to separate the Mythological from the Geographical and Historical parts, and these from each other; intending, for the sake of distinctness, to treat them separately, that the certain and actual narrations and descriptions which belong to the historian and geographer might not be blended with the fictitious or allegorical representations of the poet or mythologian. To this they were the rather induced, from observation of the inevitable and irremediable confusion produced in the mind of the youthful readers of Lempriere, as a consequence of the indiscriminate blending of these separate objects of study. Even the mind accustomed to analysis may be sometimes bewildered, and forget the truth in its heterogeneous mixture with fable. Having accomplished this separation, they had intended to re-write every article, and to introduce such new ones as might appear requisite to make the work what it purports to be, a complete Bibliotheca Classica. Before, however, they could even prepare for the commencement of this task, by procuring from Europe the proper authorities, the call of their publisher required them to begin; and the demand of the market, they were informed, was of so urgent a character, that unless the work could appear within a limited time, it was considered as of no avail to prepare it. This call the editors were not at liberty to disregard, from the nature of their contract, and from the engagements which had arisen out of it between their publishers and other parties not originally concerned. The seventh edition is presented, therefore, with great diffidence to the public as the result of three months' labour, bestowed on it by the editors in the evenings of days devoted to professional avocations. Under circumstances such as these, it was impossible that the whole work should be re-written, or even submitted to a perfect revision; and as the Geographical department has always been held the most important, at the same time that it was the most incorrect in the original work, it will be observed that that department has claimed the principal care of the editors. The addition of many new articles, in all, it is believed, amounting to several hundred, was the smallest part of their labour; the greater number of all those which were to be found in former editions, being entirely re-written in this. The geography of Italy and Greece has recently been admirably illustrated by the research and the labours of many learned scholars; but no writer has succeeded in describing more accurately or more eloquently the interesting cities, rivers, and mountains, of those countries, all equally connected with the most pleasing associations of the classical scholar, than the Rev. J. A Cramer, in his Geographical descriptions of Ancient Italy and Greece. The results of this able antiquary's investigations the editors have freely transferred to their pages, having put to the test of a strict comparison with the ancient authorities the passages of which they have thus availed themselves. This may detract in some measure from the originality of their work, but it is confidently presumed that it will greatly add to its value. The editors, however, believe that whatever they may have now first introduced, and with whatever exactness they may have corrected the original articles, they have performed in that a less useful work than in the scrupulous care with which they have removed from their pages the offensive matter with which those of the first author were so profusely stained, and which were not thoroughly eradicated in any subsequent edition.

PART I.

GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, &c.

ABÆ, an ancient city of Phocis, at no great distance from Elatea, and to the right of that city going towards Opus. It was early celebrated for an oracle and temple of Apollo, held in great esteem and veneration. The temple, being richly adorned with treasures and various offerings, was sacked and burned by the Persians. Having been restored, it was again consumed in the Sacred War by the Bœotians. But Pausanias asserts that it was but half destroyed at first, and, like many other Grecian temples, was suffered to remain in that condition as a monument of Persian hostility. It was treated with great favour by the Romans, who conceded to it peculiar privileges, out of veneration to the deity there worshipped. The ruins of the place are pointed out by Sir W. Gell, in his Itinerary, near the village of Exarcho. Cramer, Anc. Greece.—Strabo, 445.—Soph. Œd. Tyr. 897.—Herod. 1, 46; 8, 134; 8, 33.—Diod. Sic. 16, 530.—Pausan. 10, 3 and 35.

ABĀLUS, an island supposed to have been situated in the German ocean, on whose shores, according to some of the ancients, the spring-tides deposited amber. The same island is called Baltia by Timæus. Plin. 37, 2.

ABANTIA. Vid. Abantes, Part II.

ABARĪMON, a country of Scythia, near mount Imaus. Plin. 7, c. 2.

ABAS and ABUS, I. a mountain of the greater Armenia, probably Ararat, a part of the Ala-Dag. That part of the Euphrates, sometimes called the Arsanias, and into which the smaller river of that name empties, has its source in this mountain. Plin. 5, 24.—D'Anville.—Malte-Brun.——II. A river of Armenia Major, where Pompey routed the Albani. Vid. Parts II. and III.

ABASA, an island in the Red Sea, near Æthiopia. Paus. 6, c. 26.

ABASSĒNA. Vid. Abyssinia.

ABĪTOS, an island in the lake near Memphis in Egypt, abounding with flax and papyrus. Osiris was buried there. Lucan. 10, v. 323.

ABDĒRA, I. a town of Hispania Bætica, built by the Carthaginians. Strab. 3.——II. A maritime city of Thrace, to the east of the Nestus, founded originally by Timesius of Clazomenæ, and subsequently recolonized by a large body of Teians from Ionia. Abdera was already a large and wealthy town when Xerxes arrived there on his way into Greece; returning whence he presented the town with his golden scymetar and train, as an acknowledgement of the reception he had met with there. Abdera was the limit of the Odrysian empire to the west. It continued to increase in prosperity and importance until it became engaged in hostilities with the Triballi, who had gained an ascendancy over the Odrysæ and the other nations of Thrace. According to Diodorus, Abdera at length fell into the hands of Eumenes king of Pergamus, through the treachery of Pytho, one of its commanders. In Pliny's time it was considered a free city; and the circumstance of having given birth to the philosophers Democritus and Protagoras added to its celebrity. In the middle ages it degenerated into a small town, to which the name of Polystylus was attached, according to the Byzantine historian Curopalate. Its ruins are said to exist near the Cape Baloustra. Cramer, Anc. Greece.—Strab. 7, 120; 8, 120; 2, 97.—Diod. Sic. 15, 476.—Excerpt. 3.—Plin. 4, 11.—Pomp. Mel. 2, 2.—Cic. ad Attic 4. 16.

ABELLA, now Avella, a town of Campania, whose inhabitants were called Abellani. Its nuts, called avellanæ, and also its apples, were famous. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 740.—Sil. 8, v. 544.

ABIA, a maritime town of Messenia, supposed to be the ancient Ira mentioned by Homer. Pausan. 4, 30.—Il. 1, 150.

ABĪLA, or ABYLA, a mountain of Africa, in that part which is nearest to the opposite mountain called Calpe, on the coast of Spain, only eighteen miles distant. These two mountains are called the columns of Hercules, and were said formerly to be united, till the hero separated them and made a communication between the Mediterranean and Atlantic seas. Strab. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 5, 1, 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3.

ABNŌBA, a mountain of Germany, now the Black mountain. It is sometimes, though incorrectly, given in the plural, as mountains of Germany. The Danube has its source in this spur of the Lepontine Alps, which forms the southern extremity of the Hercynian range. Bossi Cost. de Germ.—Tacit. Germ. 1.—Avien.

ABOBRĪCA, I. a town of Lusitania. Plin. 4, c. 20.——II. Another in Spain.

ABONITĪCHOS, now Ainehboli, a town of Paphlagonia towards the northern boundary, and nearly midway between east and west. The later writers among the Greeks called it Ionopolis.

ABOBRAS. Vid. Chaboras.

ABROTŌNUM, a town of Africa, near the Syrtes. Plin. 5, 4.

ABRUS, a city of the Sapæi. Pans. 7, c. 10.

ABSINTHII, a people on the coasts of Pontus. Herodot. 6, c. 34.

ABSŌRUS, the principal of the Absyrtides, with a town of the same name.

ABSYRTĪDES INSULÆ, otherwise the Brigeides, four islands on the coast of Histria. Their modern names are Cherso, Oscro, Ferosina and Chao. Vid. Absyrtus, Part III.

Abus, a river of Britain, now the Humber, dividing the Brigantes of the modern Yorkshire, from the Coritani of Lincolnshire. Cambd. Brit.—Heyl. Cosm.

Abydos, I. a town of Asia, on the borders of the Hellespont in the lesser Mysia, not far from the mouth of the Simois, built, as pretended, by the Milesians under the auspices of Gyges king of Lydia. The strait by which the Asiatic coast is here divided from Europe is so narrow, that Abydos appeared from a distance as one town with Sestos, which stood upon the other side. The actual width was seven stadia; but D'Anville asserts that these were the shortest of the three measures of that denomination. It was here that Kerxes constructed his celebrated bridge of boats for the transportation of his innumerable hosts. Poetry and history combined to render this place interesting to the ancients, and both in modern times concur to render it as interesting to us. Recent experiments, moreover, have added probability to the story of Leander's gallantry; for the passage of the Hellespont by an expert swimmer has been proved to be easily practicable. Abydos being attacked by the Macedonian king Philip, the inhabitants devoted themselves to death rather than fall into the hands of their enemy. For three days this slaughter continued; the king of Macedon forbidding his soldiers to leave the town, lest the citizens should then desist from their voluntary self-immolation. Abydos again became famous for its firm and vigorous resistance when besieged by the Turks under Orchan, the son of Othman. The treason of the governor's daughter, who had become enamoured of a young Turk among the besiegers, is said alone to have occasioned the fall of the place. Since that time the town has remained in possession of the Turks, who under Mahomet II. erected the two castles of the Dardanelles for the defence of Constantinople by sea. These forts do not exactly occupy, as many have believed, the sites of the ancient Abydos and Sestos; the only remains of the former being now the ruins at a spot called Nagara. Mela.—Just. 2, 13.—Plin.—Herod. 7, 36.—Polyb. 16, 29, 35. —Liv. 31, 17.——II. A town of Egypt, about seven miles from the borders of the Nile towards Libya. Its modern name, Madfuné, is expressive of its dilapidation, and of the ruins which alone remain of its original splendour. It was famous as the residence of Memnon, and for a temple of Osiris. D'Anville considers it the Oasis Magna, and says, that in the time of the Lower Empire it was used as a place of banishment. Plin. 5, 9.

Abyla. Vid. Abila.

Abyssinia, a large division of Africa, little known to the ancients. In its least unstable limits it corresponds to the southern part of Ethiopia supra Ægyptum. This situation and extent would make its eastern boundary the Red Sea, with an indefinite limit upon every other side. The name of Ethiopia, given to the country of which Abyssinia is but a portion, was from the Greek, and Abyssinia is the Arabic name, which the inhabitants reject. All history of this country is unsatisfactory; but an organized government of some kind existed among the Abyssinians at least as early as the time of Solomon, as is proved by the scripture account of queen Sheba's visit to that king.

Acacesium, a town of Arcadia. Mercury, surnamed Acacesius, was worshipped there. Paus. 8, c. 3, 36, &c.

Academia, I. a part of the Ceramicus without the city, from which it was distant about six stadia. Its name was derived from the hero Academus.

Ἐν αἰνοῦσι δρόμοισιν Ἀκαδήμου θεοῦ.

Eupol. Frag.

It was originally a deserted and unhealthy spot; but Hipparchus surrounded it with a wall at a considerable expense, and it was afterwards adorned with walks, groves, and fountains, by Cimon. Here Plato possessed a small house and garden; and from the time that he there delivered his instructions, it became in a great measure sacred to philosophy. From traditions connected with the memory of Academus, it is said that this place was spared by the Lacedæmonians in their incursions into Attica. But Sylla, during the siege of Athens, is said to have cut down the groves of this celebrated spot. Without the enclosure was the monument of Plato and the tower of Timon. The name of Akathymia is still attached to this once favourite haunt of philosophers and poets. Vid. Plato. Cram. Gr.—Potter, Arch. Gr.—Plut. Vit. Cim. and Syll.—Paus. 1, 30.—Hawkins, Topogy. of Athens.——II. A villa of Cicero, to which he gave the name of Academia, and where he probably composed his Academicæ. It was situated between the Lucrine lake and Puteoli, and was close to the shore. Cicero more generally terms it his Puteolanum. Cic. ad Att. 1, ep. 3; 14, ep. 7.

Acalandrus, or Acalyndrus, now the Salandella, a river falling into the bay of Tarentum. Plin. 3. c. 11.

Acampsis, the lower part of a river which separates Colchis from Armenia. It rises in the country of the ancient Tzani or Sanni, where it was called Boas. It rushes, says D'Anville, with such impetuosity into the sea, as to forbid all approaches to the shore.

Acanthus, I. a town on the isthmus that lies between the Strymonic and Singitic gulfs; on the former of which it is placed by Herodotus and Mela; on the latter, by Strabo and Ptolemy. Near this place was the canal of Xerxes.——II. A town of Athamania, between the Aracthus and the Inachus. Cram. Gr. ——III. A town of Caria, otherwise called Dulopolis. Mela, 1, 16, 16.—Plin. 5, 28.

Acaria, a fountain of Corinth, where Iolas cut off the head of Eurystheus. Strab. 8.

Acarnania, a country of Greece, having on the north the Ambracian gulf, on the west the Ionian sea, and on the east the Achelous, which separates it from Ætolia. To the north-west it bordered on the districts of the Amphilochi and Agræi, barbarous tribes, whose history is chiefly connected with that of Acarnania, and may therefore be included in the description of that country which now bears the name of, and forms part of the modern Livonia. Travellers, who have visited the interior, represent it as covered with forests and mountains of no great elevation, but wild and deserted, while the valleys are filled with several lakes. The earliest accounts represent this province as inhabited by the Leleges, Curetes, and Teleboæ; and it would seem that the name of Acarnanes was unknown in Homer's time, since it does not occur in his poems. Cram. Gr.—Strab. 10, 325, 335, 450, 561.—Hobhouse, Travels.—Holland, Travels.

Acarnas and Acarnan, a stony mountain of Attica. Senec. in Hippol. v. 20.

Acathantus, a bay in the Red Sea. Strab. 16.

Ace, I. a town in Phœnicia, called also Ptolemais, now Acre. C. Nep. in Datam. c. 5. ——II. A place of Arcadia, near Megalopolis, where Orestes was cured from the persecution of the furies, who had a temple there. Paus. 8, c. 34.

Acerræ, I. a town of Campania, near the source of the Clanius. In the year of the city 442 it received the rights of a Roman city, but was destroyed in the second Punic War by Hannibal. It was rebuilt, however, by its former inhabitants on his evacuation of Campania. It still subsists, and the frequent inundations from the river, which terrified its ancient inhabitants, are now prevented by the large drains dug there. Virg. G. 2, v. 225.—Liv. 8, c. 17.—— II. A town on the Addua, referred to by Plutarch, Strabo, and Polybius. Its modern name is Ghirra.

Aces, a river of Asia. Herodot. 3, c. 117.

Acesa, part of the island of Lemnos, which received this name from Philoctetes, whose wound was cured there. Philostr.

Acesines, now Chenab, a river which rises in the Himalah mountains and empties into the Indus in the large province of Pendj-ab. According to Ptolemy the navigation was extremely dangerous, and an immense number of persons had perished in attempting it. Its width is computed by the same author at fifteen stadia. The difficulties and the dangers of sailing on this river are greatest at its confluence with the Hydaspes; and so great is the roar of the waters and the terror of the scene at that place, that in passing it the rowers of Alexander dropped their oars, and were at first unable to proceed. This river is, however, by Quintus Curtius supposed to unite with the Ganges near its entrance into the Erythrean Sea. Alexander made the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus the limit of the government of Philip. This point is about one hundred miles above the city of Mooltan. The effect of the rains on this river are remarkable; to such a degree that the ordinary width of three hundred yards above Lahore is sometimes swollen to little less than a mile and a half. Mela.—Arrian.—Q. Curtius.—Malte-Brun.

Acesta, a town of Sicily, called after king Acestes, and known also by the name of Segesta. It was built by Æneas, who left here part of his crew as he was going to Italy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 746, &c.

Achæorum portus, on the Messenian Gulf, in or near the site of which stands Coron at the present day.

Achæorum statio, a place on the coast of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polyxena was sacrificed to the shades of Achilles, and where Hecuba killed Polymnestor, who had murdered her son Polydorus.

Achaia, I. a country of Peloponnesus, which within its ancient limits was bounded on the north by the Corinthian Gulf, and on the south by a lofty chain of mountains which separated it from Arcadia. On the east it bordered on Sicyonia. Towards the west it reached the confines of Elis, the small river Larissus being the common boundary. It was anciently called Ægialus from its maritime situation, and its earliest inhabitants are said to have been of the Pelasgic race. These were succeeded by the Ionians, who were in turn dispossessed by the Achæans. The division into twelve districts, which subsequently formed the Achæan league, is generally attributed to its earliest population. Achaia was at first a small and insignificant state, and so thinly peopled, that the inhabitants of its twelve districts were scarcely equal to those of a single city. Upon the capture of Corinth by L. Mummius, and the consequent dissolution of the Achæan league, the whole of Greece was reduced to the condition of a Roman province, and thenceforward the name of Achaia was applied to the Peloponnesus and all the country south of Macedonia. Cram. Gr.—Pausan. 7, 1.—Herod. 7, 94.—Plut. Arat.—Polyb. 2, 89.—Tacit. 1, 76.——II. A small part of Phthiotis was also called Achaia, of which Alos was the capital.

Achæa, a town near Sardis. Strab. 14.

Acharnæ, the most considerable of the Attic demi, on or near the site of the modern Menidi. Vid. Aristoph.

Achelous, I. one of the largest rivers of Greece, and the most celebrated in ancient times. Thucydides describes it as flowing from mount Pindus, through the country of the Dolopians, Agræans and Acarnanians, and discharging itself into the sea near the town of Œniadæ. It was particularly noted for the quantity of alluvial soil which is there deposited; many of the islands, known to the ancients under the name of Echinades, being by that means connected with the main land. As its course also varied greatly, which occasioned inundations in the districts through which it flowed, hence called Paracheloïtis, it was found necessary to check its inroads by means of dykes and dams; which is thought to have given rise to the fable of the contest of Hercules with the river for the hand of Deïanira, so beautifully introduced in the Trachiniæ of Sophocles, ver. 507. The Achelous is said to have been formerly called Thoas and Thestius. Most ancient writers name it as a river of Acarnania; some, however, ascribe it to Ætolia, which is owing to the variation in the limits of these two countries. The modern name is Aspropotamo. Cram. Gr. 2, 20.—Il. 21, 193.—Thuc. 2, 102.—Diod. 4, 168. Vid. Part III.——II. A river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus.——III. Another, flowing from mount Sipylus. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Acheron, I. a river celebrated in antiquity from its supposed communication with the realms of Pluto, which discharges itself into the sea a little below Parga. Homer called it, from the dead appearance of its waters, one of the rivers of hell; and the fable has been adopted by all succeeding poets. It is known in modern geography by the name of the Souli river, and the gloominess of its scenery accords well with the fancied horrors of Tartarus. It rises in Molossia, flows through Thesprotia, and, after passing through the Acherusian lake, falls into the sea near the Chimerian promontory. The word Acheron is often taken for hell itself. Cram. Gr.—Livy, 7, 24.—Thuc. 1, 46.——II. A branch of the Alpheus in Elis. Vid. Part III.

Acherontia, now Acerenza, was situated, as Horace describes it, on an almost inaccessible hill, south of Ferentum. It is called Acherontum by Livy, who mentions it as a strong place of Apulia. Procopius notices it as a fortress of very great strength. Cram. It. 2, 291.—Liv. 9, 30.

Acherūsia palus, I. a marsh through which the Acheron flows, near its mouth. Its site is now only to be discovered by the reeds and aquatic plants which almost choke up the water. The destructive effects of the malaria are perceptible in the sallow and emaciated countenances of the surrounding peasantry. Hence, probably, it was that the ancients, ignorant of the natural causes of disease transferred the miasmata of the plain to the Plutonian lake, and represented it as emitting a deadly effluvia. Hughes' Travels.——II. Another in Italy, between Misenum and Cumæ, to which the modern Lago di Fusaro probably answers.——III. A lake of Egypt, near Memphis, over which, as Diodorus, lib. 1. mentions, the bodies of the dead were conveyed, and received sentence according to the actions of their life. The boat was called Baris, and the ferryman Charon. Hence arose the fable of Charon and the Styx, &c. afterwards imported into Greece by Orpheus, and adopted in the religion of the country.

Acherūsias, a place or cave in Chersonesus Taurica, where Hercules, as is reported, dragged Cerberus out of hell. Xenoph. Anab. 6.

Achillēa. Vid. Leuce.

Achillēum, a town of Troas, near the tomb of Achilles, built by the Mityleneans. Plin. 5, c. 30.

Acidis, a river of Peloponnesus, formerly called Jardanus. Paus. 5, c. 5.

Acilla, a town of Africa, near Adrumetum; (some read Acolla.) Cæs. Afr. c. 33.

Acīris, now Agri, a river of Lucania.

Acontisma, a defile on the Thracian coast, eighteen miles from Philippi, also called Symbolum and the Pass of the Sapæi.

Acontobūlus, a place of Cappadocia, under Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons. Apollon. arg. 2.

Acra, I. a town of Italy,——II. Eubœa,——III. Cyprus,——IV. Acarnania,——V. Sicily,——VI. Africa,——VII. Sarmatia, &c.——VIII. A promontory of Calabria, now Capo di Leuca.

Acradīna, the citadel of Syracuse, taken by Marcellus the Roman consul. Plut. in Marcel.—Cic. in Verr. 4.

Acræphia, a town in Bœotia; whence Apollo is called Acræphius. Its ruins are still to be seen on the eminence above the village of Carditza. Herodot. 8, c. 135.

Acrīgas, Vid. Agragas.

Acrathos, a promontory of the peninsula on which mount Athos is situate, towards the Strymonic gulf. It is the modern Capo Monte Santo.

Acroceraunii montes, known in modern geography by the name of Chimarra, formed the natural boundary of Illyria and Chaonia. This lofty chain, so celebrated in antiquity as the seat of storms and tempests, extends for several miles along the coast, from Cape Linguetta, the Acroceraunium Promonterium, to the neighbourhood of Butrinto; while inland it is connected with the ramifications of the Thesprotian and Molossian mountains. The Greek and Latin poets are full of allusions to these dangerous rocks.

Acroceraunium promontorium. Vid. Acroceraunii Montes.

Acrocorinthus, a lofty mountain on the isthmus of Corinth. There is a temple of Venus on the top, and Corinth is built at the bottom. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 4.—Plut. in Arat.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 106.

Acropŏlis, the citadel of Athens, built on a rock, and accessible only on one side. Minerva had a temple at the bottom. Paus. in Attic.

Acrorea regio, the border tract along the boundary of Arcadia and Elis, so called from its mountainous character. It contained several towns, of which Lasion was one. Xen. Hell. 3, 2, 231.

Acte, I. the peninsula in which mount Athos rises, between the Singitic and Strymonic gulfs.——II. Also a name applied to the coast of Attica, (from ἀκτὴ, a shore,) and sometimes extended to the whole country. Thuc. 4, 109.—Pomp. Mel. 2, 3.

Actium, I. a town of Acarnania, celebrated for the victory to which it gave its name. It was situated close to the entrance of the Ambracian gulf, on an elevated promontory. Thucydides mentions Actium as a port in the territory of Anactorium. The antiquity of the temple of Apollo appears to have been great, since Virgil supposes it to have existed in the time of Æneas. The name of Azio is still attached to some ruins which are visible on a bold rocky height in the position assigned by D'Anville to Actium. Strab.—Thuc. 1, 29.—Æn. 3, 274.—Hughes' Travels.——II. A promontory of Corcyra. Cic. ad Att. 7, 2.

Addua, now the Adda, a river of Cisalpine Gaul. It separated the Insubres from the Cenomani, and, after supplying the lake Larius, empties into the Po some distance below the town of Acerræ. Strabo refers its origin to the mount Adula, which can only be correct if Adula be a name applied to all the Rhætian Alps. Strabo.—Cram. B.

Adonis, a river of Phœnicia, rising in mount Lebanon, and falling, after a north-west course, near Byblus, into the sea. The soil through which this river flows is of a reddish clay, and when the floods prevail the reddish tinge of the waters affords occasion to the poets for some of the fables connected with the name of Adonis.

Adramyttium, an Athenian colony on the sea-coast of Mysia, near the Caycus. Strab. 13.—Thucyd. 5, c. 1.

Adrāna, a river of Germany, now the Eder, running through Hesse, and falling into the Weser not far from Cassel. Tac. Ann. 1, 56.—Polyb.

Adrānum, a town of Sicily, near Ætna, with a river of the same name. The chief deity of the place was called Adranus, and his temple was guarded by 1000 dogs. Plut. in Timol.

Adrastia, a region and city of the Troad in Mysia, called from the battle fought there by Alexander with the Persians, Adrastii Campi; and it was here that the first meeting took place between the rival kings. Its earlier name was Parium, but Homer calls it Adrastia. Arrian. -Strabo.

Adria. Vid. Hadriæ.

Aduatūca, and Atuatūca, a town in the territory of the Eburones. The Itinerary of Antoninus calls it Aduaca, and Ptolemy speaks of the Tongri and their city Atuacutum. Upon the destruction of the Eburones the Tongri occupied their territory; whence Tongres, the modern name of the ancient town. Tongres is in the Pays-bas, between Maestricht and Louvain. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, 32 and 34, Lemaire's ed.

Adulis, a town of Upper Egypt.

Æa, Æa, or Æea, an island of Colchis, in the Phasis. Apollon. 3.

Æantium, the promontory which closes the Pagasæan gulf on the Magnesian side.

Æas. Vid. Aous.

Æculanum, or Æclanum, a town of Samnium, must be placed on the Appian Way, about 13 miles from Benevento. Holstenius first discovered its ruins near Mirabella, on the site called by the natives Le Grotte. Cram. It. 2, 249.—App. Civ. Bell. 1, 51.

Ædepsus, now, perhaps, Dipso, a town of Eubœa, where were some warm springs consecrated to Hercules. Plut. Vit. Syll.

Ædessa, or Edessa, a town near Pella. Caranus, king of Macedonia, took it by following goats (αἶγες) that sought shelter from the rain, and called it hence Ægæ, otherwise written Ægæ, Ægea, and Ægæa. It continued the capital of the country until the seat of government was transferred to Pella. It is believed that Vodina on the Vistritza represents this ancient city; and there are still remains of sepulchres in the vicinity. Justin. 7, 1.—Clarke's Travels.—Pliny, 4, 10.

Ædicŭla Ridiculi, a temple raised to the god of mirth from the following circumstance: after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal marched to Rome, whence he was driven back by the inclemency of the weather; which caused so much joy in Rome, that the Romans raised a temple to the god of mirth. This deity was worshipped at Sparta. Plut. in Lyc. Agid. and Cleom. Pausanias also mentions a θεος γελωτος.

Ægæ, an island of the Ægean sea, between Tenedos and Chios.

Ægæ, I. a town of Macedonia. Vid. Ædessa.——II. A town of Achaia, on the Crathis, celebrated for the worship of Neptune as early as the days of Homer. In Strabo's time it had ceased to exist. Il. 8, 203.—Strab. 8.——III. Another in Eubœa, south of Ædepsus; probably the modern Akio.

Ægæa, a town and sea-port of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

Ægæum mare, the Archipelago, that portion of the Mediterranean which intervenes between the eastern shores of Greece and the opposite continent of Asia Minor. It was considered particularly stormy and dangerous; whence the proverb, τον Αιγαιον πλεῖ. Different parts were known by particular names, as the Mare Myrtoum, which lay between the Cyclades and the Peloponnesian coast; and the Icarium, which washed the Lydian coast; and the islands Myconus, Icaria, and Samos. Tradition referred the origin of its name to Ægeus; but Strabo, with more probability, deduced it from the little island of Ægæ in the vicinity of Eubœa. Cramer, Greece, 1, 7.—Æsch. Agam. 642.—Hor. Od. 2, 16.

Ægaleos, or Ægaleum, a mountain of Attica, opposite Salamis, on which Xerxes sat during the engagement of his fleet with the Grecian ships in the adjacent sea. Herodot. 8, c. 90.—Thucyd. 2, c. 19.

Ægan, and Ægon, the Ægean sea. Flac. 1, 628.—Sat. 5, 56.

Ægātes, I. a promontory of Æolia.——II. Three islands opposite Carthage, called Aræ by Virg. Æn. 1, near which the Romans, under Catulus, in the first Punic War, defeated the Carthaginian fleet under Hanno, 242 B. C. Liv. 21, c. 10 and 41, l. 22, c. 54.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Sil. 1, v. 61.

Ægĕleon, a town of Macedonia, taken by king Attalus. It has been conjectured that, instead of Ægeleon in Livy, we should read Pteleon.

Ægesta, an ancient town of Sicily near mount Eryx, destroyed by Agathocles. It was sometimes called Segesta and Acesta. Its ruins are still seen in the vale of Mazara. Diod. 10.

Ægĭălea, I. an island near Peloponnesus, in the Cretan sea.——II. Another in the Ionian sea, near the Echinades. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Herodot, 4, c. 107.——III. The ancient name of Peloponnesus. Strab. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Ægida, a town in the little island of Ægidis, on the coast of Histria, at the mouth of the Formio. The later name of this place was Justinopolis; it is now Capo d'Istria. Plin. 3, 19.—Cram. It.

Ægila, a place in Laconia, where Aristomenes was taken prisoner by a crowd of religious women whom he had attacked. Paus. 4, c. 17.

Ægilia, I. a small island in the Euripus, belonging to the Styrians, where the Persian fleet, under Datis and Artaphernes, was moored before the battle of Marathon. It is now Stouri. Herod. 6, 101 and 107.——II. Another, now Cerigotte, between Cythera and Crete.

Ægimūrus, or Ægimūrus, an island near Lybia, supposed by some to be the same which Virgil mentions under the name of Aræ. Plin. 5, c. 7.

Ægina, now Egina or Engkia, an island, with a city of the same name, situated in the Saronic gulf, at equal distances from the Athenian, Megarian, and Peloponnesian coasts. Pausanias observes that of all the Greek islands it is the most inaccessible, being surrounded by hidden rocks and shoals. In fabulous times this island is said to have borne the name of Ænone, which it afterwards exchanged for that of Ægina, mother of Æacus and the long line of heroes descended from him. It received colonies from Crete, Argos, and Epidaurus. The Cretan may be referred to the time of Minos; that of Argos to the period in which Phidon was tyrant of that city. The Epidaurians, who crossed over into Egina, were a detachment of those Dorians who had left Argos under Deiphontes to settle at Epidaurus. After the battle of Platæa, Ægina was at the height of its prosperity, and was looked upon as the chief emporium of Greece: but on the breaking out of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians expelled the whole population from the island, replacing them with some of their own citizens. After the battle of Ægospotami, Lysander re-established the Æginetæ, but they never recovered their former prosperity. According to Strabo, the island is about 180 stadia in circuit. The vestiges of the walls of the ancient city cover an extensive plain, and the walls of the port and arsenal may be traced to a considerable extent. Cram. Gr. 3, p. 275.—Strabo, 8.—Herod. 8, 46.—Paus. 2, 29.—Thucyd.—Xen. Hell. 2, 2, 5.

ÆGINIUM, an important city in the north-west of Thessaly, near the Ion, which Livy describes as almost impregnable. The Epitomizer of Strabo seems to place it in Macedonia, and Steph. Byz., still more incorrectly, in Illyria. It was taken by the Athamanes in the war with Antiochus, and, some years after, given up to plunder by Paulus Æmilius. Its strength deterred Flaminius from laying siege to it. Mocossi probably stands near the site of the ancient city. Cram. Gr. 1, 355.—Livy, 32, 15; 36, 13; 44, 46; 45, 27.

ÆGIRA, one of the 12 cities of the Achæan league, was nearly opposite to Œanthe, in the country of the Locri Ozolæ, and near the sea of Corinth, between Sicyon and Ægium. The port was about twelve stadia from the town, which was situated on an eminence. According to Sir W. Gell, its ruins are to be seen on a woody hill above the spot now called Bloubouki. Its most ancient name was Hyperesia. The change to Ægira is accounted for by Pausanias, 7, 26.—Polyb. 4, 57.—Herodot. 1, 145.

ÆGIROESSA, a town of Ætolia. Herodot. 1, c. 149.

ÆGITUM, a town of Æolia, on a mountain eight miles from the sea. Thucyd. 3, c. 97.

ÆGIUM, now Vostizza, a town of Achaia, near the mouth of the Selinus. Here for a long time the general states of Achaia held their assemblies, until a law was made by Philopœmen, by which each of the federal towns became in its turn the place of rendezvous. According to Strabo these meetings were convened near the town, in a spot called Ænarium, where was a grove consecrated to Jupiter. Pausanias affirms, that in his time the Achæans still collected together at Ægium, as the Amphictyons did at Delphi and Thermopylæ. Among its temples was one to Jupiter Homagyrius, which was supposed to stand on the spot where Agamemnon convened all the chieftains of Greece before the Trojan expedition. Cram. Gr. 3, 63—Liv. 38, 7.—Polyb. 2, 54, 3.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 7, 23 and 24.

ÆGON, and ÆGAN, I. a promontory of Lemnos.——II. A name of the Ægæan. Stat. Theb. 5, 56—Flacc. 1, 628.

ÆGOSPOTĂMOI, a small river of the Thracian Chersonese, which empties into the Hellespont. At its mouth stands a town or port of the same name, where the Athenian fleet was totally defeated by Lysander, A. C. 405. The village of Galata probably stands on the site of the ancient town. Cram. Gr. 1, 330.—Herodot. 9, 119.—Xen. Hell. 2, 19.—Plut. Alcib.—Corn. Nep. Alcib.

ÆGOSĬDÆ, an Asiatic nation under Attalus, with whom he conquered Asia, and to whom he gave a settlement near the Hellespont. Polyb. 5.

ÆGOSTHĒNÆ, a town of Megaris, a little to the south of Pagæ, whither the Lacedæmonians retreated after the battle of Leuctra. Ptolemy erroneously assigns it to Phocis. According to Sir W. Gell, the village of Porto Germano, where there are yet considerable ruins of the ancient fortifications, and a perfect town, may be considered as the ancient Ægosthenæ. Cram. Gr. 2, 437.—Xen. Hell. 6, 4, 26.

ÆGŪSA, the middle island of the Ægates near Sicily.

ÆGYPSUS, a town of the Getæ, near the Danube. Ovid. ex Pont. 1, ep. 8. l. 4, ep. 7.

ÆGYPTIUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean sea which is on the coast of Egypt.

ÆGYPTUS, a country lying between Arabia on the east, Libya on the west, the Mediterranean on the north, and Ethiopia on the south. It has been by different writers assigned to Africa and Asia, and the limits which separate it from either country are not well defined. The ancients, according to Strabo, confined the name Egypt to the parts watered and overflowed by the Nile. It presents itself to the eye as an immense valley, extending nearly 600 miles in length, and hemmed in, on either side, by a ridge of hills and a vast expanse of desert. The breadth of the cultivable soil varies, according to the direction of the rocky barriers by which its limits are determined; spreading, in some parts, into a spacious plain, while at others it contracts its dimensions to less than two leagues. The mean width has been estimated at about nine miles; and hence, including the whole area from the shores of the Delta to the first cataract, the extent of land capable of bearing crops has been computed to contain ten millions of acres. Egypt was divided into Superior and Inferior, the latitude of Cairo presenting in our day the line of demarcation. There was another division, frequently alluded to by the Greek and Roman writers, namely, that of the Delta, the Heptanomis, and the Thebaid. The first of these provinces was comprehended within the two principal branches of the Nile from its division to its mouths; the third occupied the narrow valley of Upper Egypt; while to the second was allotted the intermediate space, which seems to have been divided into seven nomes, districts, or cantons. The Delta is now called Bahari, which signifies in the Arabic a maritime district. The modern name of Vostani, which expresses in Arabic an intermediate space, still marks the ancient Heptanomis. Said, south of Vostani, designates the Thebaid. About the conclusion of the fourth century, the eastern division of the Delta, between Arabia and the Phatnitic branch of the Nile, as high as Heliopolis, was erected into a new province under the name of Angustamnica. The Heptanomis took under Arcadius, son of the great Theodosius, the name of Arcadia; and at a later period the Thebaid was divided into Anterior and Superior. As to the origin of the name Ægyptus much diversity of opinion has existed. It is asserted by the Greeks, that a celebrated king of this name bequeathed it to his dominions, which had formerly passed under the appellation of Æĕria, or the land of heat and blackness. In the Sacred Writings of the Hebrews it is called Mizraim, the plural form of the oriental noun Mizr, the name which is applied to Egypt by the Arabs of the present day. The Copts retain the native word Chemia, which, perhaps, has some relation to Cham, the son of Noah; or, as Plutarch insinuates, may only denote that darkness of colour which appears in a rich soil or the human eye. Mizraim was one of the children of Cham. Bruce remarks that YGypt, the term used by the Ethiopians when they speak of Egypt, means the country of Canals; a description very suitable to the improved condition of that valley under its ancient kings. In the heroic age of Greece the word Ægyptus was employed in reference to an ancient sovereign, to the land, and also to the river. According to another opinion, the name of Copt, which distinguishes the remains of the original nations from the Arabs and from the Turks, is in the form of Kypt, no other than the root of the Greek name Ægyptus. Of all the countries of the ancient world none is more deservedly the subject of inquiry than Egypt. The antiquity of its institutions, their influence, real or imaginary, upon the rest of the world, producing revolutions abroad, though at home unvarying; its stupendous monuments, which have resisted the influence of time from a period so remote as to defy calculation; its peculiar climate and geographical relations; and its mysterious river, to which the country owes its very existence; all and each of these distinguish it from almost every other portion of the globe. The aspect of Egypt undergoes periodical changes with the seasons. In our winter months, when nature is for us dead, she seems to carry life into these climates; and the verdure of Egypt's enamelled meadows is then delightful to the eye. In the opposite season this same country exhibits nothing but a brown soil, either miry or dry, hard, and dusty. During the period of summer, from June to the close of September, the heat is intense. The scarcity of rain is a remarkable phenomenon. "A long valley," says M. Regnier, "encircled with hills and mountains, presents no point in which the surface has sufficient elevation to attract and detain the clouds. The evaporations from the Mediterranean, too, during summer, carried off by the north winds, which have almost the constancy of trade winds in Egypt, finding nothing to stop their progress, pass over the country without interruption, and collect around the mountains of Central Africa. There, deposited in rains, they swell the torrents, which, falling into the Nile, augment its waters, and, under the form of an inundation, restore, with usury, to Egypt, the blessings of which the defect of rain otherwise deprived it." That the absence of rain is in part owing to the previous aridity of the soil is clearly established by the fact, that near the sea, where the soil is moist, rain is not uncommon; while at Cairo, for example, there are, perhaps, four or five showers in the year; in Upper Egypt, one or two at most. The canals of Egypt were very numerous, and extended the fertilizing influence of the Nile beyond the limits of its inundation. (Vid. Nilus.) D'Anville.—Russell's Egypt.—Malte-Brun.—Herod.—Justin. 1.—Plin. 5, 1; 14, 7.—Polyb. 15.—Diod. 1.—Curt. 4, 1.—Paus. 1, 14.—Mela, 1, 9.—Apollod. 2, 1 and 5.

Ægys, a town of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia, and contiguous to Belmina. Its site is probably the same with that of the modern Agia Eirene, near the village of Collina. Cram. Gr.—Polyb. 2, 54.—Paus. 3, 2; 8, 27.

Æmathion, and Æmathia. Vid. Emathion.

Æmŏna, now Layback, on the Save. At a late period, when the confines of Italy were extended beyond the Rhœtian Alps, this was considered the last town of that country. Herodian.

Æmŏnia, a country of Greece, which received its name from Æmon or Æmus, and was afterwards called Thessaly. Achilles is called Æmonius, as being born there. Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 11, l. 4, el. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 37. It was also called Pyrrha, from Pyrrha, Deucalion's wife, who reigned there.—The word has been indiscriminately applied to Greece by some writers. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Ænaria, now Ischia, an island on the Campanian coast. It was otherwise called Inarime and Pithecusa. The latter name commonly includes the adjacent island of Prochyta, now Procida. Inarime some consider of Tuscan origin, signifying apes, rendered in Greek by the term Pithecussæ. Pliny refers these names to the number of earthen vessels used in the island. The Latin poets have applied it to Homer's description of the place of torment allotted to the earth-born Typhœus, in consequence, no doubt, of the frequent volcanic eruptions. Three colonies in succession, of Eretrians, Chalcidians, and Syracusans, were driven by the earthquakes from the island. Mount Epopeus, now Epomeo, or Monte San Nicolo, was remarkable for its volcanic character. Cram. It. 2, 186.—Liv. 8, 22.—Mel. 2, 7.—Plin. 3, 6.—Strab. 5.

Ænarium. Vid. Ægium.

Ænêa, or Æneia, I. a town of Macedonia, situated on the coast opposite to Pydna, on the other side of the Gulf of Thessalonica, and fifteen miles from the latter place. Livy states that sacrifices were performed here annually in honour of Æneas, the reputed founder. Lycophron alludes to the foundation of this city by Æneas; and Virgil has not omitted to notice the tradition. It was given up to plunder by P. Æmilius, after the battle of Pydna. Its ruins are visible near the small town of Panomi, close to the headland of the same name, which is perhaps the Ænion of Scymnus. Cram. Gr. 1, 242.—Liv. 40, 4; 45, 27.—Æn. 3, 16.——II. A city of Acarnania, on the right bank of the Achelous, about 70 stadia from its mouth. Strabo states that it was formerly situated higher up the river, but was afterwards removed. It is not improbable that the ruins of Trigardon represent the more recent Ænea, and that those which are to be seen at Palæo Catouna answer to the more ancient town. Cram. Gr. 2, 30.—Strab. 10.

Ænianum Sinus, a name given by some to the Maliacus Sinus. Livy, 28, 5; 33, 3.

Ænos, I. a town of Thrace, to the east of the Hebrus, at the mouth of the estuary formed by that river. Herodotus calls it an Æolic city; by others its foundation is ascribed respectively to Mitylene and Cumæ. Its more ancient name was Poltyobria. Virgil supposes Æneas to have discovered here the tomb of the murdered Polydorus, and intimates that he founded a city which he named after himself. Pliny states that the tomb of Polydorus was at Ænos; but it is certain that, according to Homer, the city was called Ænos before the siege of Troy. Ænos, as well as Maronea, had been declared a free town by the Roman senate before the time of Pliny. It is known to the Byzantine writers under the name of Enos, which it still preserves. Ænos and its district belonged originally to the Apsynthii; it was also called Apsinthus, and the Apsynthii are named by Herodotus as a people bordering on the Thracian Chersonnese. We read of a river Apsinthus in Dionys. Perieg. 577. Cram. Gr. 1, 319.—Herod. 4, 90; 6, 34; 9, 119.—Steph. Byz.—Apollod. Bibl. 2, 5, 9.—Virg. Æn. 3, 18; 4, 11. Il. 4, 519.—Plin. 4, 11.——II. A town near mount Ossa. Steph. Byz.

Ænum, a mountain in Cephallenia. Strab. 7.

Ænyra, a town of Thasos. Herodot. 6, c. 47.

Æolia, or Æolis, a country of Asia Minor, near the Ægean sea. It has Troas at the north, and Ionia at the south. The inhabitants were of Grecian origin, and were masters of many of the neighbouring islands. They had 12, others say 30, considerable cities, of which Cumæ and Lesbos were the most famous. They received their name from Æolus, son of Hellenus. They migrated from Greece about 1124 B. C., 80 years before the migration of the Ionian tribes. "The Æolian Greeks," says Gillies, "established themselves, 88 years after the taking of Troy, along the shore of the ancient kingdom of Priam. They gradually diffused their colonies from Cyzicus on the Propontis to the mouth of the river Hermus, which delightful country, with the island of Lesbos, thenceforth received the name of Æolis or Æolia, to denote that the inhabitants belonged to the Æolian branch of the Hellenic race. Æolia continued for a long time free, and the assembly of the confederated cities met annually in the city of Cumæ. The country was, however, subdued by the Lydians, and fell, with the rest of the empire of Crœsus, into the hands of the Persians. The dialect of the Æolians was one of the principal forms of the Greek tongue, and connects it with various other idioms of Europe." Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Strab. 1, 2 and 6.—Plin. 5, c. 30.—Mela, 1, c. 2 and 18.—Thessaly has been anciently called Æolia. Bœotus, son of Neptune, having settled there, called his followers Bœotians, and their country Bœotia.

Æoliæ and Æolides, seven islands between Sicily and Italy; called Lipara, Hiera, Strongyle, Didyme, Ericusa, Phœnicusa, and Euonymos. They were the retreat of the winds; and Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, calls them Æolia, and the kingdom of Æolus, the god of storms and winds. They sometimes bear the name of Vulcaniæ and Hephæstiades, and Dion. Per. 1154, calls them Plotæ; but they are known now among the moderns under the general appellation of Lipari Islands. Lucan. 5, v. 669.—Justin. 4, c. 1.

Æolida, I. a city of Tenedos.——II. Another near Thermopylæ. Herodot. 8, c. 35.

Æpy, a town of Elis, under the dominion of Nestor. Stat. 4, Theb. v. 180.

Æquimælium, a place in Rome where the house of Melius stood, who aspired to sovereign power, for which crime his habitation was levelled to the ground. Liv. 4, c. 16.

Æsacus, a river of Troy near Ida.

Æsarus, now Esaro, a river in the Bruttiorum Ager. At its mouth stands Crotona. The Æsarus was the scene of some of the best Bucolics in Theocritus. Polyb. Fragm. 10, 1.—Theoc. Idyll. 4, 17.

Æsepus, a river of Mysia, which rises in Mount Ida, and, flowing in a course very nearly parallel with that of the Granicus, empties into the Propontis between the mouths of the Tarsius and the Granicus. D'Anville.

Æsernia, now Isernia, a town of Samnium, said to have been colonized about the beginning of the first Punic War. In the Social War it fell into the hands of the allies. Subsequently, it was re-colonized by Augustus and Nero. Cram. It. 2, 290.—Liv. Epit. 16.—App. Bell. Civ. 1, 41.

Æsis, I. now the Esino or Fiumesino, a river of Italy, which separates Umbria from Picenum. It rises in the Appenines, and empties into the Hadriatic north of Ancona.——II. A town on the left bank of the Æsis. It is now Iesi. The name is also written Æsium. Old inscriptions give it the title of colony. Cram.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, 14.

Æsium. Vid. Æsis.

Æson, I. a river of Macedonia, which empties into the Thermaic gulf near Pydna.——II. A town of Magnesia, in Thessaly.

Æsopus, a river of Pontus. Strab. 12.

Æstræum, a city of the Æstræi, a Pæonian tribe named by Ptolemy. Æstræum is probably the Asterium of Livy. Perhaps the Astræa assigned by Steph. Byz. to Illyria, is the city of which we are now speaking. Pliny calls it Astræa. Cram. Gr. 1, 273.—Liv. 40, 23.—Plin. 4, 10.

Æsula, a town of Latium, mentioned by Horace in the same line with Tibur, and therefore naturally supposed to have stood in its vicinity. In Pliny's time it no longer existed. This ancient site remains undiscovered. Cram. It. 2, 66.—Hor. 3, Od. 29.—Plin. 3, 5.

Æsyme, or Œsyme, incorrectly written Sisyme, a maritime town of Thrace, which opposed the Romans in the last Macedonian war. The same as the Emathea of Livy. Hom. Il. 8.—Thuc.—Liv. 43, 7.

Æthalia, called by the Latins Ilva, and now the island of Elba. It was situated about ten miles from Populonium, the nearest point of the Tuscan coast. This island was early celebrated for its iron mines, which exhibit marks of having been worked from the remotest times. The supply of metallic substance was so great, that it became a matter of popular belief that it was constantly renewed. Arist. De Mirabil.—Plin. 34, 14.—Virg. 10, 173.—Cram. It.

Æthiopia. No name that occurs in the ancient writers is used with less precision than Æthiopia. Homer represents Jove as leaving Olympus, and repairing to a feast in Æthiopia upon the Ocean. By some, Ocean, in the passage alluded to, is referred to the Nile; but it doubtless applies to the fabled waters which, according to the notions of many of the ancients, girt the earth like a zone. Virgil extends Æthiopia to the western coast of Africa, comprehending within it part of Mauretania. In fact, it would seem that the ancients included in Æthiopia all those southern regions which were unknown to them. That division of Æthiopia which was distinguished from the rest as Æthiopia supra Ægyptum or Superior, is the only part of which any thing certain was known. Æthiopia Inferior comprehends Ptolemy's Æthiopia Interior and his Terra Incognita, extending across Africa to the Ocean. That part which bordered on the Atlantic was called Hesperian. Æthiopia supra Ægyptum commences on the frontier of Egypt, and extends along the Nile, including Abyssinia within its limits. A large portion of the country along the Nile is, like Egypt, a narrow vale. It was first called Ætheria, and afterwards Atlantia, as Pliny tells us. The name Æthiopia has been traced to αἴθω, to burn, and ὀψ, the countenance, from the complexion of its inhabitants. Some apply to this country the Scriptural appellation of Ludim, from Lud, son of Mizraim; others, that of Chus, the son of Cham. That of India is also given it in several passages of the ancient authors. The people in the old time were said to be great astrologers; the first ordainers also of sacred ceremonies, and in both tutors to the Egyptians. They held an annual feast at Diospolis, which Eustathius mentions, in which they carried about the statues of Jupiter and the other gods for twelve days. Hence, probably, the Homeric fiction. D'Anville.—Malte-Brun.—Heylin.—Homer, Il. 1, 423.—Virg. Æn. 10, 68; G. 2, 120; Æn. 4, 481.

Ætna, a mountain of Sicily, now Gibello, famous for its volcano, which, for about 3000 years, has thrown out fire at intervals. It is two miles in perpendicular height, and measures 100 miles round at the base, with an ascent of 30 miles. Its crater forms a circle about three and a half miles in circumference, and its top is covered with snow and smoke at the same time, whilst the sides of the mountain, from the great fertility of the soil, exhibit a rich scenery of cultivated fields and blooming vineyards. Pindar is the first who mentions an eruption of Ætna; and the silence of Homer on the subject is considered as a proof that the fires of the mountain were unknown in his age. From the time of Pythagoras, the supposed date of the first volcanic appearance, to the battle of Pharsalia, it is computed that Ætna has had 100 eruptions. The poets supposed that Jupiter had confined the giants under this mountain, and it was represented as the forge of Vulcan, where his servants, the Cyclops, fabricated thunderbolts, &c. On its sides are 77 cities or villages, of which the principal is Catania, situate in the first of the three belts or zones into which the mountain is divided by the distinct climates of equal number that characterize its ascent. Diodorus Siculus is the earliest who speaks of its eruptions; but since his time the mountain has been burning with intervals down to the present day. The last eruption took place in the year 1819. The name Ætna, sometimes written Æthna, is derived most probably from αἴθω, to burn; and other etymologies of the same word all refer to its volcanic character. Ætna supplies the luxury of ice to all the adjacent, and even to some comparatively distant, countries. Hesiod. Theog. v. 860.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 570.—*Ovid. Ætolia, a country of Greece, bounded on the west by the Achelous, which separated it from Acarnania; on the north by the mountain districts occupied by the Athamanes, Dolopes, and Ænianes; on the east by the country of the Dorians and Locri Ozolae; and on the south by the Corinthiacus Sinus. These were the limits of Ætolia during the time of Spartan and Athenian glory; but when the Romans achieved the conquest of the country, the Ætolians had extended their dominions on the west and north-west as far as Epirus, where they were in possession of Ambracia, leaving to Acarnania only a few towns on the coast; towards the north they occupied the districts of Amphilochia and Aperantia, and a great portion of Dolopia. On the Thessalian side they had made themselves masters of the country of the Ænianes, a large portion of Phthiotis, with the cantons of the Melians and Trachinians. On the east they had gained the whole of the Locrian coast to the Crissæan gulf, including Naupactus. This flourishing condition was of short duration. Upon the failure of their rebellion against Rome, they were completely subdued and humbled by their conquerors. The chief cities of Ætolia were Chalcis, Thermus, Calydon; its principal rivers, besides the Achelous, the Arachthus and Evenus. The most ancient name of the country was Curetis, derived from the Curetes, by some considered as indigenous, by others traced to Eubœa. The Hyantes, a primitive Grecian race, are said to have settled in Ætolia as well as in Bœotia, where they are better known. The Æolians, a Thessalian tribe, on being expelled from their original settlements, occupied a part of Curetis, thence called Æolis. Finally, it is said that Ætolus, the son of Endymion, having arrived from Elis in Peloponnesus at the head of an army, defeated the Curetes, and forced them to abandon their country, to which he gave the name of Ætolia. Strabo informs us that it was usual to divide the country, as first described, into Ætolia Antiqua and Epictetos. The former extended along the coast from the Achelous to Calydon, answering to the Æolis of Thucydides. The latter, as the name implies, was a territory subsequently acquired, and comprehended the most mountainous and least fertile parts of the province. *Cram. Æx, a rocky island in the Ægean Sea, between Tenedos, or rather, perhaps, between Tenos and Chios. According to Pliny, from this island, the sea, near the centre of which it stood if Tenos be substituted for Tenedos, was called the Ægean.

Africa, called Lybia by the Greeks, one of the three parts of the ancient world, and the greatest peninsula of the universe, was bounded on the east by Arabia and the Red Sea, on the north by the Mediterranean, south and west by the ocean. It is joined on the east to Asia, by an isthmus 60 miles long, which some of the Ptolemies endeavoured to cut, in vain, to join the Red and Mediterranean seas. The knowledge which the ancients had of this continent was no less vague than circumscribed; and though Africa did, in their writings, often include all that they knew of the peninsula, the names of its different regions were more frequently used as the generic names of countries, than as designating inferior portions only of a vast continent. Africa, therefore, must be treated under the general head, and under that of Africa Propria. In its greatest extent as known to antiquity, it contained the divisions, 1st, of Egypt, from the Red Sea or Sinus Arabicus, and from Rhinocolura in the Stony Arabia, to Apis on the Plinthenetic gulf; 2d, of Marmarica as far as 40 degrees east longitude, whence the Cyrenaica extended three degrees west as far as the Syrtis Major. Between this and the Syrtis Minor lay the barren country of the Regio Syrtica or Tripolitana, and west of this began the settlements of Proper Africa, divided into the countries of Numidia and Mauretania. All these regions were confined strictly to the northern coast, except the kingdom of Egypt, which extends some hundred miles south along the valley of the Nile. Besides these, the Greeks and Romans entertained certain indefinite notions of a country extending to an unknown limit south of Egypt, which they called Æthiopia, and of a desert waste lying west of Egypt and south of the coast that we have described above. This they called Libya, or Africa Interior, inhabited by the Gætuli, the Nasamones, the Garamantes, the Nigritiæ, and the Hesperii, around the great desert of sand or Sahara. "If," says Malte-Brun, "Africa has so long remained inaccessible, we shall find in its physical form the principal cause of its obscurity. A vast peninsula of 5000 miles in length, and nearly 4600 in breadth, presents few long or easily navigated rivers. The Mediterranean on the north, and the Atlantic and Ethiopic oceans which encompass it on the west, form inconsiderable inequalities in its line of coast; and the Arabian Gulf separates Africa from Asia without breaking the gloomy uniformity of the African coast. At great distances are some large rivers, as the Nile in the north-east, the Senegal and Gambia in the west, and in the centre the mysterious Niger, which conceals its termination as the Nile used to conceal its origin. In the interior, and even on the coast, are great and lofty rocks, from which no torrents can proceed, and table-lands, watered by no streams, as the great desert of Sahara. At a greater distance are countries wholly impregnated with moisture. The African mountains are more distinguished for their breadth than for their height. If they reach a great elevation, it is by a gradual rise, and in a succession of terraces. Atlas, which lines nearly the whole of the northern coast, is a series of five or six small chains, including many table-lands." Mela, 1, c. 4, &c.—Diod. 3, 4, and 20.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, 26, and 32, l. 4, c. 41, &c.—Plin. 5, c. 1, &c.

Africa Propria. A part of Africa, extending from the river Ampsaga, now the Suffegmar, in Numidia, to the Cyrenaica; but this will include in Africa the Tripolitana through the sandy region, now the Barcan desert, as far as the Syrtis Major. Pliny defines it to extend from the eastern boundary of Numidia, the river Tusca, as far as the bay of the Lesser Syrtis; that is to say, over the Carthaginian territory. Plin. 5, 4.

Agĭgrĭane Portæ, gates at Syracuse, near which the dead were buried. Cic. in Tusc.

Agalassæ, a nation of India, conquered by Alexander. Diod. 17.

Aganippe, a celebrated fountain of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon. It flows into the Permessus, and is sacred to the muses, who, from it, were called Aganippedes.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Propert. 2, el. 3.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 312.—Plin. 4, c. 7. Poetic license has sometimes confounded Aganippe with Hippocrene, which also belonged to the same region.

Agassæ, a town of Macedonia, on a branch of the Haliacmon in Pieria. It was given up to plunder by P. Æmilius, after the defeat of Perseus at the battle of Pydna, for having taken part with that prince. It is supposed by some to be the same as Ægæ, the early capital of Macedon. Liv. 45, 27.—Mannert, Geog. Ant.

Agĭsus, supposed to be the modern Porto Greco, between the promontory Garganus and the Cerbalus in Daunia.

Agitha, a town of France, near Agde, in Languedoc. Mela. 2, c. 5.

Agdestis, a mountain of Phrygia, where Atys was buried. Paus, 1, c. 4.

Agendĭcum, now Sens, a town of Gaul, the capital of the Senones. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 6, c. 44.

Agisymba, a district of Libya Interior, by some considered as the limit of Africa southward as known to the ancients.

Agorānis, a river falling into the Ganges. Arrian. de Ind.

Agra, I. a place of Bœotia, where the Ilissus rises. Diana was called Agræa, because she hunted there.——II. A city of Susa.

Agræis Regio, a small territory, separated from Acarnania by the mountain Thyamus. It was inhabited for a long time by an Ætolian tribe, and maintained its independence till conquered by the Athenians and Acarnanians under Demosthenes, in the Peloponnesian war. The inhabitants were accounted barbarians, though Strabo calls them Ætolians. Thucyd.—Polyb.—Strab.

Agrĭgas, or Acragas, now Girgenti, a town of Sicily, so called by the Greeks, the Agrigentum of the Romans. The city was built B. C. 584, by the people of Gela, on the river from which it received its name. It was so well defended by nature, being situate upon an eminence at the confluence of the Agragas and the Hypsa, and so strongly built, that Empedocles, contrasting the luxurious style of living among the inhabitants with their durable and austere style of building, used to say "the Agrigentini live to-day as though they were to die to-morrow, and build as though they were to live for ever." In its flourishing situation, Agrigentum contained 200,000 inhabitants, who submitted with reluctance to the superior power of Syracuse. The government was mo-narchical, but afterwards a democracy was established. The famous Phalaris usurped the sovereignty, which was also some time in the hands of the Carthaginians. Agrigentum can now boasts of more venerable remains of antiquity than any other town of Sicily. Polyb. 9.—Strab. 6.—Diod. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 707.—Sil. It. 14, v. 211.

Agylla, called by the Latins Cære, which may have been its earliest name. It was one of the most considerable cities of Hetruria, upon the coast. According to the poets this was a flourishing city, under the rule of Mezentius, at the time of the reputed arrival of Æneas in Italy. We infer from hence that Agylla was one of the early cities which distinguished Hetruria before the rise of the Roman domination. The Romans were frequently engaged in wars with this city; but it is said, that afterwards, when Rome was compelled to purchase her liberation from the Gauls, the priests and vestals were received at Agylla, and the barbarians, on their return, were defeated by the inhabitants, and forced to make restitution to the Romans. For this service the rights of citizenship were in part extended to the people of Agylla, but not so as to afford them the privilege of voting; whence the proverb, in Cæritum tabulas referre aliquem. At a later period they enjoyed the immunities of a municipium. In the Punic wars, Agylla lent a powerful aid to the Romans, as attested by Livy. Its antiquity was proved in the later days of the empire, by paintings then extant, of an earlier date than the founding of Rome. Before the time of Strabo, however, it had sunk into insignificance; nor is the modern town of Cerveteri, which occupies its site, more remarkable. Virg. 8.—Liv. 5, 40, and 18, 45.—*Val. Agyrium, a town of Sicily, where Diodorus the historian was born. The inhabitants were called Agyrinenses. Diod. 14.—Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 65. It was sometimes written Agurium, now San Filippo d'Argirone, near the Symæthus in the Val di Demona.

Ajalon, a town in the part of Palestine allotted to the tribe of Benjamin. It was in the valley of this city that Joshua commanded the moon to stand, that he might accomplish the destruction of the army of the five kings. Josh. 10, 12.

Alabanda, æ, or orum, an inland town of Caria, to the east of Stratonice, abounding with scorpions. The name is derived from Alabandus, a deity worshipped there. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 16.—Herodot. 7, c. 195.—Strab. 14.

Alabastrum, a town and a mountain of Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 7.

Alăbus, a river of Sicily, now the Cantaro.

Alei, a number of islands in the Persian gulf, abounding in tortoises. Arrian. in Perip.

Alesa, or Alesa, a city on a mountain of Sicily, about a mile from the sea. In the Alesian territory is a fountain mentioned by Priscian and Solinus, which is said to have been excited to heaving and swelling at the sound of the music of a flute. Boch. Georg. Sac. 1, 27.

Alalcomĕnæ, I. a city of Bœotia, where some suppose that Minerva was born, situate to the east of Coronæa. So great was the veneration with which this place was regarded as sacred to that goddess, that the Thebans, when their city was taken by the Epigoni, retired to this city as to an inviolable asylum. The temple, however, was plundered by the Romans commanded by Sylla; yet even to this day a few remains of the structure may be seen above the ruins of the town which lies in the vicinity of the modern Sulinara. Strab.—Paus.—Sir W. Gell, Itiner.——II. Another in Acarnania, or, according to Plutarch, in Ithaca.

Alalia, a town of Corsica, built by a colony of Phocæans, destroyed by Scipio 562 B. C. and afterwards rebuilt by Sylla. Herodot. 1, c. 165.—Plin.

Alăta Castra, a Roman port, south of the Vallum Severinum and Æstuarium Bodotriæ, or Frith of Forth. It was called also Edenodunum, and was the site of the present Edinburgh, the Celtic termination dune being changed into the Saxon burgh. Ptol.—Dionys. Perieg. 1083.

Alatrium, a town of Latium, to the east of Ferentinum now Alatri. In Strabo it is written Ἀλάστριον. It appears from Cicero to have been a municipium: and Frontinus informs us that it was a colony. Cram. It. 2, 81.—Cic. Orat. pro Cluent.—Liv. 9, 43.

Alazon, a river flowing from mount Caucasus into the Cyrus, and separating Albania from Iberia. Flac. 6, v. 101.

Alba, I. a city of the Marsi, in Italy, which received the distinctive name of Fucentia, or Fucensis, from its vicinity to the Fusine lake, near the northern shore of which it stood. After it became a Roman colony it was chiefly selected as a residence for the captives of rank or consequence, on account of its strong and secluded situation. In the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey it adhered to the latter, and received the praises of Cicero afterwards for its resistance to the attack of Antony. The ruins of the ancient town are considerable, and at no great distance from them stands the modern city, bearing the same name. Cram. It.—Plin. 3, 12, —Liv. 30, 45; 45, 42.—Cic. Phil. 3, 3.——II. Pompeia, a town of Liguria, on the Tanarus, the birth-place of the emperor Pertinax. Plin. 3, 5.—Zon. Ann. 2.——III. A river of Tarraconensis in Spain, emptying into the Mediterranean Sea a little to the south of the Pyrenean promontory, near the Gallicus Sinus, now the Gulf of Lyons. Its modern name is the Ter. Plin. 33.——IV. Longa, a town of Latium, a little to the north of Aricia. Strabo places Alba on the slope of the mons Albanus, 20 miles from Rome. This position cannot agree with the modern town of Albano, which is at the foot of the mountain, and 12 miles from Rome. Dionysius informs us that it was situated on the declivity of the Alban mount, midway between the summit and the lake of the same name. This description, and that of Strabo, agree with the position of Palazzolo, a village belonging to the Colonna family. The Latin poets ascribe the foundation of Alba to Ascanius, and derive its name from the white sow which appeared to Æneas on the Latin shore. Bardetti traced it to the Celtic Alp, "white," for we find several towns of that name in Liguria and ancient Spain; and it is observed, that all were situated on elevated spots. From the diversity of opinion in regard to the origin of Alba, we may reasonably conclude that it was one of the most ancient towns of Latium. Dionysius tells us, that the Albans were a mixture of Greek and other tribes. Towards the close of the republic, Alba, or Albanum, as it was then named, seems to have been a constant military station. It was occupied by the Prætorian cohorts during the latter days of the empire. As regards its history and final destruction by Tullus Hostilius, see Liv. 1. The Alban soil was famous for its fertility, and its vines were held inferior only to those of the Falernian vineyards. *Cram. Albania, a country of Asia, extending along the Caspian Sea, from the mouth of the Cyrus or the Kur, to the borders of Sarmatia Asiatica, and having for its south-west boundary the river Cyrus, which separated it from Iberia and the Caucasus. Out of this region, at the present time, are formed the province of Kirvan in the south, Daghestan on the north-eastern side, with a part of Georgia on the west. In Daghestan the Lesghi still bear some analogy in name to the Leges, the ancient inhabitants of that district. Dan.—Plin. 6, 9.—Mel. 3, 5.

Albaniæ Pylæ, a remarkable defile between a promontory of Caucasus and the sea, which gives entrance to Albania, and now closed by the city of Der-bend. The passage itself, according to D'Anville, is now called Tupkaragan.

Albana, a sea-port of Albania, now Bakre in Shirvan.

Albanopolis, the chief city of the Albani, a small Illyrian tribe, from which have sprung the modern Albanians, who have extended themselves in such a manner as to cover the whole of Epirus. Cram. Gr.—Ptol.

Albānum Pompeii, the Alban villa of Pompey is often mentioned by Cicero; the modern town of Albano is supposed to occupy its place. Plutarch (Vid. Pomp.) states, that his ashes were interred there by his wife Cornelia; and some have identified his tomb with the ruin which is more commonly, but erroneously, ascribed to the Horatii and Curiatii. The burial-place of these warriors, and the Fossa Cluilia, or Camp of Cluilius, should not be sought for at a greater distance than five miles from Rome. Cram. It. 2, 40.—Cic. Orat. pro Mil. et pro Reb.—Ep. ad Att. 7, 5.—Liv. 1, 25.—Dion. Hal. 3, 4.

Albānus lacus, a lake near Alba Longa, doubtless the crater of an extinct volcano. It is remarkable for the prodigious rise of its waters, to such an extent as to threaten the surrounding country, and Rome itself, with an overwhelming inundation. The oracle of Delphi being consulted on that occasion, declared, that unless the Romans carried off the waters of the lake they would never take Veii. This led to the construction of that wonderful subterranean canal or emissario, which is to be seen at this very day, in remarkable preservation, below the town of Castel Gardolfo. This channel is said to be carried through the rock for the space of a mile and a half; and the water which it discharges unites with the Tiber about five miles below Rome. Cram. It. 2, 39.—Cic. de Div. 1, 44.—Liv. 5, 15.—Val. Max. 1, 6.—Plut. Vit. Camill.

Albanus mons, now Monte Cavo, celebrated in history from the circumstance of its being peculiarly dedicated to Jove, under the title of Latialis. It was on the Alban mount that the Feriæ Latinæ were celebrated. The Roman generals also occasionally performed sacrifices on this mountain, and received there the honours of the triumph. Cram. It. 2, 38.—Lucan. 1, 198.—Vulp. Vel. Lat. 12, 4.

Albion, a name of Britain. The derivation of this name has been supposed from every language almost, in which analogous sounds were to be found. Thus the Greek Αλφον, white, the Hebrew Alben, white, the word alp itself of disputed etymology, have been considered as the root of the word Albion. Some writers believe that the name of Albin, by which Scotland is still designated, is but a corruption of Albion. Plin. 4, 16.—Ptol.

Albis, the Elbe, a river that divided ancient Germany in the middle, flowing between the Weser and the Oder, the Visurgis and Viadrus of antiquity. It rises on the borders of Silesia, and traversing Bohemia and Saxony, and passing by the northern boundary of Hanover, empties into the German Ocean below Gluckstadt in Holstein. Though Germany, in the prosperous days of the republic, was considered to extend as far as the Vistula, yet only the Cisalpine portion was known, by real intercourse, to the Romans. Domitius Ahenobarbus, about six years before the birth of Christ, effected the passage of this ancient limit; though unaccompanied by any victory or other advantage, this exploit alone was thought worthy of a triumph. When the irruption of the barbarians of the east and north began to press upon the German tribes, who were thus pushed upon the empire, the Albis became the northern boundary of Germany.

Albium Ingaunum, or Albingaunum, now Albenga, the chief town of the Ingauni, lying on the Ligusticus Sinus, at the mouth of the Merula. Varr. de Re Rust. 3, 8.—Mela, 2, 4.—Tac. Hist. 2, 15.

Albium Intemelium, or Alintemelium, now Ventimiglia, a town of the Intemelii in Liguria. It was a place of some note, and a municipium. Varr. de Re Rust. 3, 8.—Tac. Hist. 2, 13.

Albius mons, a continuation of the Alpes Carnicæ, running through Illyricum, and having at its base, upon the southern side, the country of Liburnia. It is connected with mount Scardus, by which it is united to the Hæmus range, and may be considered as a link in the chain which the Alpine range extends over Europe. Strab.—Gram. Gr.

Albula, et Albulæ aquæ, I. a sulphureous stream flowing from the Albunean fount, now Acqua Zolfa, or Solfatara di Tivoli. It falls into the Anio a few miles below Tibur, and from it the epithet "sulphureous" has been transferred to the waters of the Anio. Heyne ad Æn. 7, 83.—Cluver. It. Mart. Ep. 1, 13.—Sil. Ital. 12, 538.——II. A name of the Tiber.

ALBUNEA, a grove and fountain in the Tiburtine territory. At this place Virgil fixes the oracle of Faunus. The fountain is a sulphureous source, which discharges itself by the Albulæ Aquæ into the Anio a few miles below Tibur. Servius incorrectly describes the fountain as in Tiburtinis altis montibus. Virg. 7, 83.—Heyne ad loc.

ALBURNUS MONS, a ridge of mountains in Lucania, near the junction of the Silarus and Tanager. It is now commonly called Monte di Postiglione, and sometimes Alburno. Cram. It. 2, 376.—Virg. Geor. 3, 146.

ALCATHOE, a name of Megara in Attica, because rebuilt by Alcathous, son of Pelops. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 8.

ALCIMĒDON, a plain of Arcadia.

ALCIMUS, a cape near the entrance of Phalerum and the mouth of the Ilissus, perhaps the headland of the promontory of Munychia. Here was erected the monument in memory of Themistocles and in commemoration of his services. This name is by some thought to be written by mistake for Alimus. Paus.—Plut.—Meurs.—*Cram. ALCYONIA PALUS, a pool in Argolis, mentioned by Pausanias, who informs us that the Bacchic orgies were once a year performed upon its banks. When Nero endeavoured to sound the depth of this pool, he is said by the same author to have found it unfathomable. Clarke, in his travels found the same notion still prevailing that prevailed in the days of Pausanias, and the surrounding inhabitants believe that nothing will swim on the surface of this pool.

ALCYONIUM MARE, "that portion of the Corinthiacus Sinus lying between the promontory Antirrhium and the Megarean coast." Cram. Gr.

ALDUĀBIS. Vid. Dubis.

ALEA, a town of Arcadia, built by Aleus. It had three famous temples, that of Minerva, Bacchus, and Diana the Ephesian. When the festivals of Bacchus were celebrated, the women were whipped in the temple. Paus. 8, c. 23.

ALĒIUS CAMPUS, a place in Cilicia, between the rivers Pyramus and Sarus. Here it is said that Bellerophon fell from the horse Pegasus, and wandered over the country till the time of his death. Homer, Il. 6, v. 201.—Dionys. Perieg. 872.—Ovid. in Ibid. 257.

ALES. Vid. Hales.

ALĒSIA, or ALEXIA, a very important town of the Mandubii in Celtic Gaul, now Alise, in the old dukedom of Burgundy, on an eminence near the confluence of the Loze and the Oserain. Its antiquity extended as far back as the fabulous ages, and Diodorus refers its origin to Hercules. "Though there remains of this town but the name of Alise," says D'Anville, "it reminds us of one of the greatest achievements of Cæsar, and which may serve as an epoch of the subjugation of Gaul." Liv.—Cæs.—Diod.—Flor. 3, 10.

ALĒSIUM, a town and mountain of Peloponnesus. Paus. 8, c. 10.

ALEX, a river of the Brutii, in the present kingdom of Naples. It empties into that which was called the Siculum Mare, between the promontories Leucopetra on the east and Hercules on the west. It runs parallel with the Caecinus, and divides the Locri from the people of Rhegium, though some consider the Caecinus as the boundary. Strab.—Pausan.—Theoc.

ALEXANDRIA, I. the principal city of Egypt since the accession of the Ptolemies, founded by Alexander the Great A. C. 332. At first it was merely a military colony; but so well adapted was it to the purposes of commerce, that its population, composed of Egyptians, Alexandrians, (i. e. foreigners, of whom a large portion were Jews,) and mercenaries in the pay of the king, accumulated with astonishing rapidity. The city was founded to the west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, on the site of a more ancient place, called Rhacotis, which name continued to designate a part of the new town. The latter was situated on a peninsula, between the Mediterranean and the lake Mareotis. Its principal harbour was divided into two parts by a dyke (called from its length Hepta-stadium), which connected Pharos with the city. The quarter of the city called Bruchion, near the great harbour, contained the palaces, with the Museum, including the greater portion of the library, 400,000 volumes. This building remained unhurt till the reign of Aurelian, when it was destroyed during a civil commotion. The Serapion, or temple of Jupiter Serapis, a magnificent structure, containing the rest of the library, 300,000 volumes, was destroyed under Theodosius the Great, when all the heathen temples were by his edict devoted to ruin. Most of what had remained of the invaluable Alexandrian library perished. This work of devastation is usually, but erroneously, attributed to the Arabs under Omar. The chief remains of the splendid monuments of art, in which Alexandria abounded, are, 1. the Alexandrian Column, dedicated, according to the most received accounts, to Diocletian by a prefect called Pompeius, or, according to Clarke, who has decyphered the inscription, to Adrian by the prefect Posthumus: 2. Cleopatra's Needle, an obelisk of granite, with an inscription in hieroglyphics. There were originally two. 3. The relics of a magnificent colonnade, which extended between the gates of the Sun and Moon, and was regarded as one of the most striking ornaments of the city. For miles the suburbs of the modern town are covered with ruins, whose history is absolutely unknown. The commerce of Alexandria had three principal branches: 1. The commerce by land through Asia and Africa. 2. The commerce on the Mediterranean Sea. 3. The commerce on the Arabian Gulf or Indian Sea. The Asiatic and Mediterranean commerce Alexandria shared with other cities; the African it chiefly possessed; the Indian it monopolized. Ptolemy Philadelphus promoted the latter by establishing, on the Red Sea, the harbours Berenice and Myos Hormos, and by forming the road between Berenice and Coptos. The vast commercial advantages of Alexandria may be imagined, when we take into consideration the simple fact that, even when its government was the prey of Roman fraud and faction, its progress in wealth and luxury was still unretarded. Alexandria is no less interesting when viewed as the seat of literature and science than as the emporium of commerce. Ptolemy Lagus was he first protector of science in Egypt. "The Museum," says Heeren, (a learned academy) "was founded, and the first library in Bruchion (that in the Serapion is of later origin), probably under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus. We have no just estimate of the merits of the Museum. But what Academy of modern Europe has accomplished more?" Nearly all we have of ancient literature we owe to the Alexandrian school; and how much larger would our debt have been but for the destruction of the Museum and Serapion? The modern town, called Scanderia by the Franks, is built upon an accumulation of earth formed about the Hepta-Stadium. It is inconsiderable in extent if compared with the ancient city, its present population being less than 13,000. Its decline is chiefly owing to the diversion of its commerce, consequent upon the discovery of the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope. D'Anville.—Chaussard.—Heeren.—Russell's Egypt.—Cæsar, B. C. 112, &c.——II. A city situated at the extremity of a morass called Rahemah, formed by a canal derived from the right bank of the Euphrates below Babylon, and repaired by Alexander. This city was known by the name of Hira, when it became the residence of the Arabian princes who served the Persians and Parthians against the Romans, and were called Alamundari, after the name Al-Mondar, common to many of these princes at the fall of their dynasty in the first age of the Mahommedan. The body of Ali, who had been assassinated in Kufa, was interred in Hira; which, from the sepulchre of this Khalif, came to be called Meshed-Ali. D'Anville.——III. Another in Aria, on the Aria Palus, probably Corra. D'Anville.——IV. A town of Arachosia, which preserves the name of Scanderie of Arrokhage, though otherwise named Vaihend. D'Anville.——V. Another, founded by Alexander at the confluence of the Acesines and Indus. From the silence of modern travellers in regard to it, we may infer that the growth of the place, if it still exists, has borne no proportion to the great advantages of its situation in a commercial point of view, commanding the Indus and its tributaries. Chaussard.——VI. AD PAROPAMISUM, a town founded by Alexander at the foot of the Paropamisus, still a place of importance. The modern Quandahar, according to the opinion of D'Anville and Rennel, occupies the site of the ancient city. Chaussard.——VII. CATA ISSON, a town of Syria, near Issus, on the Issicus Sinus, and south of the Syriæ Pylæ. It is now called Alexandretta, or, by the Syrians, Scanderona. D'Anville.——VIII. OXIANA, a town of Bactriana, to the north-east of Bactra. The surname of Oxiana, which distinguishes its individuality, according to Ptolemy, authorizes the presumption of its being upon the Oxus. D'Anville.——IX. TROAS, a town of the Troad, which derived its name from Lysimachus, as a descendant of Alexander. Under the name of Old Constantinople it is considered as occupying the site of ancient Troy, and the Roman Itineraries distinguish it by the name of Ilium. Hence it received from the Romans considerable immunities. D'Anville——X. ULTIMA, a town built by Alexander upon the ruins of Cyreschata. The latter was built by Cyrus upon the Iaxartes in Sogdiana. Ultima answers in Latin to ἐσχατη, the termination of Cyreschata. Cogend on the Sihon (Iaxartes) answers to the ancient Alexandria. Chaussard.

ALEXANDRINA AQUA, baths in Rome, built by the emperor Alexander Severus.

ALEXANDROPŎLIS, a city of Parthia, built by Alexander the Great. Plin. 6, c. 25.

ALGĬDUM, a small place in Latium, on the Via Latina; probably the modern l'Osteria dell Agliò. Strab. 5.

ALGĬDUS MONS, the chain of mountains which stretched from the rear of the Alban mount, and is parallel to the Tusculan hills, being separated from them by the valley along which runs the Via Latina. The neighbourhood was the scene of numberless conflicts between the Roman armies and the Æqui and Volsci. It was consecrated to Diana and to Fortune. Cram. It. 2, 49—Ovid. Fast. 6, 721. —*Hor. ALĪFÆ, ALIFA, or ALIPHA, now Alife, a city of Samnium. It is noticed by Strabo as being in existence in his time. It was colonized under the triumvirs. Strab. 5.—Front. de Col.

ALILÆI, a people of Arabia Felix.

ALINDA, a town of Caria. Arrian.

ALIPHĒRA, a town of Arcadia on the Alpheus, remarkable for its strength of position. After the building of Megalopolis the Elians got possession of Aliphera, which they retained till it was wrested from them by Philip, in the Social War. The modern Nevoritza corresponds, probably, to the ancient Aliphera. Paus. Arcad.—Polyb.—Liv.

ALLIA, a small river in the country of the Sabines, descending from the Crustumine hills, is generally supposed to be the stream on which the Romans suffered their first great defeat, when the Gauls were on their march, under Brennus, to attack the capital. The engagement took place on the Via Salaria, about 11 miles from Rome; and the appearance of the ground is still said to confirm the account of the historian. The Dies Alliensis was, from the defeat of the army of the Republic, considered as a day of evil omen.

"Hæc est in fastis cui dat gratis allia nomen."
Ovid.—Liv. 5, 37.—Luc. 7.

ALLOBRŎGES, a warlike nation of Gaul near the Rhone, in that part of the country now called Savoy and Dauphiné, between the rivers Isaro and Rhone, and the lake Lemanus, lake of Geneva; having the Sequani on the north; on the east the Nantuates, the Veragri, and the Centrones; on the south, the Helvii and Valauni; and on the west, the Ambassi and Segusiani. The Romans destroyed their city because they had assisted Annibal. Their ambassadors were allured by great promises to join in Catiline's conspiracy against his country, but discovered the plot. Dio.—Strab. 4.—Tacit. 1. Hist. c. 66.—Sallust. in Jug. bell. D'Anville observes, that "the most considerable of the Allobroges, quitting their villages, formed the city of Vienna or Vienne, which was the capital of a great people before it became the metropolis of a province." They are also described as a scattered people, perfusa gens montibus; and it is remarked, that their successors, the inhabitants of Dauphiny, have fewer cities than any other people of France.

ALLOTRIGES, a nation on the southern parts of Spain. Strab.

ALMA, a river of Tuscany, by some supposed the modern Arbia. This river is much more celebrated for the battle which, in the middle ages, was fought there between the Tuscan Guelphs and Ghibelines, and in which the former were defeated with prodigious slaughter, than from any report coming down from antiquity. Ant. Iter. Ammirat.

ALMO, a small stream that empties into the Tiber near Rome. This river is much referred to by the poets, in connexion with the name of the goddess Cybele, whose image underwent an annual ablution in its waters on the sixth day before the kalends of April, (i. e. 25th March.) Ovid. Fast. 4, 337.—Claud. 15, 119.—Val. Flac. 8, 239.—Sil. It. 8, 363.

ALONE, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by a colony from Marseilles, not far from Alicant. It was remarkable for the abundance and the excellent quality of salt which it produced, and which, till recently, it continued to produce. It is now called Guardamar; the name given to it by the Moors was Tudemir. Mel.—Steph. Byzant.—Voss. Obs. ad Mel. There were many other insignificant places of the same name.

ALOPE. There were many towns in Greece of this name. One in Thessaly, perhaps the same as the Alitrope mentioned by Scylax. Hom.—Strab. Another of the Locri Ozolæ. Strab. And a third of the Locri Opuntii. Strab.

ALOPECE, I. an island in the Palus Mæotis Strab.——II. Another in the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Plin. 4, c. 12.——III. Another in the Ægean Sea, opposite Smyrna. Id. 5, c. 31.

ALOPECES, a small village of Attica, where was the tomb of Anchimolius, whom the Spartans had sent to deliver Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. Socrates and Aristides were born there. Æschin. contra. Timarch.—Herodot. 5, c. 64.

ALOS, or HALOS, called Phthioticum to distinguish it from another of the same name in Locris. It stood upon the coast, and there the army destined for the defence of Greece against Xerxes disembarked. The Amphyssus flowed just under its walls. There are said to be still a few remains of this ancient town. Herod.—Strab.—Demosth.—Cram. Gr.

ALPENUS, the capital of Locris, south of Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c. From this place Leonidas obtained the necessary supplies for his little army. Æschines calls it Alponus.

ALPES, the great mountain range of Europe, connected by its branches with all the middle and southern chains of that continent. They commence in the vicinity of Nice, and, stretching in the form of a crescent with the concave side towards Italy, they terminate, after a course of almost 700 miles, at the head of the Adriatic, over the ancient Absyrtides, merging there and a little to the north in the branches that connect them with the Carpathian mountains and the mountains of Greece. Till the time of the emperors the Romans were but little acquainted with the Alps, but the various roads which were then opened through their accessible passes rendered them more familiar to the citizens. The whole chain was then divided into, 1st. the Alpes MARITIMÆ, Littoreæ or Ligusticæ, deriving their name from their proximity to the sea, to the coast, or to the province of Liguria. This elevation commences a little to the east of the Var, near the town of Nice, not far from which the branch which constitutes the Appennines diverges from it. It separates Liguria from Narbonensis Secunda, the southern part of Gallia Provincia, now Provence, and reaches as far as the Mons Vesulus, Monte Viso, at the source of the Po, upon the borders of Cisalpine Gaul. The summit of the Alpes Maritimæ marked the limit between Gaul and Italy, and there Augustus erected a trophy, inscribed with the names of all the Gallic tribes subdued by him. It was the earliest passage used by the Romans, and that by which Cæsar entered Italy before engaging in the civil war. La Turbia now occupies the site upon which Augustus erected his trophy. 2d. The Alpes COTTIÆ, now mount Genevre, extending from the mons Vesulus to mount Cenis, between that part of Cisalpine Gaul which is Piedmont now, and the part of Gallia Narbonensis which is now Dauphiny. The name of this division of the Alps was derived from Cottius, a prince of certain Alpine tribes in those regions, over which he was permitted to enjoy the prefecture by Augustus. Tiberius allowed him to rule over them as sovereign. The Alpes Cottiæ did not become completely a Roman dependency till the time of the emperor Nero. 3d. The Alpes GRAIÆ, by the modern department of Isere, as far as the Col de Bon Homme, separating Savoy also on the west, from Piedmont, and the duchy of Aouste on the east. 4th. The Alpes PENNINÆ, from the Col de Bon Homme to the sources of the Rhone and the Rhine. The north-east extremity of this division, in which these rivers take their rise, was distinguished by the name of the Lepontine Alps, from the Lepontii, who were scattered among them. The Alpes Penninæ separated the Valais, Vallis Pennina on the north, from the Milanese upon the south, and extended as far as the mons Adula, the modern St. Gotherd. The Lepontine range runs through the country of the Grisons, and originates the Jura chain. 5th. The Alpes RHÆTIÆ, or the Tridentine Alps, extending from the Adula group to mount Brenner in the Tyrol, which it separates, in part, from Vindelicia. 6th. The Alpes NORICÆ, from mount Brenner to mount Glockner, and the sources of the river Piave. This is a German branch, and scarcely relates to Italian geography, passing between Carinthia and Noricum, and ending in the mons Cetius, which connects it with the mountains of Bohemia and the Carpathian hills. 7th. The CARNIC Alps, between Carinthia and Carniola, branching towards the south, and continuing in a south-east direction as far as the springs of the Save, where it declines into the Claudius mons and mountains of Slavonia. 8th. The Alpes JULIÆ, which, running south-east along the Save as the Carnic Alps accompany the line of the Drave, are lost at last in the Albius mons, on the borders of Illyricum, about the springs of the Kulpa, the ancient Colapis, near Æmona or Laybach. Other parts of the Alps were distinguished by particular names; as the Suabian Alps, which unite the chain with the Hungarian range. According to Justin, the first who penetrated these mighty barriers, after the fabulous passage of Hercules, were the Gauls, in their early migrations. An infinite number of these people occupied the Alpine regions long before the Romans became acquainted with their several passes; and from the time of the Gallic settlements the Alps remained inviolate till the memorable passage of Annibal, which admiration has converted into a fable. The passes known to the ancients were chiefly at three points through France and two through Germany. Those through France were, 1st. by the Ligurian coast, a defile too narrow to admit of the passage of numerous bodies; another over the Ginevre into Lombardy, by which Charles the Eighth entered Italy, and which was called the Roman way, as being the thoroughfare from Rome to France; and the third over mount Cenis, by which some pretend the army of Annibal entered. This pass leads at once to Aoust, the ancient Augusta Pretoria, and Lombardy. Through Germany, the passages were by the Valtoline, the country of the Grisons, over the Lepontine Alps, and through the Tyrol, by way of Inspruck and Trent, over the Rhætian Alps. In modern times the passes through this vast elevation were long the same, but now the principal roads are over the St. Gotherd, St. Bernard, and by the Simplon. The average height of the summits of this lofty region is from 10,000 to 15,000 feet; and after 7,000 or 8,000 commences a region of perpetual ice. Above an elevation of 10,800 feet the ice no longer appears, but from thence to the summit the mountain is covered with eternal snow. "The great depth of the Alpine lakes," says Malte-Brun, "is peculiar to these mountains; and one of them, the lake of Achen, is not less than 1800 feet in depth." Cram. It.—Mel.—Danv.—Plin.—Liv.—Amm.—Marcel.—Suet.—Heylin. Cosm.—Malte-Brun.

ALPHÆUS, now Alpheo, a river of Arcadia and Elis in Peloponnesus. It rises on the borders of Laconia, (which it separates from the territory of Tegea,) near the town of Phylace. The same spring supplies the Eurotas, which mingles with the Alpheus, and flows with it for a short distance till both disappear below the surface of the soil. The Alpheus emerges again at a place called Pēgæ, the sources, in the territory of Megalopolis, and passing by Leuctra in Arcadia in a north-west direction, it touches the borders of Elis, where it receives its great tributary, the Ladon. Here it turns almost directly west, and winding past Olympia, after receiving the Acheron, it falls into the Sicilian sea; after which, it is said by the poets to shew itself again near Syracuse in Sicily, and to mingle with the waters of Arethusa. Strab.—Virg.—Paus.—Mosch. Id.—Dionys. Perieg. 285. Vid. Arethusa, Part III.

ALPIS, a small river rising in the Rhætian Alps, and falling into the Danube.

ALSA, now the Ausa, according to D'Anville a river of Carniola. Constantine was slain in battle on its banks, by Constans his brother. Plin. 17, 18.

ALSIUM, an ancient town of Hetruria, the origin of which was ascribed to the Pelasgi. Its precise site was a spot called Statua, near Palo. Dion. Hal.—D'Anville.—Cram. An. Italy.

ALSUS, a river of Achaia in Peloponnesus, flowing from mount Sipylus. Paus. 7, c. 27.

ALTĪNUM, a flourishing city of Italy near Aquileia, famous for its wool. Martial. 14, ep. 25.—Plin. 3, c. 18. This town is first mentioned by V. Paterculus, and the period of its founding is unknown. It was afterwards surrounded with the villas of the rich, and presented an appearance so picturesque that it was compared to the celebrated and beautiful Baiæ of Campania by the later writers of the empire. Its exact situation is not known, but the tower of Altino on the right bank of the Silis, near its mouth, is considered by D'Anville as a relic of the ancient town. By others it is supposed to have occupied the site of the modern Ravenna. Plin. 3, 18.—Strab.—Tac.—Mel. 2, 4.—Vell. Pater. 2, 76.

ALTIS. Vid. Olympia.

ALUNTUM, now Alontio, a town of Sicily. Plin. 5, c. 8.—Cic. in Verr. 4—D'Anville. Dionys. Hal. mentions a town of the same name, which seems to correspond with the village of S. Filadelfo near Ætna, as ancient as the Trojan war.

ALUTA, a river of Dacia, rising in that part of the Carpathian mountains which lies between Moldavia and Austria, and flowing through the same mountains on the borders of Transylvania and Wallachia, to empty into the Danube (after passing near Hermanstadt in the former province) at Nicopolis. Its course to where it passes the mountains lies in the ancient Dacia, and afterwards in Mœsia. The modern name, the Olt, bears still some analogy to that which it bore in antiquity. D'Anville.

ALŸBA, a country near Mysia. Homer. Il. 2.

ALYSSUS, a fountain of Arcadia, whose waters could cure the bite of a mad dog. Paus. 8, c. 19.

ALYZIA, a town of Acarnania, on the western mouth of the Achelous, opposite to the Echinades. Cic. ad Fam. 16, ep. 2.

AMALTHĒUM, a public place which Atticus had opened in his country-house, called Amalthea, in Epirus, and provided with every thing which could furnish entertainment and convey instruction. Cic. ad Attic. 1. ep. 13.

AMANICÆ PYLÆ. Vid. Amanus.

AMANTIA, a town of Illyria, not far from the borders of Epirus, and belonging to the territory of Macedonia, in the greatest extent of that country. It is said that the Abantes of Phocis, on their return after the Trojan war, erected this city, which they called Abantia; and that this name was changed, many years afterwards, into Amantia. The inhabitants took part with Cæsar in the civil war, and their city was then considered as of considerable importance. The latest account of this place by an ancient writer, is that of Hierocles before the time of Justinian. It is said that a part of its ruins remain near the village of Nivitza, on a branch of the Aous, now the Voioussa. Paus.—Lycoph.—Cic.—Cæs.

AMĀNUS, a mountain separating Syria from Cilicia. It is a branch of the Taurus, and extends from Cappadocia, on the borders of Armenia Minor, to the Syriæ Pylæ, the Gates of Syria, on the Sinus Issicus. Above these are the Amanicæ Pylæ, through which defile Darius entered Cilicia. D'Anville calls the Amanus the Al-Lucan. Strab.—Plin.

AMARDI, a people who inhabited the mountains at the south of the Caspian Sea, near the river Amardus. Vossius supposed that the Persians used that name in general, to signify any lawless people who lived a predatory life; and D'Anville observes that they inhabited the country which afterwards harboured the famous assassins. Mela.—Voss. Obs. ad Mela.—D'Anville.

AMARDUS, a river of Media, now the Kezil Ozein. It rises near the base of the Orontes mountains, and pierces the high range that lines the southern coast of the Caspian. Pliny, 6, 13.

AMARYNTHUS, a village of Eubœa, whence Diana is called Amarysia, and her festivals in that town Amarynthia.—Eubœa is sometimes called Amarynthus. Paus. 1, c. 31.

AMAS, a mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3.

AMASĒNUS, a river flowing through the Pontine marshes, and said to have a principal effect in causing them. Virg. Æn.—Strab.

AMASIA, a principal city of Pontus on the Iris, about the centre of the province north and south. Strabo, who was born there, describes it as built in the valley lying between the Lycus and the Iris, which unite considerably to the north of the town. Strab.—Plin.

AMASTRIS, a city of Paphlagonia, on the Euxine Sea. Catull. Most probably the Sesamus of Homer. It took the name of Amastris at a late period, in honour of the niece of Darius Codomanus. It was remarked for its beauty in the time of Trajan. Strab.—Plin.

AMĀTHUS, I. Limmedon antica, according to D'Anville, a city on the southern side of the island of Cyprus, particularly dedicated to Venus. The island is sometimes called Amathusia, a name not unfrequently applied to the goddess of the place. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 51.—Ptol. 5, c. 14.—II. A fortress at the head of the Campus Magnus, east of Jordan, the site of the modern Asselt. Here was established by Gabinius, proconsul of Syria, one of the five juridical conventions of Judea. It was remarkable for its strength. Jos.

AMAZONIA. Vid. Amazones, Part III.

AMAZONIUM, a place in Attica, where Theseus obtained a victory over the Amazons.

AMBARRI, a people of Gallia Celtica, on the Arar, related to the Ædui. Cæs. bell. G. 1, c. 11. The modern name of the place in which they dwelt is Bresse, in the department de L'Ain. They were surrounded by the Allobroges, the Edui, and the Helvetii; and, according to Livy, they attempted settlements in Italy as early as the age of the Tarquins. Liv. 5, 34.

AMBĒNUS, a mountain of European Sarmatia, on the Euxine, near Ophiusa. Flacc. 6, v. 86.

AMBIĀNUM, a town of Belgium, now Amiens, its inhabitants conspired against J. Cæsar. Cæs. bell. G. 2, c. 4.

AMBIATĪNUM, a village of Germany, where the emperor Caligula was born. Sueton. in Cal. 8.

AMBRACIA, a celebrated city of Epirus, on the Arachthus, near the gulf to which it gives its name. The period at which it was founded is unknown; but it did not rise to great importance till the arrival of a Corinthian colony about 650 years B. C. Its early forms of government were various; but about the time of the Persian war it had taken its place among the most respectable of the smaller republics. In the Peloponnesian war it took an active part, and was distinguished for its frequent and vigorous attempts to extend its authority by conquest and territorial acquisition. When Philip of Macedon began to turn his arms against Greece, Ambracia appears to have been deprived by him of its independence; soon after which it fell into the hands of Pyrrhus, who made it the royal residence, and enriched and adorned it at a great expense. It was always remarkable for the spirit and gallantry of the inhabitants; and Thucydides observes that no people of Greece, in all the Peloponnesian war, sustained, in the same space of time, so great and universal a slaughter as the Ambraciots at Olpæ. Many years afterwards they distinguished themselves in a siege which they sustained against the Romans with unequalled perseverance. Augustus transferred the inhabitants to Nicopolis, and Ambracia speedily fell into decay; so that as early as the time of the Byzantine historians Cantacuzenus and Acropolita, the town of Arta appears to have already arisen on its site. Dionys. Hal.—Herodot.—Thuc.—Liv.—Polyb.—Cram.

AMBRACIUS SINUS, a gulf or bay of that part of the Ionian which was called the Sicilian sea, lying between Epirus on the north and Acarnania on the south. At its mouth it is but about 5-8 of a mile in width, but, expanding inland, it extends about 12 miles, making a circuit of 36 miles. The name of Ambracius was applied to this basin as early as the time of Orpheus, or the writer of the poems ascribed to him. Polyb. 5, 63.—Strab. 7, 325.—Cram. Gr.

AMBRŌNES, certain nations of Gaul, who lost their possessions by the inundation of the sea, and lived upon rapine and plunder. They were conquered by Marius. Plut. in Mario.

AMBRYSSUS, a very ancient city of Phocis, to the south-west of the mountain Parnassus. It was destroyed by the Amphictyons, and rebuilt by the Corinthians. Its ruins are still visible. Paus.—Cram.

AMENANUS, a river of Sicily, near mount Ætna, now Guidicello. Strab. 5.

AMERIA, a city of Umbria. This town, now the inconsiderable village of Amelia, was one of the finest and most ancient of Umbria. Cicero, Virgil, and Silius Italicus have in different manners celebrated this place, and secured it a lasting memory. It was the birth-place of Roscius, and could boast a greater antiquity than Rome. Strab.—Cic. pro Ros.—Virg. Georg. 1, 462.—Plin. 3, 14.

AMESTRĀTUS, a town of Sicily, near the Halesus. The Romans besieged it for seven months, and it yielded, at last, after a third siege, and the inhabitants were sold as slaves. Polyb. 1, c. 24.

AMĪDA, a city of Mesopotamia, besieged and taken by Sapor, king of Persia. Ammian. 10. It stood on a lofty eminence on the Tigris, bordering on the Armenian territory, as that territory stood curtailed in the middle ages by the extension of Mesopotamia on the north. It is the modern Kara Amid, in the district of Diar-Bekir. It was called Constantia for a short time during the reigns of some of the successors of Constantine, and has probably had many other names. D'Anville.

Amĭlos, or Amĭlus, I. a river of Mauritania, where the elephants go to wash themselves by moonshine. Plin. 8, c. 1.——II. A town of Arcadia. Paus. in Arcad.

Aminēi, I. a people of Campania, who occupied, according to Macrobius, the territory subsequently the Falernian. Virgil, however, clearly distinguishes between the Falernian and Aminean vines; and Martorelli places both the Aminean and Falernian hills above Naples, towards Puteoli. Those who attribute to the Thessalians the introduction of the vine into Italy consider the Aminei of Thessalian origin. Virg. Geo. 2, 95.—Heyne, ad loc.—Macrob. Sat. 2, 16.—Martorell. I. Fenici, &c.—— II. A place of Thessaly.

Amiseus, or Amisēnus sinus, a bay of the Euxine Sea on the Pontic coast. The encroachment of the waters of the sea by this bay on the north, and a similar inroad of the Issicus Sinus on the south, give to the eastern part of Asia Minor the character of an isthmus, and to the whole the form and name of a peninsula. Strab. —Plin.—Cram.

Amisia, the river Ems. D'Anville writes Amisus.

Amisus, a town of Asia Minor, east of the Halys, "a Greek city," says D'Anville, "but which, subjected in the sequel to the kings of Pontus, was aggrandised by Mithridates with a quarter called from the surname that he bore, Eupatoria; and Samsoun, as it is now called, preserves the ancient site." D'Anville.

Amiternum, "whose ruins are to be seen near Vittorino, a few miles to the north of Aquila, was a Sabine city of great antiquity. Under the Romans it became successively a præfectura and a colony, as we are informed by Frontinus and several inscriptions. In Ptolemy's time. Amiternum seems to have been included among the cities of the Vestini." Cramer's It.

Ammon. Vid Hammon.

Ammōnii, a nation of Africa, who derived their origin from the Egyptians and Æthiopians. Their language was a mixture of that of the two people from whom they were descended. The modern Lantriah probably represents the ancient Ammonia. D'Anville.—Herodot. 2, 3, and 4.

Ammonis promontorium, a promontory on the west side of the Syrtis Minor, to the north of Thena. Strab. 834.

Ammonitis, a country of Arabia Petræa, occupied by the children of Ammon, whence the name. The principal city was called Ammon, and Rabbath-Ammon, or the Great Ammon, before the name of Philadelphia was given to it. D'Anville.

Amnias, a river of Bithynia. Appian. de bell. Mithr.

Amnīsus, the port of Gnossus, at the north of Crete, with a small river of the same name, near which Lucina had a temple. The nymphs of the place were called Amnisiades. Callim.

Amorgos, now Amorgo, one of the Sporades, situated to the south-east of Naxos. It contained three towns, named Arcesine, Ægialus, and Minoa. Minoa was the birth-place of Simonides, an Iambic poet mentioned by Strabo and others. Amorgos gave its name to a peculiar linen dress manufactured in the island. Cram.—Strab.

Amorium, near the Sangarius in Galatia, was a considerable city when it was taken and sacked by the Caliph Motasem, A. D. 837.

Amorrhæi, or Amorites. Vid Amorrhitis.

Amorrhitis, the country of the Amorrhæi, in Peræa of Judea, situate, according to Josephus, between three rivers, the Arnon on the south, the Jabok on the north, and the Jordan on the west.

Ampĕlus, I. a promontory of the peninsula which lies between the Soronaic and Singitic gulfs. Pliny calls it the Soronean promontory. Herod. 7, 122.—Liv. 31, 45.——II. Another, of Crete, now Cape Sacro. Pliny assigns to Crete a town of that name; and there are, in fact some ruins between the mouth of the river Sacro and the promontory. Cram.——III. A promontory of Samos. Also a ridge of mountains that crossed that island. Strab.

Ampelūsia, a promontory of Africa, in Mauritania, with a town of the same name, not far from the river Lixus, near the Straits of Gibraltar. Plin.—Mela, 4. c. 5 and 6.

Amphaxitis, a district of the Macedonian province Mygdonia. It was situated near the Axius, and on its left bank, since Strabo, in the Epit. states that the Axius separated Bottiæa from Amphaxitis. Cram.

Amphēa, a city of Messenia, taken by the Lacedæmonians. Paus. 4, c. 5.

Amphiarai fons, I. a fountain and baths named after Amphiaraus, near his temple—— II. Templum, was 12 stadia from Oropus, and not far from the sea. The oracle of Amphiaraus was of considerable antiquity and reputation. It was consulted by Crœsus, also by Mardonius. Livy speaks of the temple of Amphilochus near Oropus; meaning, probably, that of Amphiaraus. But it would seem from Pausanias that Amphilochus shared the honours paid to the latter. Cram.—Herod. 1. 48; 8, 134.—Liv. 42, 27.

Amphicæa, or Amphiclea, a town of Phocis, sixty stadia from Lilæa. Its name is said to have been changed, by a decree of the Amphictyons, to Ophitea; but the former appellation is always employed by historians. Herodotus says Amphicæa was ruined by the Persians. Its site is commonly supposed to correspond with that of Dadi, a populous Greek town standing on a gentle elevation at the foot of Parnassus. Cram.—Paus.—Herod. 8, 33.

Amphigenīa, a town which, according to Homer, belonged to Nestor, was assigned by some critics to Messenia, by some to Triphylia. It was situated near the river Hypsœis, and possessed a temple of Latona. Cram. Il.—B. 593. —Strab.

Amphilochia. Vid. Argos.

Amphipŏlis, a town on the Strymon, between Macedonia and Thrace. An Athenian colony under Agnon, son of Nicias, drove the ancien mhabitants, called Edonians, from the country, and built a city, which they called Amphipolis, i. e. a town surrounded on all sides, because the Strymon flowed all around it. It has been also called Acra, Strymon, Myrica, Eion, and the town of Mars. It was the cause of many wars between the Athenians and Spartans. Thucyd. 4, c. 102, &c.—Herodot. 5, c. 126, l. 7. c. 114.—Diod. 11, 12, &c.—C. Nep. in Cim. In the Peloponnesian war Amphipolis was taken by the Lacedæmonians under Brasidas. Many circumstances combine, besides its own importance, to render the name of Amphipolis interesting. The loss of this place to the Athenians caused the banishment of Thucydides; and the loss of Brasidas to Sparta was accompanied by the death of Cleon, a cause of scarcely less congratulations to Athens. The Amphipolitans from this time chose to remain in the interest of Sparta, and the Athenians never regained their authority among them. When the Romans spread their empire over these regions, Amphipolis constituted the chief place of the conquered territory. Its ruins are discernible near a spot called Jenikevi. "The position of Amphipolis is one of the most important in Greece. It stands in a pass which traverses the mountains bordering the Strymonic gulf, and it commands the only easy communication from the coast of that gulf into the great Macedonian plains. The Strymon, after emerging from a large lake, makes a half circuit in a deep gorge round the hill of Amphipolis, and from thence crosses a plain of two or three miles in width, to the sea." Leake.—Thuc.—Demosth.

Amphissa, or Issa, I. a town of the Brutii on the east coast.——II. A town of the Locri Ozolæ, at the head of the Crissæan gulf. This city was destroyed after the Persian war by order of the Amphictyons, for rebuilding the walls of Crissa and cultivating its fields which were sacred. Amphissa was but about seven miles distant from Delphi. Its citadel or acropolis still remains near the modern town of Salona, "closing up the great Crissæan plain, through which a defile leads towards the Cephissus and the straits of Thermopylæ." Hughes.—Paus.—Plin. 4, 2.—Cram.

Amphissène, a country of Armenia.

Amphrysus, a river of Thessaly, near which Apollo, when banished from heaven, fed the flocks of king Admetus. From this circumstance the god has been called Amphryssius, and his priestess Amphryssia. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 580.—Lucan. 6, v. 367.—Virg. G. 3, v. 2. Æn. 6, v. 398.

Ampsaga, a river of Numidia, which falls into the Mediterranean at Tucca, and separates Numidia from Mauretania. It is now the Suffegmar, a river of Algiers. Mela, 1, 6, 2.

Amsancti, lacus et vallis, a lake and valley in Samnium, by which Virgil represents the fury descending to the infernal regions. Some antiquaries have confounded this spot with the lake of Cutiliæ; but Servius distinctly tells us that it was situated in the country of the Hirpini, which is confirmed by Cicero and Pliny. The latter writer mentions a temple consecrated to the goddess Mephitis on the banks of this lake, of which a good description is given by Romanelli. Cram. It. 2, 251.—Æn. 7, 563.—Cic. de Div. 1.—Plin. 2, 93.

Amycī portus, a place in Pontus, famous for the death of Amycus king of the Bebryces. His tomb was covered with laurels, whose boughs, as is reported, when carried on board a ship, caused uncommon dissentions among the sailors. Plin. 5, c. 32.—Arrian.

Amyclæ, I. a town of Italy between Caieta and Tarracina, built by the companions of Castor and Pollux. The inhabitants were strict followers of the precepts of Pythagoras, and therefore abstained from flesh. They were killed by serpents, which they thought impious to destroy, though in their own defence. Plin. 8, c. 29. Once a report prevailed in Amyclæ that the enemies were coming to storm it; upon which the inhabitants made a law, that forbade such a report to be credited, and when the enemy really arrived, no one mentioned it, or took up arms in his own defence, and the town was easily taken. From this circumstance the epithet of tacitæ has been given to Amyclæ. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 564.—Syl. 8, v. 529.——II. A city of Peloponnesus, built by Amyclas. Castor and Pollux were born there. The country was famous for dogs. Apollo, called Amyclæus, had a rich and magnificent temple there, surrounded with delightful groves. Paus. 3, c. 18. —Stat. Theb. 4, v. 223.—Strab. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 345.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2, v. 5. The ruins of this place are said to be more extensive than those of the ancient capital of Laconia.

Amydon, a city of Pæonia, in Macedonia, which sent auxiliaries to Priam during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2. Vid. Part III.

Anacium, a mountain with a temple sacred to the Anaces, in Attica. Polyæn. 1, c. 21.

Anactoria and Anactorium, I. a town of Acarnania, situated on a low neck of land opposite to Nicopolis, of which it was the emporium. The present site is now called Punta, which many antiquaries have erroneously identified with Actium. Anactorium was colonized jointly by the Corcyreans and Corinthians, the latter of whom afterwards obtained sole possession of the settlement by unfair means. They were subsequently ejected by the Acarnanians, who occupied the place in conjunction with the Athenians. Augustus carried the inhabitants to the city of Nicopolis after the battle of Actium. Strab. 10.—Thucyd. 1, c. 55. Plin. 4, c. 1, l. 5, c. 29.——II. An ancient name of Miletus.

Anactorius sinus, now the bay of Prevesa, on which the battle of Actium was fought.

Anagnia, now Anagni, the principal city of the Hernici. Here the general assembly of the nation was convened. Virgil styles it "dives," and Strabo terms it "an important city." In its last war with Rome its own laws were set aside, and it received in exchange the Roman code; justice being administered by a deputy of the prætor. In other words, it became a præfectura. Cicero terms it municipium ornatissimum. It was colonized by Drusus. Cram. It. 2, 79.—Liv. 9, 43.—Æn. 7, 684.—Strab. 5.—Cic. pro Dom. 30, and Mil. 1.—Front. de Col.

Anamanni, a people of Cisalpine Gaul, whose name is sometimes written Ananes, Anamanes, and even Andres. They occupied a small district, intersected by numerous streams flowing from the Appenines. Cram.—Polyb.

Anaphe, an island that rose out of the Cre-tan sea, and received this name from the Argonauts, who, in the middle of a storm, suddenly saw the new moon. Apollo was worshipped there, and called Anaphæus. Apollonius.

ANAPHLYSTUS, now Anaphiso, a town of Attica of some note, with a harbour and fortifications.

ANĂPUS, I. a river of Acarnania, which empties into the Achelous. Cram.——II. Of Sicily, near Syracuse.

ANARTES, a people adjoining the Dacians, whose territory, answering to part of Transylvania, bordered on the Tibiscus, now the Theiss. Cæs. B. G. 6, 25.

ANAS, now the Guadiana, a river of Spain, which rises in Tarraconensis, and, after flowing in a westerly direction past Metallinum and Emerita Augusta, turns to the south and discharges itself into the Atlantic, forming, in the latter part of its course, the boundary between that part of Lusitania which was called Cuneus, and Bætica. Pliny informs us, that at a short distance from its source this river is lost in marshes, then is contracted into a narrow stream, after which it flows under ground, till re-appearing, it continues its course to the Atlantic. Plin. 3, 1.

ANATOLIA, a name used to designate that part of Asia vulgarly known as Asia Minor. It is commonly met with under the corrupted form of Natolia. Under the lower empire, this country was divided into prefectures, called Themata; and we find a Thema Anatolicum, (from ἀνατολὴ, the east,) i. e. easterly from Constantinople, the imperial residence. The Turks retain the form Anadoli, which, as applied to one of their pachalics, does not quite fill up the space within the limits of Asia Minor. D'Anville.

ANAURUS, I. a river of Thessaly, near the foot of mount Pelion, where Jason lost one of his sandals. Callim in Dian.——II. A river of Troas, near Ida. Coluth.

ANCALITES, a people of Britain, near the Trinobantes. Cæs. Bell. G. 5. c. 21.

ANCHESMUS, a mountain of Attica, where Jupiter Anchesmius had a statue.

ANCHĂLE, and ANCHIALA, a city on the seacoast of Cilicia. Sardanapalus, the last king of Assyria, built it, with Tarsus in its neighbourhood, in one day. Strab. 14.—Plin. 5, c. 27.

ANCHĪSIA, a mountain of Arcadia, at the bottom of which was a monument of Anchises. Paus. 8, c. 12 and 13.

ANCHOE, a place near the mouth of the Cephicus, where there is a lake of the same name. Strab.

ANCON, and ANCŌNA, a town of Picenum, built by the Sicilians, with a harbour in the form of a crescent or elbow (ἀγκὼν), on the shores of the Adriatic. Near this place is the famous chapel of Loretto, supposed by monkish historians to have been brought through the air by angels, August 10, A. D. 1291, from Judæa, where it was a cottage, inhabited by the virgin Mary. The reputed sanctity of the place has often brought 100,000 pilgrims in one day to Loretto. Although Strabo attributes the foundation of Ancona to Syracusan exiles in the reign of Dionysius, still it is probable the place is of greater antiquity, as Scylax mentions it as belonging to the Umbri, and Pliny to the Siculi. In Trajan's time it was a port of importance. Its purple dye is celebrated by Italicus. According to Catullus, Venus was the favourite deity of the place. Cram.—Strab. 5.—Catull. 36.—Plin. 3. c. 13.—Lucan. 2. v. 402.—Ital. 8, v. 437.

ANCŸRA, a town of Galatia among the Tectosages, or, according to others, of Phrygia. Both accounts are, in fact, true; the error lies in not distinguishing between the condition of the country at the period of Alexander's invasion, when Ancyra was a town of Phrygia Major, and its altered state at the time Arrian wrote, when part of Phrygia had taken the name of Galatia from the Gauls who occupied it about 250 B. C. According to the testimony of Q. Curtius and Arrian, Alexander marched from Gordium to Ancyra; so that the account of the former writer, who represents him as entering Paphlagonia, cannot be correct, as he must have passed to the right of that region, since he advanced by Ancyra to Cappadocia. Ancyra received many favours from Augustus, and the modern Angoura still preserves a magnificent inscription, reciting the principal circumstances of the life of that prince. It was near this city that Bajazet was made prisoner by Timour. Chaussard.—D'Anville.—Q. Curt.—Arrian.

ANCŸRÆ, a town of Sicily, to the west of Agrigentum, on the Halycus, above Heraclea, which stood at its mouth.

ANDANIA, a town of Messenia, on the Arcadian frontier, a capital city before the domination of the Heraclidæ. Sir W. Gell observed its ruins between Saliona and Krano. Cram.

ANDECAVI, and ANDEGAVI. Vid. Andes.

ANDES, I. a tribe of Gallia Lugdunensis, to the north of the Ligeris. The Meduana flows through their territory, and near its mouth stands Juliomagus, the capital. Their territory is the modern Anjou. The name is otherwise Andecavi and Andegavi. D'Anville.—Cæs. 2, Bell. Gall. c. 35.——II. A village of Italy, near Mantua, where Virgil was born, hence Andinus. Ital. 8, v. 595.

ANDRICLUS, I. a mountain of Cilicia. Strab. 14.——II. A river of Troas, falling into the Scamander. Plin. 5, c. 27.

ANDROS, an island in the Ægean Sea, known by the different names of Epagrys, Antandros, Lasia, Cauros, Hydrussa, Nonagria. Its chief town was called Andros. It had a harbour near which Bacchus had a temple, with a fountain, whose waters during the ides of January, tasted like wine. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 648—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 80.—Juv. 3, v. 70.—Plin. 2. c. 103.—Mela, 1 and 2. The Andrians were compelled by Xerxes to join his armament, and were, therefore, after the termination of the war in Greece, reduced to the situation of a dependency by the Athenians. The modern name of the island is Andro, and, "though very fertile, it contains a population of less than 12,000. It is well watered, and its mountains are covered with forests." Herodot.—Thuc.—Malte-Brun.

ANELON, a river near Colophon. Paus. 8, c. 28.

ANGĪTES, a river of Thrace, falling into the Strymon. Herodot. 7, c. 113.

ANGLI, a people of Germany, at the north of the Elbe, from whom, as being a branch of the Saxons, the English have derived their name. Tacit. G. 40. They were not among those people, by whom, in its decline, the Roman empire was so frequently harassed. Writers of those times confounded them generally with the Chauci, Catti, and Cherusci, who dwelt on either side of the Weser as far as the Elbe or the Ems, and consequently west of the Cimbric Chersonese, the eastern corner of which (now Holstein), by the Little Belt and the gulf of Lubeck, was inhabited by the Angli. In the 5th century they united with the Saxons in the conquest of Britain, and settled themselves in that part of the island which took from them the name of East Anglia. Danv.—Heyl. Cosm. —Thierry, Hist. Eng.

Anguitia, a wood in the country of the Marci, between the lake Fucinus and Alba. Serpents, it it said, could not injure the inhabitants, because they were descended from Circe, whose power over these venomous creatures has been much celebrated. Sil. 8.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

Anicium, a town of Gaul. Cæs. Bell. Gal. 7.

Anigrus, now the Sidero, a river of Elis, which rises in the Lapitha mons of Arcadia, and has no visible outlet. For want of a descent to carry off the water, it forms into marshes, the miasma from which infects the country around it. In the time of Pausanias the whole district as far as the source of the river, was equally impregnated with this malaria. The fable of the Centaurs having infected the waters of this stream by washing in it the wounds inflicted by the poisoned arrows of Hercules, was founded upon this fact in the physical history of the country. The river was nevertheless supposed to possess medicinal properties, and to be under the protection of the nymphs called Anigrides. By some writers this river is thought to be the Minyeius, which belongs to the same region. Paus.—Hom. Il.—Cram.

Anio, and Anien, now Teverone, a river of Italy, flowing through the country of Tibur, and falling into the river Tiber about five miles at the north of Rome. At Tibur the Anio forms a cataract. This river was formerly made to contribute water for the supply of the capitol. This was first effected by M. Curius Dentatus, the censor, A. U. C. 471, who defrayed the undertaking with the spoils of Pyrrhus. The aqueduct was called Anio Vetus. The Anio Novus or Aqua Claudia, was an improvement upon these old works made under the reign of Claudian. Cram.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 3, v. 20.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 683.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 13. —Plut. de Fort. Rom.

Anopæa, a mountain and road near the river Asopus. Herodot. 7, c. 216.

Ansibarii, a people of Germany, in the neighbourhood of the Chauci, on the left bank of the Weser. Cluv.—Tacit. Ann. 13, v. 55.

Antandros, now St. Dimitri, a city of Troas, inhabited by the Leleges, near which Æneas built his fleet after the destruction of Troy. It has been called Edonis, Cimmeris, Assos, and Apollonia. There is a hill in its neighbourhood called Alexandreia, where Paris sat, as some suppose, when the three rival goddesses appeared before him when contending for the prize of beauty. Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 6.—Mela. 1, c. 18.

Antemnæ, a city of the Sabines on the Anio, built by the Aborigines, or, according to Dion. Hal. by the Siculi. This city was older than Rome, and among those which first resorted to arms upon the rape of the Sabine women. Near this place the younger Manlius forfeited his life by accepting the challenge of the gigantic Gaul. Dion. Hal.—Virg. Æn. 7.—Liv. 1, 10, and 7, 6.

Anthēdon, a city of Bœotia, which receives its name from the flowery plains that surround it. In this place was a temple of Proserpine, and also of the most ancient of the deities of Greece, the mysterious Cabiri. The inhabitants were principally fishermen, and are said to have pretended that they came from the marine god Glaucus. Paus.—Lycoph.—Cram. Gr.

Anthele, a small village between the Phœnix, a stream that falls into the Azopus, and Thermopylæ. "Close to this spot," says Cramer, "is the temple of Ceres, that of Amphictyon, and the seat of the Amphictyons." Herodot. 7, 200.—Strab. 7.—Paus.

Anthēmis, the same as Samos. Strab. 10.

Anthemusia, a city of Mesopotamia, of comparatively recent date, as its name was borrowed from that of the Macedonian Anthemus. Strab.

Anthēne, a town of Argolis. Thucyd. 5, c. 41.

Anticrāgus, a mountain of Lycia, opposite Mount Cragus. Strab. 4.

Anticyra, two towns of Greece, the one in Phocis, and the other near mount Oeta, both famous for the hellebore which they produced. This plant was of infinite service to cure diseases, and particularly insanity; hence the proverb Naviget Anticyram. Paus. 10, c. 36.—Persius, 4, v. 16.—Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 3, v. 53.

Antigonia, I. an inland town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.——II. One of Macedonia, founded by Antigonus, son of Gonatus. Id. 4, c. 10. ——III. One in Syria, on the borders of the Orontes. Strab. 16.——IV. Another in Bithynia, called also Nicæa. Id. 12.——V. Another in Arcadia, anciently called Mantinea. Paus. 8, c. 8.——VI. One of Troas in Asia Minor. Strab. 13.

Antilibānus, a mountain of Syria, opposite mount Libanus, near which the Orontes flows. Strab.—Plin. 5, c. 20.

Antiochia, Epi-Daphne, I. a city of Syria, situated on the Orontes near its mouth, and now called Antakia. It was commenced by Antigonus, and from him called Antigonia; but completed by Seleucus, after he had defeated Antigonus at the battle of Issus. It was built near the ruins of an ancient city, called (2 Kings) Ribbah, in the land of Hameth; by Josephus, Rablata. It was called Epi-Daphne from its proximity to Daphne, which was lower down on the Orontes, and at length formed a suburb to the city. When the Christian religion became predominant, Antioch received the name of Theopolis, or The Divine City. Here the disciples were first called Christians. This city was for many ages the royal seat of the kings of Syria, and during the prosperity of the Roman empire, the residence of the prefect of the Eastern Province, and afterwards of the Præfectus prætorio Orientis, whose jurisdiction extended over Thrace, Asia, Pontus, and Egypt. It was the residence of many of the Roman emperors, and also the seat of the patriarch. After changing masters frequently during the holy wars, it at length fell into the hands of Saladin, and thenceforth rapidly declined. Though almost depopulated, a great part of the ancient walls still remain as a monument of its former grandeur. Heylin.—D'Anville.—2 Kings, 23, 33.—Acts, 11, 26.——II. A city called also Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, built by Seleucus, son of Antiochus.——III. The capital of Pisidia, 92 miles at the east of Ephesus.——IV. A city on mount Cragus.——V. Another near the river Tigris, 25 leagues from Seleucia, on the west. ——VI. Another in Margiana, called Alexandria and Seleucia.——VII. Another near mount Taurus, on the confines of Syria.——VIII. Another of Caria, on the river Meander.

Antipăros, a small island in the Ægean Sea, opposite Paros, from which it is about six miles distant.

Antipătris, a city of Samaria, built by Herod in memory of his father Antipater, 15 miles distant from Lydda, and 26 from Cæsarea. The village which existed before the building of the city on the same spot, was called Chabarzaba.

Antiphili portus, a harbour on the African side of the Red Sea. Strab. 16.

Antipŏlis, a city of Gaul, built by the people of Marseilles. Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 15.

Antirrhium, a promontory of Ætolia, opposite Rhium in Peloponnesus, whence the name. It was also called Rhium Ætolicum, and Rhium Molycrium. Together with the promontory of Rhium on the Achaian coast, it closed the Sinus Corinthiacus upon the west, allowing but a passage of about a mile in width, through which the waters of this gulf pass into the Sinus Patræ. On the Ætolian side stood a temple of Neptune, and on both are now erected fortresses, whence, according to D'Anville, their present name of the Dardanelles of Lepanto. Strab. 8.—Thucyd.—Cram. Gr.

Antitaurus, one of the branches of mount Taurus, which runs in a north-east direction through Cappadocia, towards Armenia and the Euphrates.

Antium, a maritime town of Italy, built by Ascanius, or, according to others, by a son of Ulysses and Circe, upon a promontory 32 miles from Ostium. It was the capital of the Volsci, who made war against the Romans for above 200 years. Camillus took it, and carried all the beaks of their ships to Rome, and placed them in the forum on a tribunal, which from thence was called Rostrum. Horat. 1, od. 35.—Liv. 8, c. 14. The town itself (now Anzo) had no harbour; but all its maritime and naval affairs were conducted by means of the neighbouring port Ceno. Antium and the Antiates occupy a considerable space in the history of Rome. From this city Coriolanus marched against this country to punish the ingratitude of his countrymen; and here the Roman Senate conferred on Augustus the prostituted title of father of his country. Several of the emperors in later days made Antium their residence, and Nero was born within its walls. It did not lay aside its hostility to Rome, notwithstanding the frequent Roman colonies that settled there, till the privileges of citizenship being awarded to its inhabitants, it seemed rather to share than to be subject to the Roman power and empire. Its magnificence and taste are attested by the remains of antiquity, and particularly by the Apollo Belvidere discovered among its perishing remains. Dion. Hal. 9, 56.—Suet. —Cram. Gr.

Antonia, a castle of Jerusalem, which received this name in honour of M. Antony. It was Herod, who, having fortified this castle so that a whole legion might be defended within it, assigned to it the name of Antonia in compliment to Antony.

Antoniopŏlis, a city of Mesopotamia. Marcell. 8.

Anxur, called also Tarracina, a city of the Volsci, taken by the Romans, A. U. C. 348. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 26. Lucan. 3. v. 84. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 799.

Anydros, one of the two summits of mount Hymettus, sometimes called also the Dry Hymettus.

Anzăbas, a river of Assyria near the Tigris. Marcel. 18.

Aŏnes, the inhabitants of Aonia, called afterwards Bœotia. They were probably anterior to that which is called the arrival of Cadmus, and may have been a branch of the primitive tribes of semi-barbarians who occupied the countries of Greece, even at that period with which the received traditions of history commence. The muses have been called Aonides, because Aonia was more particularly frequented by them. Paus. 9, c. 3.—*Ovid. Aonia, one of the ancient names of Bœotia.

Aornos, Aornus, Aornis, I. a town of India, situate upon a high and almost inaccessible rock near the springs of the Indus, towards the borders of Bactriana the present Cabul, and at the base of that part of the Asiatic range of mountains called by the ancients the Taurus, which, with the name of Embodi, stretched to the north-east and separated India from the nearer Scythia. This town cost Alexander great pains in its reduction, which, perhaps, would not have been of such pressing importance to him, but for the tradition which excited his vanity in reporting that Hercules himself had been foiled in the attempt to accomplish the taking of the place. According to D'Anville it is now Tchekin-kot, or Renas.——II. Another, in Bactriana, near the source of the Oxus, also taken by Alexander. Its modern name is Telchan. Arr. —D'Anville.

Aous, or Æas, now the Voiousa, a river of Illyria, which rises in the Pindus chain of mountains, and, passing by Apollonia, empties into the Adriatic Sea, not far from the island of Saso. The river crosses the defiles of Kleissoura the ancient Aoi Stena. "The situation of this town is singular in the extreme. It lies at a considerable height up the mountain, which is a rock totally bare of cultivation, and above it appears a large fortress, built upon the very edge of a precipice more than 1000 feet in perpendicular height. Looking down, we beheld the Aous still chafing its channel between two tremendous walls of Rock, which scarcely leave room for the river and the narrow road that runs along its side." Pouqueville informs us that the flames which, according to the ancients, used to issue in the midst of streams and verdant meadows from extensive beds of fossil pitch at the confluence of the Aous and the Suchista are at present very rare. Vid. Nymphæum. Aristot.—Strab.—Hughes.—Malte-Brun.

Apamia, or Apamea, now Amphion Karahisar, a city of Phrygia in Asia Minor, situate either on the Meander, at its confluence with the Marsyas, or in that immediate region. Its ancient designation of Cibotos, a coffer, was applied to it from the quantity of wares which were deposited and collected there to be exported from Asia Minor, or to be distributed through that peninsula. It was, next to Ephesus, the most commercial city lying between the Mediterranean, the Euxine, and the Ægean seas. "Its modern name, signifying the Black Castle of Opium, justifies the belief," says D'Anville, "that this narcotic is there prepared." Apamea was not a very ancient city, having been founded by Antiochus Soter (who named it after his mother), on the ruin of the more ancient Celænæ.——Another, the earlier name of which was Myrlea, in Bithynia.——A third, in Syria, of which it was a principal city. It was situated between the Orontes and a little lake, and there it is said that Seleucus Nicator fed his elephants of war, the number of which was no less than 500. Strab.—Plin.—D'Anv.——Of Media.——Mesopotamia.——Another near the Tigris.

Apelaurus mons, a hill in the Stymphalian territory, where Philip defeated the Eleans and Ætolians. It was about a mile from the city of Stymphalus. Polyb.

Apennīnus, a ridge of high mountains through the middle of Italy, "branching off from the maritime Alps in the neighbourhood of Genoa, running diagonally from the Ligurian Sea to the Adriatic in the vicinity of Ancona, and from thence continuing nearly parallel with the latter sea as far as the promontory of Gargano. From this point it again inclines to the Mare Inferum, till it terminates in the promontory of Leucopetra near Rhegium." Cram. It. Some have supposed that they ran across Sicily by Rhegium, before Italy was separated from Sicily, Lucan. 2, v. 306.—Ovid. Met. 2. v. 226.—Ital. 4, v. 743.—Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Aphaca, a town of Palestine, where Venus was worshipped, and where she had a temple and an oracle.

Aphar, a city of Arabia Felix, the Saphar of Ptolemy and Pliny. From the latter form the Sapphoritæ derive their name.

Aphetæ, a part of Thessaly, according to Herod. 80 stadia distant from Artemisium, though Strabo places it near Iolchos. From this port the Argonauts are said to have set sail. Xerxes' fleet was stationed here previous to the engagements off Artemisium. It is now Fetio. Cram.

Aphrodisias, now Gheira, a town of Caria, sacred to Venus. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 62.

Aphrodisium, I. a town in the eastern part of the island of Cyprus, to the north of Salamis, from which it is distant 70 stadia.——II. A temple of Venus, on the promontory at the south-east extremity of the Pyrenees, and on the common boundary of Spain and Gaul. It is also called Venus Pyrenæa.——III. Another in Latium, common to the Latins, situated probably between Ardea and Antium. Cram.

Aphytis, a town of the peninsula Pallene, mentioned by Herodotus and Thucydides as next to Potidæa. Here was a celebrated temple of Bacchus, to which Agesipolis king of Sparta, was removed shortly before his death. Lysander besieged the town; but the god of the place appeared to him in a dream, and advised him to raise the siege, which he immediately did. Theophrastus, who speaks of its vineyards, makes the name Aphyte, as also Strabo. Cram.—Herodot. 7, 123.—Thucyd. 1, 64.

Apia, an ancient name of Peloponnesus, which it received from Apis, son of Apollo, according to Æschylus, or from an Argive chief, son of Phoroneus.

Apidănus, now the Vlacho Iani, described by Herodotus as the largest river of Achaia, though its waters were insufficient to supply the Persian army. It joins the Enipeus near Pharsalus, and flows with it into the Peneus. Cram.—Herodot. 7, 197.

Apīna, and Apinæ, a city of Apulia, destroyed with Trica, in its neighbourhood, by Diomedes; whence came the proverb of Apina and Trica, to express trifling things. Martial. 14 ep. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

Apiŏla, and Apiolæ, a city of the Latins, in the territory of Setia, said to have been taken and burned by Tarquinius Priscus, and to have furnished from its spoils the sums necessary for the construction of the Circus Maximus. According to Corradini, the name of Valle Apiole is given in old writings to a tract of country situated between Sezza and Piperno. Cram.—Dion. Hal. 3, 49.—Liv. 1, 35.

Apollinis Arx, I. a place at the entrance of the Sybil's cave. Virg. Æn. 6.——II. Promontorium, a promontory of Africa. Liv. 30, c. 24.——III. Templum, a place in Thrace.——IV. In Lycia. Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 3.

Apollonia, I. a town of Illyria, near the mouth of the Æas or Aous, a celebrated colony of Corinth and Corcyra. Its laws, commended by Strabo for their wisdom, were framed rather on the Spartan than the Corinthian model. Pyrrhus is said to have contemplated the idea of throwing a bridge over the Hadriatic from Apollonia to the Apulian port Hydrus. Augustus spent many years of his early life, which were devoted to literature and philosophy, in this city. The ruins of the ancient town still bear the name of Pollina, but are very inconsiderable. Cram.—Strab.—Scymn. ch. 438.—Scylax.—Ælian. Var. Hist. 13, 16.—Aristot. Polit. 4, 4.—Thuc. 1, 26.—Diod. Sic. 18.—Plin. 3, 11.—Suet.——II. A town of Mygdonia.——III. Of Crete.——IV. Of Sicily——V. On the coast of Asia Minor.——VI. Another on the coast of Thrace, part of which was built on a small island of Pontus, where Apollo had a temple.——VII. A city of Thrace.——VIII. Another on mount Parnassus.

Apŏnus, now Abano, a fountain, with a village of the same name, near Patavium in Italy. The waters of the fountain, which were hot, were wholesome, and were supposed to have an oracular power. Lucan. 7, v. 194.—Suet. in Tiber. 14.

Appia Via. Vid. Via.

Apsinthii. Vid. Absynthii.

Apsus, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Ionian Sea between Dyrrachium and Apollonia. It is now the Crevasta, and was rendered famous by the military operations of Cæsar and Pompey upon its banks. Lucan, 5, v. 46.

Aptĕra, an inland town of Crete. Ptol.—Plin, 4, c. 12.

Apŭlia, now Puglia, a country of Magna Græcia in the south of Italy. If this portion of country received its name, as historians believe, from the Apuli who early established themselves there, it very soon extended itself, with the name of Apulia, beyond the little territory occupied by that obscure people. In the time of Augustus, it comprehended all the region that lay between Samnium and Lucania on the west, and the Adriatic on the east, having for its northern boundary the Tifernus, and terminating on the south in the Iapygian promontory, on either side of which was the Adriatic or the Tarentine gulf. This tract of country was divided into Messapia, or, as the Greeks denominated it, Iapygia, Peucetia, and Daunia. The last of these may be considered the proper Apulia, at least as far as from the Tifernus, which separated it from the Ager Frentanus, to the Lacus Urianus. Within these narrow bounds the Apuli were limited, and the rest of Daunia seems to have had no greater right to the name of Apulia than had Peucetia and Messapia. The Calabri sometimes gave their name to the southern part of Messapia, which was called from them Calabria. The Greek historians extended the name of Iapygia so as to make it coextensive with the Apulia of the Latins in its greatest width. This distinction in the use of the names of Apulia and Iapygium should be constantly in the mind of the reader of Roman history. Apulia was the scene of many contests between the Romans and the Samnites in the early days of the former people; and after the fatal battle at Cannæ the Apulians took part with the Carthaginians. After long and patient remonstrance, the Apuli obtained from the Roman senate the declaration of their civil and municipal rights. Strab.—Plin.—Liv.—Polyb.—App.—Cram. It. It was famous for its wools, superior to all the produce of Italy. Some suppose that it is called after Apulus, an ancient king of the country before the Trojan war. Plin. 3, c. 11. Cic. de Div. 1. c. 43.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Martial. in Apoph. 155.

Aqua Ferentina, a stream and a spring near the ancient Bovillæ, "distinguished in the early annals of Latium as the place where the confederate Latin cities assembled in council." Cram. Gr.

Aquilaria, a place of Africa. Cæs. 2, Bell. Civ. 23.

Aquileia, or Aquilegia, a celebrated city of Venetia, between the Alsa and the Natiso, some distance from the coast, at the head of the Adriatic. It was built by a party of Gauls about 187 B. C., and almost immediately fell into the hands of the Romans. In the time of Cæsar it had become of the greatest importance as a military post, and was, indeed, the "bulwark of Italy on its north-eastern frontier." All the trade of Italy with the Illyrians and Pannonians passed through this place; and, as it was situate near the easy passage of the Julian Alps, and by this means in direct communication with the Save, the intercourse with all the nations with which the Romans were not at war, between the Adriatic and the Danube, was rendered free to the Aquileienses. It successfully resisted the assault of Maximinianus, who, in the later days of the empire, sought to gain possession of it; but it was unable to resist the strength of Attila, and was conquered and sacked by that barbarian. Ausonius had assigned it the rank of the ninth city of the whole empire. It is supposed that some change has taken place in the bed of the Natiso, which has left the site of Aquileia different from what it was in former times as regards its proximity to the banks of that river. The modern town, which stands near the ruins of the old, has assumed the name of Aquileia. Strab.—Herodian.—Plin.—Aus.—Cram. It.

Aquilonia. There were two towns of this name in Samnium, one on the borders of Apulia, now Lancedogua, and the other situate at the source of the Trinius, east of Samnium. It was here that the consecrated army of the Samnites encamped to make a last mighty, but, as it proved, an unavailing effort against the ambitious power of Rome. Liv. 10, c. 38.

Aquīnum, a town of Latium, on the borders of the Samnites, where Juvenal was born. A dye was invented there which greatly resembled the real purple. Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 27.—Strab.—Ital. 8, v. 404.—Juv. 3, v. 319.

Aquitania, a third of Gaul as described in the commentaries of Cæsar. It extended from the Pyrenæi montes on the south, as far as the Garumna (the Garonne) upon the north, and from the Gallic ocean, now Bay of Biscay, on the west, to Gallia Provincia or Narbonensis on the east. This, though by no means one third of Gaul in extent of surface, was considered to constitute that proportion in population, and still more in importance. On the establisbment of the empire by Augustus, when all his vast dominions were divided again in accordance with his views, Aquitania was continued from the Garonne to the Loire, which formed the half of its eastern limits as well as the whole of its boundary upon the north. At a still later period, another division of this district of country was made. The original Aquitania, with a small addition on the north, was called Novem Populana; and the country on that side of the Garonne was divided into Aquitania prima on the east, and Aquitania secunda on the west and bordering on the ocean. Aquitania prima was an important part of Gaul long before it assumed that name, and many centuries before the christian era, was formed into a regular monarchy. Its capital was first Avaricum, after which it took the name of the principal inhabitants, the Bituriges. It is now the city of Bourges. The capital of Aquitania secunda was Burdegala, Bourdeaux; and many modern names of that part of France are manifest modifications of those of the ancient inhabitants, as the province of Saintonge from the Santones. Aquitania proper, or Novem Populana, was overrun by the Vascons in the ruin of the empire, and that part of France which is called Gascony still bears their name; while the province of Guienne upon its north still seems, as D'Anville thinks, to preserve something of the former Aquitaine.

ARABIA, a large country of Asia. Its situation and boundaries are thus given by Malte-Brun. "It occupies an intermediate position between the rest of Asia and Africa. Its south-east boundary forms a part of the shore of the Indian ocean. On the opposite side it is bounded by Syria, by which it is separated from the Mediterranean. On the north-east its variable limits follow very much the course of the Euphrates. From Persia it is separated by the Persian gulf. From Egypt and Abyssinia in Africa, by the Arabian gulf or Red Sea." "An important datum for the determination of Arabia is contained in the statement that 'the Arabian chain of mountains from west to east measures two months' journey, (i. e. 12,000 stadia,) from the edge of the valley of the Nile, to the region of frankincense.' I say from the edge of the valley of the Nile, because the gulf is considered as inland, and not as a boundary of the country. But according to this, the region of frankincense cannot reach farther south than Upper Egypt, which does not agree with the former statement on the extension of Arabia to the south. It may be, moreover, remarked, that no blame can be attached to Herodotus for considering the whole of Arabia as mountainous as Arabia Petræa and the chain of mountains between the Nile and the Arabian gulf were alone known to him." Niebuhr. g. The ancient division of the peninsula, which in part originated with Ptolemy, was into Arabia Petræa, Arabia Felix, and Arabia Deserta. The first of these extended from the confines of Judæ to the Arabic gulf, and towards the west it bordered on Egypt. The part that touched on Judæ was called Idumea. It was added by Trajan to Palestine, and formed afterwards a province apart, by the name of the third Palestine. Through the deserts of this part of Arabia the Israelites accomplished their miraculous passage; and here arose the mountains of Horeb and Sinai. South of the Stony Arabia was Arabia Felix, bounded on the east by the Arabic gulf, and on the south by the Erythrean Sea. A great part of this portion of Arabia is now called Yemen, a name analogous, in some measure, to that of Felix which it bore among the Greeks and Latins. Its principal inhabitants were the Sabæi; but at a later period the inhabitants of the southern coast, including the Sabæi, were called Homeritæ. In this region are the more modern cities of Mecca and Medina on the Sinus Arabicus. The ancients also included the western shore of the Persian gulf in the happy Arabia, confining Arabia Deserta to the region lying between Syria and Babylon south of the Euphrates. At a later period, all this, confining Arabia Felix within narrow bounds on the Arabian gulf, was considered to belong to the barren Arabia. A small tribe inhabiting, or rather wandering through, a portion of this district east of Arabia Petræa, were called Saraceni by Pliny and Ptolemy, who were the first that mention them, and gave its origin to the wide empire of the Saracens in Asia, Europe, and Africa. The people of Arabia are of two distinct races, the later of which descends from Ishmael, and the earlier from Jectan or Kaptan; and these are the genuine Arabs, distinguished from the Ishmaelites in their mode of life no less than in their origin. The nomadic habits of the latter are proverbial; but the descendants of Jectan early formed themselves into communities, and lived under the protection of laws and the authority of kings. Arabia has never been absolutely subdued by any of the powerful empires that surrounded it. Alexander failed to make it the centre of his dominion, and the Roman authority was partially felt and not widely diffused in this peninsula. Under the Caliphs it formed a brilliant empire; literature, science, and the arts flourished among its inhabitants, but they have returned to their nomadic habits, and now are, generally, but in the second stage, not of civilized life, but of the rudest society. Plin.—Ptol.—Arr.—D'Anville.—Malte-Brun.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3, and Diod. 1 and 2.—Plin. 12 and 14.—Strab. 16.—Xenoph.

ARABICUS SINUS, the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea. An arm of the sea lying between Egypt on the west and Arabia on the east. The Red Sea does not answer to the Mare Rubrum of the ancient geographers, which lay between the Indian peninsula and the coasts of Africa and Arabia. "It occupies," says Malte-Brun, "a deep cavity, which receives no river, and presents the appearance of an ancient strait which once united the Indian ocean and the Mediterranean, and which has been filled up at its northern extremity. It is filled with sunken rocks, sand-banks, &c. which allow but little space for free navigation. The name of Red Sea seems to be derived from Edom of Idumea, which also signifies red." Plin. 5, c. 11.—Strab.

ARABIS, ARABIUS, ARBIS, a river, which running nearly parallel with the Indus, separates India from Gedrosia, the south-eastern province of Persia. It emptied into the Erythrean, now the Arabian Sea. The borders of this river were inhabited by a people from whom it took, or to whom, perhaps, it communicated, its name. Arr.

ARACCA, and ARECCA, a city of Susiana, on the eastern side of the Tigris. "It attracts the attention of the learned," says D'Anville, "by reason of the affinity in its name with that of Erech, mentioned in the Old Testament among the cities constructed by Nimrod." Tibul. 4, 1.—D'Anville.

ARACHNÆUS MONS, I. a mountain of Argolis, mentioned by Æschylus as the last station of the telegraphic fire by which the news of the capture of Troy was transmitted to Mycenæ. The modern name is Sophico. Cram.—Agam. 299.——II. A city of Thessaly.

ARACHOSIA, a province of Asia, bounded on the north by the Paropamisus chain, on the east by the mountains which form the western limit of India, on the south by Gedrosia, and on the west by Drangiana. Its capital, Arachotus, is named Rockhage, and the country Arrockhage. Chaussard.—D'Anville.

ARACHTHUS, OI ARACTHUS, or ARETHAN, a river of Epirus, which rises in the part of the chain of Pindus belonging to the Tymphæi, and flowing in a southerly direction, empties into the Ambracius Sinus near Ambracia. As the Arachthus, according to Lycophron, was considered the boundary of Greece on this side, and Ambracia was accounted a city of Græcia Propria, it must have been situated upon the left bank of the river. That the Arachthus was a considerable stream may be inferred from Livy, who relates that Perseus, king of Macedon, was detained on its banks by high floods in his way to Acarnania. Cram.—Liv. 43, 21.

Aracynthus, I. a chain of mountains running in a south-easterly direction from the Achelous to the Evenus, by Pliny and other writers ascribed to Acarnania; but by Strabo and Dionysius Periegetes, to Ætolia. Its present name is mount Zigos.——II. Another in Bœotia, whence Minerva is called Aracynthia. Cram.

Aradus, a city of Phœnicia, which formed, in very ancient times, an independent state. This city was built upon a rock at some distance from the coast, and was, perhaps, at one period the third in magnitude and importance in the country. The modern name is Ruad. The rock upon which it stood was so steep that the houses seemed to be built one on the top of the other. Mela, 2, 7.—Vass. ad Mel.

Aræ Philænorum, I. altars erected by the Carthaginians near the Syrtis Major, on the common boundary of Cyrenaica and the territory of Carthage, in commemoration of the generous self-devotion of the Philæni. Pliny says they were of sand, and in Strabo's time they had ceased to exist. The surrounding region, however, retained the name. Sallust. Jug. 19, 79.—Plin. 5, 4.——II. Rocky islands, off the Carthaginian coast, 230 stadia from the city, now called by the natives Zowamoore, and laid down in charts under the name of Zimbra. They were anciently called Ægimurus. The name of Aræ Servius traces to the circumstance of the Romans and Carthaginians having made peace there, and having fixed the islands as the limits of their respective dominions. But, according to Livy, a truce was broken here, not peace made; and in Polybius, the limits of empire are otherwise established. Some confound the islands in question with the Ægates, which lay off Lilybœum in Sicily. Heyne, Æn. Exc. 4, lib. 1.——III. An early name of the little state of Phlius, which may be referred to Argolis, since Homer represents it as dependent on the kingdom of Mycenæ. Cram.—Il. B. 509.

Arar, a river of Gallia Celtica, which rises in mount Vogesus, and flows into the Rhone near Lyons, forming in its course the line of separation between the Ædui and Sequani. Ammianus Marcellinus first called it Sacona; whence the Sancona of later writers and the French Saone. It flows with such incredible slowness that the eye cannot distinguish the direction of its current; whence Pliny calls it the "sluggish river." Cæs. Lemaire.

Arbages, I. a name given to several rivers of antiquity, supposed by D'Anville to be used as an appellative term. In the Anabasis of Xenophon it is applied to the Mesopotamian Chaboras, Al-Khabom. D'Anville.——II. A river which rises in mount Abus, and flowing through Armenia past mount Ararat, holds its course easterly to the Caspian, into which it empties, having previously, according to Pliny and others, formed a junction with the Cyrus. It is now the Arras. Chaussard.——III. The same name is also applied to the Rha of Ptolemy, the modern Volga. Chaussard.——IV. Otherwise called the Oroatis, Arois, and Ares, a river which serves as the boundary between Persis and Susiana. It was composed of many mountain torrents. It is now the Bendemir. Chaussard.

Arbela, (orum,) the principal town of the Assyrian province Adiabene, situated between the rivers Lycus and Caprus, and still existing under the name of Esbil. The final victory of Alexander over Darius has rendered this place famous, though the actual place of battle was at Gaugamela, nearer to the Tigris, and on the opposite side of the Zab to Arbela. D'Anville.

Arcadia, I. "a province of Peloponnesus, occupying the central part, and enclosed on all sides by lofty mountains. On the north it is separated from Achaia by the elevated summit of mount Cyllene, extending from the borders of Phliasia in Argolis to the chains of Erymanthus, Scollis, and Pholoe, on the confines of Elis. From this point another ridge forms the western boundary, dividing Arcadia from the latter province and Triphylia, and uniting on the right bank of the Neda and on the confines of Messenia with those mountains which form the southern belt of Arcadia; these, under the names of Lycæus, Cerausius, and Mænalus, run from east to west along the Messenian and Laconian frontiers as far as the borders of Argolis and Cynuria, where they join mount Parthenius. This last mountain, together with Artemisium, closes the periphery of the province on the eastern frontier, by reuniting itself with the Stymphalian hills and the more elevated range of Cyllene. Within this great quadrangular basin other secondary ridges branch off, and intersect each other in various directions, forming several minor valleys, the waters of which, however, all finally discharge themselves into the Alpheus before it enters the Elean territory. Arcadia was, next to Laconia, the largest and most populous province of the Peloponnesus." The Arcadians had remained in quiet possession of their country from time immemorial; whence their claim to an antiquity which exceeded that of the moon. Pelasgus was said to have been their first king. In the time of Homer they were united under one chief; subsequently, till after the battle of Leuctra and the building of Megalopolis, they were mere soldiers of fortune. The Theban policy of convening a general council at Megalopolis, and thus uniting the whole people, had the effect of checking the power of Lacedæmon. Afterwards Arcadia became connected with the Achæan league, of which Megalopolis was the chief city after the death of Aratus. In Strabo's time the principal cities of this province had fallen into decay. Its natural resources consisted chiefly in its rich pastures. Cram.——II. A town of Crete, north-east of Gortys Its ruins are now named Arcadioti.

Arcanum, the name of a villa belonging to Q. Cicero, between Arpinum and Aquinum. It was so called from being situated near an ancient city named Arx. Cram.

Archippe, a city of the Marsi, destroyed by an earthquake, and lost in the lake of Fucinus. Plin. 3, c. 19.

Ardea, formerly Ardua, a town of Latium, built by Danae, or, according to some, by a son of Ulysses and Circe. It was the capital of the Rutuli, and was situated about three miles from the sea. Strabo informs us that the country about Ardea was marshy, and the climate therefore unhealthy. Ardea was colonized by the Romans, and Menenius Agrippa was one of the triumvirs who led the colony. It was again colonized under the emperor Hadrian. This city at an early period contributed to the foundation of Saguntum in Spain. The ruins still bear the name Ardea. Tarquin the Proud was pressing it with a siege when his son ravished Lucretia. A road, called Ardeatina, branched from the Appian road to Ardea. *Cram.—C. Arduenna, now Ardenne, a large forest of Gaul in the time of J. Cæsar, which extended 50 miles from the Rhine to the borders of the Nervii. Tacit. 8, Ann. c. 42.—Cæs. Bell. Gall. 6, c. 29.

Arelatum, now Arles, a town in that part of Gallia Narbonensis which bore the name of Viennensis. Thither the emperor Honorius transferred the seat of the prætorian prefecture of Gaul, when Treves, sacked by the barbarians, was no longer in a state to maintain this pre-eminence. A little above Arles the Rhone divides itself into two arms, to form two principal mouths called Gradus, now Les Grans du Rhone. D'Anville.

Areopĭgus, or the Hill of Mars. This eminence, which rose in the city of Athens a short distance north-west of the Acropolis, derived its name from the mythological tradition which reported that Mars had been the first culprit arraigned upon this spot, thenceforward sacred to justice. At a period comparatively late, this court was roofed in and otherwise enclosed; but for a long time after it had been consecrated to the trial and adjudication of criminal cases, it was but an open space, in which were two rude seats for the accused and his accuser, with an altar dedicated to Minerva, the tutelar deity of the Athenians. In the immediate vicinity was the temple of the furies alluded to in the Eumenides of Æschylus and the Œdipus at Colonos, of Sophocles. Paus.—Att.—Æsch.

Arethūsa, I. a fountain, now dry, in the island of Ortygia near Syracuse. It was necessary to defend this fountain from the sea, with which it would have been confounded but for a stone wall that protected it. Here it was that the poets fabled the river god Alpheus to have overtaken the nymph Arethusa, after having followed her, transformed into a fountain, under the bed of the sea. Ovid.—Theoc.——II. A lake of upper Armenia, near the fountains of the Tigris. Nothing can sink under its waters. Plin. 2, c. 103.——III. A town of Thrace. ——IV. Another in Syria.

Argæus, a mountain of Cappadocia, covered with perpetual snows, at the bottom of which is the capital of the country called Maxara, from the summit of which it is said the Euxine on one side, and the Mediterranean on the other, are distinctly discernible." Claudian.

Argeithe, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 23.

Argennum, a promontory of Ionia.

Argentoratum, now Strasburg, a city of the Triboci, on the Rhine.

Argia. Vid. Argolis.

Argĭlus, a town of Thrace, near the Strymon, built by a colony of Andrians. Thucyd. 4, c. 103.——Herodot. 7, c. 115.

Arginūsæ, three small islands near the continent, between Mitylene and Methymna, where the Lacedæmonian fleet was conquered by Conon the Athenian. Strab. 13.

Agrippæi, a nation among the Sauromatians, born bald and with flat noses. They lived upon trees. Herodot. 4, c. 23. D'Anville considers them, with reason, to have been rather a caste than a nation.

Argolĭcus sinus, a bay on the coast of Argolis, between that district and Laconia; now the Gulf of Napoli. D'Anville.

Argōlis, and Argia, a part of the Peloponnesus, bounded on the north by the country of the Corinthians and Sicyonians, and on the west by Arcadia; on the south it terminated in the territory of Cynuria, on the borders of Laconia, and on the east it was washed by the Saronic gulf. The southern shore of that part of Argolis which lay on the western side of the Argolic gulf extended to the Myrtoan sea. All Argolis contained, perhaps, an area of nearly 1100 square miles. The face of the country was diversified with hills, and the valleys extending between them were well cultivated and fertile. The Pelasgi are supposed to have been its earliest colonists; and they probably gave their name to the country, till, on the arrival of Danaus, its inhabitants assumed that of Danai. For a long time Argolis is supposed to have formed but one undivided dominion; but about the period to which belongs the history or the fable of Acrisius, it was divided into the kingdoms of Argos and Tiryns, under the sway of Acrisius and Prœtus his brother. Perseus, the grandson of Acrisius, erected yet another principality, to which he gave the name of Mycenæ, and which, for a time, assumed the superiority among all the cities of Argolis. The partial union of the families of Pelops and Hercules in the person of Atreus, again united the different states of Argolis; and Tisamenes, the son of Orestes, at the time of the return of the Heraclidæ to the Peloponnesus, beheld himself acknowledged lord of Argolis, and the most influential monarch of the south of Greece. Eighty years after the destruction of Troy this prince was expelled, and the lineal descendant of Hercules, Temenus, the restorer of his race, assumed the government of a territory equally extensive, but with power greatly curtailed. Some time afterwards the Argives deposed their sovereign Meltas, the last of the Temenic family, and established republican institutions throughout his former dominions. Argolis was, for the most part neutral during the struggle of the Greeks against their Persian enemies; but in the Peloponnesian war it was generally found in a state of hostility to Lacedæmonia. Strab.—Paus.—Hom. Il. 2, 107.—Thucyd.—Cram. Gr.

Argos (sing. neut. and Argi, masc. plur.) I. an ancient city, capital of Argolis in Peloponnesus, about two miles from the sea, on the bay called Argolicus sinus. Juno was the chief deity of the place. The kingdom of Argos was founded by Inachus 1856 years before the Christian era, and after it had flourished for about 550 years, it was united to the crown of Mycenæ. Argos was built, according to Euripides, Iphig. in Aulid. v. 152, 534, by seven cyclops who came from Syria. These cyclops were not Vulcan's workmen. The nine first kings of Argos were called Inachides, in honour of the founder. Their names were Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis, Argus, Chrysaus, Phorbas, Tricpas, Stelenus, and Gelanor. Gelanor gave a kind reception to Danaus, who drove him from his kingdom in return for his hospitality. The descendants of Danaus were called Belides. Agamemnon was king of Argos during the Trojan war; and 80 years after the Heraclidæ seized the Peloponnesus, and deposed the monarchs. The inhabitants of Argos were called Argivi and Argolici; and this name has been often applied to all the Greeks without distinction. Plin. 7, c. 56.—Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 15.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 13, &c. l. 2, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 40, &c. This city, which still preserves its name, "was generally looked upon," says Cramer, "as the most ancient city of Greece. The walls were constructed of massive blocks of stone, a mode of building generally attributed to the cyclops. It was protected by two citadels, and surrounded by fortifications equally strong. The principal one was named Larissa." The government of Argos, after the expulsion of the kings, was that of a republic; and one cause of her frequent wars with Sparta was the essential difference of principle that actuated her republican institutions, contrasted with the aristocratic character of the Spartan laws. The population was divided into three classes, of which one consisted of the free inhabitants of the city, the surrounding people or Perioikoi constituted the second, and the Gametes or slaves were the third; amounting in all, perhaps, to about 110,000 souls.——II. Another in Macedonia, called Oresticum.——III. Another in Thessaly, by some supposed to be the same as Larissa. ——IV. Another in the country of the Amphilochi, founded, according to tradition, by Amphilochus the son of Amphiaraus, and thence called Argos Amphilochium. Thucydides informs us that it was once the most powerful town of the region to which it belonged; but that, being much disturbed by the Ambraciots, it was obliged to seek the protection of the Acarnanians, and so sunk into a comparative dependence. A great extent of wall is still remaining, together with other ruins sufficient to manifest its former strength and to prove its Cyclopean origin. Thuc. 2, 68.—Holland, Trav.

Argyrīpa, a town of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war, and called by Polybius Argipana. Only ruins remain to show where it once stood, though the place still preserves the name of Arpi. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 246.

Aria, the name of a country in Asia, by extension from a particular province. It was the same, very nearly, as the modern Khorasan, but in its greatest extent, taking in a part of the modern Cabul, it was bounded on the north by Hyrcania and Parthia, on the east by Bactria and India on this side of the Indus, by Gedrosia on the south, and on the west by Media. Aria Proper was confined, perhaps within the Paropamisus. Its chief town Aria, or Artacoana, on the Arius, now Heri Rud, is Herat. Dionys. Perieg. 918.—Mela, 1. c. 2, l. 2, c. 7.

Ariāni, and Ariēni, the inhabitants of Aria.

Aricia, a very ancient town of Italy, now Riccia, built by Hippolytus, son of Theseus, after he had been raised from the dead by Æsculapius, and transported into Italy by Diana. In a grove, in the neighbourhood of Aricia, Theseus built a temple to Diana, where he established the same rites as were in the temple of that goddess in Tauris. The priest of this temple, called Rex, was always a fugitive, and the murderer of his predecessor; and went always armed with a dagger, to prevent whatever attempts might be made upon his life by one who wished to be his successor. The Arician forest, frequently called nemorensis, or nemoralis sylva, was very celebrated; and no horses would ever enter it, because Hippolytus had been killed by them. Egeria, the favourite nymph and invisible protectress of Numa, generally resided in this famous grove, which was situated on the Appian way, beyond mount Albanus. Ovid. Met. 15; Fast. 3, 263.—Lucan. 6, v. 74.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 761, &c.

Arimaspi, a people sometimes referred to Scythia in Europe, and sometimes to Asiatic Scythia. It is difficult, of course, therefore, to fix the country of this fabulous people; but it seems, from all authority, that the region about the Palus Mæotis and the Tanais was supposed to be inhabited by them. They are said to have had but one eye in the middle of their forehead, and waged continued war against the griffins, monstrous animals that collected the gold of the river. Plin. 7, c. 2.—Herodot. 3 and 4. —Strab. 1 and 13.

Arimĭnum, (now Rimini,) an ancient city of Italy, near the Rubicon, on the borders of Gaul, on the Adriatic, founded by a colony of Umbrians. When the Romans established a colony in this place, it rose to the highest importance; and in all the Punic wars, and afterwards in the Gallic, a military force was stationed in Ariminum, which was looked upon as commanding the entrance into Italy upon that side. Lucan. 1, v. 231.—Plin. 3, c. 15.

Ariminus, a river of Italy, rising in the Appenine mountains, and falling into the Adriatic just above Ariminum. Plin. 3, c. 15.

Arimphæi, a people of Scythia, near the Riphæan mountains, who lived chiefly upon berries in the woods, and were remarkable for their innocence and mildness. Plin. 6, c. 7.

Aris a river of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 31.

Arisba, I. a town of Lesbos, destroyed by an earthquake. Plin. 5, c. 31.——II. A colony of the Mityleneans in Troas, destroyed by the Trojans, before the coming of the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 9. v. 264.—Homer. Il. 7.

Aristæum, a city of Thrace, on the summit of mount Hæmus. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Aristĕræ, an island on the coast of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 34.

Aristonautæ, the naval dock of Pellene, said to have been so called from the Argonauts having touched there in their expedition. Paus. 2.

Arius, a river of Asia. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood are called Arii.

Armenia, a large country of Asia, divided into upper and lower Armenia. Upper Armenia, called also Major, has Media on the east, Iberia on the north, Mesopotamia on the south, and the Euphrates, which separates it from Armenia Minor, on the west. Lower Armenia or Armenia Minor, which was but a part of Cappadocia, lay along the Euphrates from Syria, which was separated from it on the south by the Taurus mountains as far as the borders of Pontus, which bounded it on the north. A branch of the same mountain divided from the rest of Cappadocia on the west. The history of Armenia is always that of a province. A part of the Assyrian empire, it passed with that into the power of the Medes, and fell with them into the hands of the Persians. For a short time, on the overthrow of the Seleucidæ, the governors of Armenia exercised a kind of independent rule; but in the reign of Trajan it was reduced in form, as it had long been in fact, to the mere condition of a province of the empire. They borrowed the names and attributes of their deities from the Persians. Armenia Major is now called Turcomania, and Minor, Aladulia. Herodot. 1. c. 194, l. 5. c. 49.—Curt. 4, c. 12, l. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 1 and 11.—Mela, 3, c. 5 and 8.—Plin. 6, c. 4, &c.—Lucan. 2.

Armoricæ Civitates, certain districts of Gaul, principally maritime; whence the name, the Celtic Ar-Mor, signifying by the sea. The Armorica of Cæsar was situate between the Sequana, the Liger, and the sea, including the modern provinces of Normandy and Bretagne. The name Armorica was at last confined to Bretagne exclusively. The Armorici were an independent people, united in confederacies, without much superiority of power or of right. They were of Celtic origin, and even after the decline of Roman power had witnessed the exclusion of Roman influence from the British Isles, the Armoricans and the Britons continued to look upon themselves and on each other as of one stock, and the latter received from the continent very timely aid against their Saxon enemies. The Armoricans hold a conspicuous place in romantic tradition and fable; prince Arthur himself was an Armorican, and more than half the story of his times relate to the chivalry of Britany. Cæs. Bell. G.—Turn. Aug. Sax.

Arne, I. a city of Lycia, called afterwards Xanthus.——II. A town of Umbria, in Italy.

Arnus, now Arno, the principal river of Etruria. It rises in the Appenines, passes through the cities of Florence and Pisa, and empties into the Mediterranean at the Portus Pisanus, or harbour of the latter city. Liv. 22, 2.—Strab.

Aromata, or Aromatum, "the most eastern land of the continent of Africa, and of which the modern name is Guardafui." D'Anville.

Arpi. Vid. Argyripa.

Arpinum, now Arpino, a town of the Volsci, famous for giving birth to Cicero and Marius. The words of Arpinæ Chartæ are sometimes applied to Cicero's works. Arpinum did not pass from the possession of the Volsci to that of the Romans; it was for some time a town of the Samnites, and from these the Romans conquered it. Cicero enlarges on the primitive simplicity of manners that prevailed there so late as the time in which he himself flourished. Liv. 9, 44.

Arretium, now Arezzo, a town of Etruria, and constituting one of its principal states in the early time of the Romans. The Romans placed there a force to repel the incursions of the Gauls; and there the consul Flaminius was posted to contest with Annibal the entrance into Etruria. It was a muncipium, and always held a high rank among the cities of Italy. In the middle ages it again became conspicuous for its wars with Florence during the factious years of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. It was likewise famous for its porcelain vases mentioned by Pliny. Liv 22, 3.—Strab.

Arsamosata, a town of Armenia Major, 70 miles from the Euphrates. Tacit. Ann. 15.

Arsanias, a river of Armenia, which according to some, flows into the Tigris, and afterwards into the Euphrates. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Arsena, a marsh of Armenia Major, whose fishes are all of the same sort. Strab.

Arsia, a small river between Illyricum and Istria, falling into the Adriatic.

Arsinoe, a town of Egypt, situated near the lake of Mœris, on the western shore of the Nile, where the inhabitants paid the highest veneration to the crocodiles. They nourished them in a splendid manner, and embalmed them after death, and buried them in the subterraneous cells of the labyrinth. Strab.——A town of Cilicia——of Æolia——of Syria——of Cyprus——of Lycia——of Crete. Cram.——of Ætolia. Vid. Conope.

Artabri, and Artabrita, a people of Lusitania, who received their name from Artrabum, a promontory on the coast of Spain, now called Finisterre. Sil. 3, v. 362.

Artace, I. a town and sea-port near Cyzicus. It did not exist in the age of Pliny. There was in its neighbourhood a fountain called Artacia. Herodot. 4, c. 14.—Procop. de. Bell. Pers. 1, c. 25.—Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 32.——II. A city of Phrygia.——III. A fortified place of Bithynia.

Artatus, a river of Illyria. Liv. 43, c. 19.

Artaxata, (orum,) now Ardesh, a strongly fortified town of Upper Armenia, the capital of the empire, where the kings generally resided. It is said that Annibal built it for Artaxias, the king of the country. It was burnt by Corbulo, and rebuilt by Tiridates, who called it Neronea in honor of Nero. Strab. 11.

Artemisium, I. a promontory of Eubœa, where Diana had a temple. The neighbouring part of the sea bore the same name. The fleet of Xerxes had a skirmish there with the Grecian ships. Herodot. 7, c. 175, &c.——II. A lake near the grove Aricia, with a temple sacred to Artemis, whence the name.

Artemita, I. a city at the east of Seleucia.——II. An island opposite the mouth of the Achelous. Strab.

Aruæ, a people of Hyrcania, where Alexander kindly received the chief officers of Darius. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Arverni, a powerful people of Gaul, now Auvergne, near the Ligeris, who took up arms against J. Cæsar. They were conquered with great slaughter. They pretended to be descended from the Trojans as well as the Romans. Cæs. Bell. Gal. 7.—Strab. 14.

Asbeste, and Asbystæ, a people of Libya above Cyrene, where the temple of Ammon is built. Jupiter is sometimes called on that account Asbystius. Herodot. 4, c. 170.—Ptol. 4, c. 3.

Ascălon, a town of Syria near the Mediterranean, about 520 stadia from Jerusalem, still in being. Joseph. de Bell. Jud. 3, c. 2.—Theophrast. H. Pl. 7, c. 4.

Ascra, a town of Bœotia, built, according to some, by the giants Otus and Ephialtes, on a summit of mount Helicon. Its celebrity arises from Hesiod's long residence there; whence he is often called the Ascrean poet, and whatever poem treats on agricultural subjects, Ascræum Carmen. The town received its name from Ascra, a nymph, mother to Œoclus by Neptune. Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, c. 19.—Paterc. 1. In the age of Pausanias, a single tower of this town remained; and, according to Sir W. Gell, there are still the remains of a tower, probably the same, that mark its site, upon a barren rock a few miles from the ancient Thespiæ. Hes. Oper.

Asia, one of the great divisions of the earth, separated on the south-west by the straits of Babelmandel and the Arabian gulf from Africa, from Europe on the west by the Mediterranean, the Archipelago, the Dardanelles, the Euxine, the straits of Caffa, the Kooma, the Caspian Sea, and the Ural river and mountains. The Indian ocean and the Frozen sea confine the continent of Asia on the south and north. A very small portion of this immense extent of country was known to the ancients, and of that which was known, the name of Asia was applied to but a part. The Asia of Homer and Herodotus signified only the region about the Cayster, but by degrees the whole of what we now call Asia Minor, the Turks Natolia, and the later Greeks Anatolia, received the name of Asia, which was afterwards gradually extended over the continent. The Nile was sometimes made a boundary of Asia by ancient authors, and Egypt was considered by them to be a part of this geographical division. The natural divisions of Asia are formed by her extensive mountain ranges, and the political and moral divisions correspond, in a great measure to those marked out by the hand of nature. The first of these, comprising the Russian province of Siberia, was known but by the most uncertain tradition to the polished nations of antiquity, who yet were aware that those wild regions were inhabited by a race as rugged as the climate and the soil. South of the Altain chain began the second division; and the extensive prairies of this country were peopled by nomadic tribes, to whom they afforded pasture for their flocks and herds, and who sought from them nothing else. The third division south of the Taurus was a civilized and populous country, thickly covered with cities, and even with empires. The countries of peninsular Asia do not exactly correspond to these distinctions; but east of the Caspian Sea these lines in general separated people differing in the manner just described. Southern Asia, best known at all times, and particularly in antiquity, was subject again to a twofold subdivision. Thus the Indus formed the first great boundary between the eastern and the western nations of Asia, and the Euphrates and the Tigris again separated the latter into three. These divisions, though understood, were not geographically recognized by the ancients, who, after the name of Asia had attained with them its widest signification, divided it into Citerior, the peninsula, and Ulterior or Magna. The former was called also by the Romans Intria Halyn and Intra Taurum, or Cis Taurum; and this contained (we may here observe) the territory of the Lydian Crœsus. The Romans, however, applied the term Asia absolutely, in many instances, to a small portion of the peninsula, including the Phrygias, Mysia, Œolia, and Ionia, Caria and Lydia. To Œolia and Ionia the name was most peculiarly proper, and many suppose that to this narrow region it originally belonged, and that it extended thence over the continent. The Romans knew it generally by that name alone. It was called Proconsularis by Augustus, from the title of the officer whom he set over it. The mythologists have referred the origin of the name of Asia to Asius, an ancient Lydian hero, and to Asia the daughter of Oceanus, and Thetis the wife of Japetus and mother of Prometheus; but, says Malte-Brun, "it appears probable that the Greeks extended this name by little and little from the district to which it was first applied, till it embraced the whole of Asia Minor, and ultimately the other extensive regions of the east." The political constitution of the Asiatic governments in all ages distinguished the people of Asia from those of the European countries, and placed them generally in a hostile position to each other, until the difference between them became settled by the ascendency of the Greeks and Romans, and the triumph of the more liberal policy of the west. Until the time of Alexander, when the differences that had begun to display themselves, perhaps in the Argonautic expedition, and certainly in the Trojan war, were terminated by the victory at Arbela, four great empires had flourished in succession in Asia, perpetuating the original political character, and striving for its universal supremacy. The first was the Assyrian, which terminated about 700 before the Christian era, and was succeeded by that of the Medes, which in the 6th generation merged in that of the Persians, even after the representative of the Asiatic system and the engrosser of all dominion in Asia. Contemporary with the later Assyrian empire, out of which it grew, was the Babylonian empire, while in Asia Minor the Lydian kingdom of Crœsus may almost compare with the kingdom of Media. The conquests of Alexander, and the division of his empire among his generals, effected a division in the Asiatic states, and new kingdoms attained a temporary importance under the different sovereigns who assumed the names Antigonus, Antiochus, Seleucus, &c.; but the extension of the Roman arms reduced all to its former uniformity, and made of many kingdoms a dependent province. Over different parts of this province different officers were placed by the Romans, and the prefects of the East exercised a power and authority little inferior to that of the emperor in his immediate capital. Strab. —Just.—Mel.—Malte-Brun.—Heeren.—D'Anville.—Heyl.

Asius campus, or Asia palus, (Ἄσιος λειμών) a tract of low land along the Cayster, not far from mount Tmolus. There is a diversity of opinion among critics, as to the genuine reading in Homer, (Il. 11. 461,) some contending for Ἀσίῳ ἐν λειμῶνι "in the meadows of Asias;" others for Ἀσίῳ ἐν λειμῶνι, "in the Asian mea-down." Those who follow the former reading adopt the Lydian tradition, and trace the origin of the name Asia to Asias, the son of Cotys, or of Atys. But, as Heyne well remarks, the latter reading is more poetical, and is supported by the Asia Prata, and Asia Palus of Virgil. Heyne. Excc.—Il. 2, 461.—Virg. Geo. 1, 383. Æn. 7, 701.

Asnæus, a mountain of Macedonia, near which the river Aous flows. Liv. 32, c. 5.

Asōpus, I. a river of Thessaly, falling into the bay of Malia at the north of Thermopylæ. Strab. 8.——II. a river of Bœotia, which rises in mount Cithæron, separates the territories of Platæa and Thebes, and, after traversing the whole of southern Bœotia, empties itself into the Euripus near Oropus. On its banks the battle of Platæa was fought, 479 B. C. It still retains the name of Asopo. Cram.—Herodot. 9, 43.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, 4.——III. A river of Asia, flowing into the Lycus near Laodicea. ——IV. A river of Peloponnesus, now Basilico; which rises in the mountains of Argolis, and empties into the Corinthiacus Sinus below Sicyon. Cram.——V. Another of Macedonia, flowing near Heraclea. Strab.

Aspendus, a town of Pamphylia, at the mouth of the river Eurymedon. Cic. in Ver. 1, c. 20. The inhabitants sacrificed swine to Venus.

Asplēdon, a town of Bœotia, twenty stadia from Orchomenus beyond the Melas. Its name was changed to Eudielos, from its advantageous situation. Cram.

Assos, a town of Phrygia Minor, by Pliny called Apollonia.

Asta, a city in Spain, near the Bætis.

Assyria, properly so called, a province of Asia, bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by part of Armenia and mount Niphates, on the east by a part of Media and the mountains Choatras and Zagrus, on the south by Susiana, and on the west by Mesopotamia, from which it was separated by the Tigris. Its capital was Nineveh. The country was very plain, fruitful, and abounding in rivers tributary to the Tigris. It is thought to owe its name to Ashur, the son of Shem; and what this name has in common with that of Syria, caused it to be sometimes transferred to the Syrian nation, whose origin refers to Aram, also descended from Shem. The name of Kurdistan, which modern geography applies to Assyria, comes from a people who, under that of Carduchi or Gordyæi, occupied the mountains by which the country is covered on the side of Armenia and Atropatene. Among the Jews, Assyria was the name of a particular conquering nation, while among the Greeks it was applied indiscriminately to the nations who ruled on the Euphrates and Tigris before Cyrus. The Jewish accounts refer to Assyria properly so called, and give a chronological history of the empire between B. C. 800 and 700. The Grecian authors include, under the designation of Assyrian, not only the ruling nation, but also its dependencies; whence the frequent confusion of Syria and Assyria. Assyrian history, according to Grecian sources, contains nothing more than mere traditions of ancient heroes and heroines, who, in the countries on the Euphrates and Tigris, once founded large empires. The events are not chronologically ascertained, but there are accounts, in the spirit of the east, of Ninus, Semiramis, Ninyas, and Sardanapalus. According to Herodotus an Assyrian empire lasted 520 years, from 1237—717. Heeren.—D'Anville.—Chaussard.—Heylin.—Herod.—Diod.—Ctes.

Astacæni, a people of India, near the Indus. Strab. 15.

Astăcus, I. a town of Bithynia, in the vicinity of Nicomedia, on the Sinus Astacenus, built by Astacus, son of Neptune and Olbia, or rather by a colony from Megara, and Athens. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried the inhabitants to the town of Nicomedia, which was then lately built. Paus. 5, c. 12.—Arrian.—Strab. 17. ——II. A city of Acarnania. Plin. 5.

Astăpa, a town of Hispania Bætica, now Estepa-la-Vieja. Liv. 35, c. 20.

Astapus, a river of Æthiopia, falling into the Nile. It is the Abarvi of the Abyssinians, the sources of which since their discovery in the beginning of the last century, have been mistaken for those of the Nile. (Vid. Bruce's Travels.) Ptolemy makes the Astapus issue from a morass or lake named Coloë, the Bahr Dambea, into which the Abarvi, pours its rivulet. D'Anville.

Asterūsius, I. a mountain at the south of Crete.——II. A town of Arabia Felix.

Astræus, a river of Macedonia, now the Vistritza, which rises in the mountains of ancient Orestis and Eordæa, and flows, according to Ælian, between Benhœa and Thessalonica. Cram.

Astu, a Greek word which signifies city, generally applied by way of distinction to Athens, which was the most capital city of Greece. The word urbs is applied with the same meaning of superiority to Rome, and πολις to Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, as also to Troy.

Astūra, an island and river of Latium. (Pliny.) It is, however, more properly a peninsula, situated at the mouth of the river which Strabo calls Storas. Festus says it was sometimes called Stura as well as Astura. It is interesting for the proximity of Cicero's villa, where Circæi and Antium could be distinguished. It was the residence at one time of Augustus, and also of Tiberius. Cram.

Astūres, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis, who signalized themselves by their resistance to the Romans. Their capital was Asturica Augusta, Astorga; hence Asturias. D'Anville.

Atarantes, a people of Africa, ten days' journey from the Garamantes. There was in their country a hill of salt, with a fountain of sweet water upon it. Herodot. 4, c. 184.

Atarbĕchis, a town in one of the islands of the Delta, where Venus had a temple.

Atarnea, a part of Mysia, opposite Lesbos, with a small town in the neighbourhood of the same name. Paus. 4, c. 35.

Atella, a town of the Osci in Campania. The earliest scenic representations of the Romans were borrowed from those of the Atellani and were called Fabulæ Atellanæ. From these were derived, as many think, the celebrated mimes which delighted the emperors and the people after the Fabulæ Atellanæ were proscribed. On their first representation they were received with such favour, that the actors in them were allowed privileges refused to every other class of histriones; and the first youth of Rome were often among the performers. Atella took part with the Carthagenians in Annibal's expedition against Italy, for which it was reduced to a prefecture; but Cicero speaks of it as a municipium. The ruins of this town are said to be still discernible by the village of Sant Arpino, near Aversa. Liv. 22, 61; and 26, 34. —Cic.—Strab.

Athamanes. "The Athamanes were a people of Epirotic origin. Pliny, however, classes them with the Ætolians. The earliest mention of this people occurs in Diodorus, who mentions their having taken part in the Lamiac war in favour of the Athenians. They were at this time apparently of little importance from their numbers or territorial extent; it was not till many years after that they acquired greater power and influence, as it would seem by the subjugation and extirpation of several small Thessalian and Epirotic tribes, such as the Æniane, the Æthices, and Perrhæbi; they subsequently appear in history as valuable allies to the Ætolians, and formidable enemies to the sovereigns of Macedon. Little further is known of the Athamanes; and Strabo, who hardly considered them as Greeks, informs us that they had ceased to exist as a nation in his time. The rude habits of this people may be inferred from a custom which, we are assured by an ancient historian, prevailed among them, of assigning to their females the active labours of husbandry, while the males were chiefly employed in tending their flocks. Stephanus reports that some considered them to be Illyrians, others Thessalians. The four principal towns of Athamania were Argithea, Tetraphylia, Heraclea, and Theodoria, as we learn from Livy in his account of the revolution by which Amynander was replaced on the throne. That part of Athamania which was situated near the Achelous was called, from that circumstance, Paracheloitis. It was annexed to Thessaly by the Romans, a circumstance which gave offence to Philip of Macedon." Cram.

Athenæ, a celebrated city of Attica, founded about 1556 years before the christian era, by Cecrops and an Egyptian colony. It was called Cecropia from its founder, and afterwards Athenæ in honour of Minerva, who had obtained the right of giving it a name in preference to Neptune. [Vid. Minerva.] It was governed by 17 kings in the following order;—after a reign of 50 years, Cecrops was succeeded by Cranaus, who began to reign 1506 B. C.; Amphictyon, 1497; Erichthonius, 1487; Pandion, 1437; Erichtheus, 1397; Cecrops 2d, 1347; Pandion 2d, 1307; Ægeus, 1283; Theseus, 1235; Menestheus, 1205; Demophoon, 1182; Oxyntes, 1149; Aphidas, 1137; Thymœtes, 1136; Melanthus, 1198; and Codrus, 1091, who was killed after a reign of 21 years. "We have little or no information respecting the size of Athens under its earliest kings; it is generally supposed, however, that even as late as the time of Theseus the town was almost entirely confined to the acropolis and the adjoining hill of Mars. Subsequently to the Trojan war, it appears to have increased considerably, both in population and extent, since Homer applies to it the epithets of εὐκτίμενος and εὐρυάγυιος. These improvements continued probably during the reign of Pisistratus; and as it was able to stand a siege against the Lacedæmonians under his son Hippias, it must evidently have possessed walls and fortifications of sufficient height and strength to ensure its safety. The invasion of Xerxes, and the subsequent irruption of Mardonius, effected the entire destruction of the ancient city, and reduced it to a heap of ruins; with the exception only of such temples and buildings as were enabled, from the solidity of their materials, to resist the action of fire and the work of demolition. When, however, the battles of Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, had averted all danger of invasion, Athens, restored to peace and security, soon rose from its state of ruin and desolation; and, having been furnished by the prudent foresight and energetic conduct of Themistocles with the military works requisite for its defence, it attained, under the subsequent administrations of Cimon and Pericles, to the highest pitch of beauty, magnificence and strength. The former is known to have erected the temple of Theseus, the Dionysiac theatre, the Stoæ, and Gymnasium; and also to have embellished the Academy, the Agora, and other parts of the city at his own expense. Pericles completed the fortifications which had been left in an unfinished state by Themistocles and Cimon; he likewise rebuilt several edifices destroyed by the Persians, and to him his country was indebted for the temple of Eleusis, the Parthenon, and the Propylæa, the most magnificent buildings, not of Athens only, but of the world. It was in the time of Pericles that Athens attained the summit of its beauty and prosperity, both with respect to the power of the republic and the extent and magnificence of the architectural decorations with which the capital was adorned. At this period the whole of Athens with its three ports of Piræus, Munychia, and Phalerum, connected by means of the celebrated long walls, formed one great city enclosed within a vast peribolus of massive fortifications. The whole of this circumference, as we collect from Thucydides, was not less than 174 stadia. Of these, forty-three must be allotted to the circuit of the city itself; the long walls taken together supply seventy-five, and the remaining fifty-six are furnished by the peribolus of the three harbours. Xenophon reports that Athens contained more than 10,000 houses which, at the rate of twelve persons to a house would give 120,000 for the population of the city. From the researches of Col. Leake and Mr. Hawkins, it appears that the former city considerably exceeded in extent the modern Athens, and though little remains of the ancient works to afford certain evidence of their circumference, it is evident from the measurement furnished by Thucydides, that they must have extended considerably beyond the present line of wall, especially towards the north. Col. Leake is of opinion that on this side the extremity of the city reached to the foot of mount Anchesmus and that to the westward its walls followed the small brook which terminates in the marshy ground of the Academy, until they met the point where some of the ancient foundations are still to be seen near the gate Dipylum; while to the eastward they approached close to the Ilissus, a little below the present church of the Mologitades, or confessors. The same antiquary estimates the space comprehended within the walls of Athens, the longomural enclosure, and the peribolus of the ports, to be more than sixteen English miles, without reckoning the sinuosities of the coast, and the ramparts; but if these are taken into the account, it could not have been less than nineteen miles. We know from ancient writers that the extent of Athens was nearly equal to that of Rome within the walls of Servius. Plutrach compares it also with that of Syracuse, which Strabo estimates at 180 stadia, or upwards of twenty-two miles. The number of gates belonging to ancient Athens is uncertain, but the existence of nine has been ascertained by classical writers. The names of these are Dipylum, (also called THRIASIÆ, SACRÆ, and perhaps CERAMICÆ,) DIOMEIÆ, DIOCHARIS, MĒLITIDES, PIRAICÆ, ACHARNICÆ, ITONIÆ, HIPPADES, HERIÆ. The DIPYLUM, as we learn from Livy, was the widest, and led directly to the Forum. Without the walls, there was a path from the Dipylum to the Academy, a distance of nearly one mile. It was also called Thriasian, and deemed sacred from its lying in the direction of the Thriasian plain and Eleusis. There are still some traces of the Dipylum on the north-west side of the acropolis. The DIOMEIÆ were probably so called from Diomeia, one of the Attic demi, and situated to the north-east of Athens; the Diomeian gate must therefore have been on this side of the town. The gate of DIOCHARES was opposite to the entrance of the Lyceum, and near the fountain of Panops. The MELITENSIAN gate was to the south, towards the sea and Phalerum. Near it was the monument of Cimon and the tomb of Thucydides. There are some remains of this gate, as well as of the Piraicæ, which led, as the name sufficiently implies, to the Piræus. The ACHARNICÆ doubtless were so named from Acharnæ, one of the most considerable of the Attic demi, and therefore must have been in that direction. The ITONIAN gate, mentioned in the Dialogue of Axiochus, is placed by Col. Leake about half-way between the Ilissus and at the foot of the hill of Museium; it seems to have been on the road to Phalerum. The gate called HIPPADES is conjectured by the same antiquary to have stood between Dipylum and the Piraicæ. Plutarch is the only writer who mentions it; he states that the tombs of the family of the orator Hyperides were situated in its vicinity. The HERIÆ was so called from its being usual to convey corpses through it to the burying-ground. Its precise situation cannot now be discovered, since, as Col. Leake observes, 'Athens was on every side surrounded with an immense cemetery, there being a continued succession of sepulchres on the north-west and north from the northern long wall to mount Anchesmus; and there were burying-grounds also on the outside of the southern long wall.' Pausanias begins his description of Athens apparently from the Piraic gate. On entering the city, the first building which he notices is the POMPEIUM, so called from its containing the sacred vessels (πομπεῖα) used in certain processions some of which were annual, while others occurred less frequently. These vessels, together with the Persian spoils, were estimated, as we know from Thucydides, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, at 500 talents. Near this was a temple of Ceres containing statues of that goddess, of Proserpine, and of Inachus, by Praxiteles. Pausanias next visits the CERAMICUS, which was one of the most considerable and important parts of the city. Its name was derived from the hero Ceramus, or perhaps from some potteries which were formerly situated there. It included probably the Agora, the Stoa Basileios, and the Pœcile, as well as various other temples and public buildings. Antiquaries are not decided as to the general extent and direction of this part of the ancient city, since scarcely any trace remains of its monuments and edifices; but we may certainly conclude, from their researches and observations, that it lay entirely on the south side of the acropolis; in this direction it must have been limited by the city walls, which, as we know, came close to the fountain Callirhoe or Enneacrounos. The breadth of the Ceramicus, according to Mr. Hawkins, being thus confined on one side by the walls of the city, and on the other by the buildings immediately under the acropolis, could not have exceeded one half of its length. It was divided into the outer and inner Ceramicus. The former was without the walls, and contained the tombs of those who had fallen in battle, and were buried at the public expense. From Plutarch it appears that the communication from the one Ceramicus to the other was by the gate Dipylum. Philostratus, however, speaks of the Ceramic entrance; and though I think it probable that he alludes to the Dipylum, I would not look upon this as certain. We shall now give some account of the buildings of the inner Ceramic, reserving the outer portion for our description of the suburbs of the city. The first edifice mentioned by Pausanias is the STOA BASILEIOS, so called because the archon Basileus held his court there. There is here a picture representing the achievements of the Athenian cavalry sent to assist the Lacedæmonians at the battle of Mantinea. This painting was by the celebrated Euphranor. The portico here described by Pausanias is probably that which Harpocration calls the Stoa of Jupiter Eleutherius, since Pausanias himself places a statue of this god in the immediate vicinity. He next mentions the temple of Apollo Patrous, in which was a statue by Euphranor, two other statues by Leochares, and Calamis adorned the front: this latter temple was dedicated to Apollo Alexicacus, as having put an end to the pestilence which caused such a dreadful mortality during the Peloponnesian war. The METROUM was a temple consecrated to the mother of the gods, whose statue was the work of Phidias. Here the archives of the state were deposited; it served also as a tribunal for the archon eponymus. Adjacent to the Metroum was the senate house (βουλευτήριον) of the Five Hundred who formed the annual council of the state. It contained statues of Jupiter Counsellor, (βουλαῖος,) of Apollo, and the Athenian demos. Close to the council-hall stood the THOLUS, where the Prytanes held their feasts and sacrifices; this building was also called Scias. Somewhat above were the statues of the eponymi, or heroes who gave their name to the Athenian tribes; also statues of Amphiaraus, Lycurgus the orator, and Demosthenes. Near the latter was a temple of Mars, having several statues within, and around it those of Hercules, Theseus, and Pindar, who was thus honoured for the praise he bestowed on the Athenians. Near these stood the figures of Harmodius and Aristogiton. All the statues here mentioned were carried away as spoils by Xerxes, when he possessed himself of Athens, but they were afterwards restored by Antiochus. Above the Stoa Basileios, Pausanias notices a temple of Vulcan, containing statues of that god and of Minerva, also the temple of Venus Urania, with a statue of the goddess in Parian marble, the work of Phidias. These buildings stood probably towards the western end of the ridge of Areopagus. The STOA POECILE was so called from the celebrated paintings it contained; its more ancient name is said however to have been Peisianactius. The pictures were by Polygnotus, Micon, and Pamphilus, the most famous among the Grecian painters, and represented the battles of Theseus against the Amazons, and that of Marathon and other achievements of the Athenians. Here were suspended also the shields of the Scionæans of Thrace, and those of the Lacedæmonians, taken in the isle of Sphacteria. It was in this portico that Zeno first opened his school, which from thence derived the name of Stoic. No less than 1500 citizens of Athens are said to have been destroyed by the thirty tyrants in the Pœcile. Col. Leake supposes that some walls which are still to be seen at the church of Panaghia Fanaromeni are the remains of this celebrated portico. Near the Stoa Pœcile was a statue of Mercury Agoræus, which, from its position close to a small gate, was sometimes termed Ἑρμῆς πρὸς τῇ πολίδι. From the name of Agoræus we must conclude also that this brazen figure stood in the ancient AGORA, which is known from various passages in classical writers to have formed part of the Ceramicus. Xenophon also informs us, that at certain festivals it was customary for the knights to make the circuit of the Agora on horseback, beginning from the Hermes, and, as they passed, to pay homage to the temples and statues around it. The Agora was afterwards removed to another part of the town, which formerly belonged, according to Strabo, to the demus of Eretria, and where it still continued to be held in the time of Pausanias. Mr. Hawkins conceives that this change took place subsequently to the siege of the city by Sylla, since, after 'the Ceramicus had been polluted with the blood of so many citizens, the Agora was removed to a part of the city which was at this period in every respect more central and convenient for it, and where it is remarkable that the market of the modern Athenians still continues to be held at the present day.' Col. Leake also observes, 'that as the city stretched round the acropolis, the Agora became enlarged in the same direction, until at length the best inhabited part of the city, being on the north side of the acropolis, the old Agora having been defiled by the massacre of Sylla, and its buildings falling into decay, the Agora became fixed, about the time of Augustus, in the situation where we now see the portal of that Agora.' There was a street lined with Mercuries in the Agora, which communicated between the Stoa Basileios and the Pœcile. The Macra Stoa was a range of porticoes extending from the Peiraic gate to the Pœcile. Behind it rose the hill called COLONUS AGORÆUS, where Meton erected a table for astronomical purposes. At a later period it was the resort of labourers, who came there to be hired. We hear also of an altar consecrated to the twelve gods in the Agora. The LEOCORIUM, which probably no longer existed in the time of Pausanias, since he has omitted all mention of it, stood also in the Ceramicus. It was a monument in honour of the daughters of Leos, who had devoted themselves for their country. Near this spot Hipparchus was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The Ceramicus contained also the Agrippeium or theatre of Agrippa, and the Palæstra of Taureas. The Stoæ of the Thracians and of Attalus were likewise in the same quarter. The Agora was divided into sections, distinguished from each other by the means of the several articles exhibited for sale. One quarter was called Cyclus, where slaves were bought, and also fish, meat, and other provisions. We hear of the γυναικεῖα ἀγορὰ where they sold women's apparel, the ἰχθυόπωλις ἀγορὰ, or fish-market, the ἱματιόπωλις ἀγορὰ, clothes-market, also, the ἀγορὰ Ἀργείων, Θεῶν, Κερκώπων; in the latter stolen goods were disposed of. A peculiar stand was allotted to each vender, which he was not allowed to change. In the Ceramicus was the common hall of the mechanics of Athens. This quarter was also much frequented by courtesans. In the New Agora Pausanias notices the altar of Pity, worshipped by the Athenians alone. Not far from thence was the Gymnasium, called Ptolemæum, from its founder Ptolemy, son of Juba the Libyan. Cicero speaks of another Gymnasium also named Ptolemæum, which is supposed to have been established by Ptolemy Philadelphus. Near it was the celebrated temple of Theseus, erected to that hero after the battle of Marathon. This noble structure, which has suffered but little from the injuries of time, has been converted into a Christian church. It is formed entirely of Pentelic marble, and stands upon an artificial foundation formed of large quadrangular blocks of limestone. Pausanias next passes on to the ANACEIUM, or temple of the Dioscuri, a building of great antiquity, and containing paintings of Polygnotus and Micon. The name of Anaceium was derived from that of Ἄνακες, applied by the Athenians to Castor and Pollux. Above the Anaceium, which, from the passages referred to, must have stood at the foot of the acropolis, was the sacred enclosure of AGLAURUS, by which the Persians ascended to the citadel, and scaled its ramparts. Near this spot was situated the PRYTHANEIUM, where the written laws of Solon were deposited. Here were several statues, among others that of Vesta, before which a lamp was kept constantly burning. There were also the statues of Good Fortune, of Miltiades, and of Themistocles. Pausanias then proceeds to notice the temple of Serapis, whom Ptolemy had introduced among the Athenian deities. Some remains of this building are supposed to exist near the church of Panaghia Vlastiki. Not far from it was another temple, consecrated to Lucina. He next points out several buildings erected in this part of the city by Hadrian, which from that circumstance, as we learn by an inscription, was sometimes called HADRIANOPOLIS. The OLYMPEIUM was one of the most ancient of the sacred edifices of Athens, since it is said to have been originally founded by Deucalion. A more magnificent structure was afterwards raised by Pisistratus on the site of the old building, but he did not live to accomplish his undertaking; and during the numerous wars in which the Athenians were afterwards engaged, it remained in a neglected state. In the reign of Augustus it is said that the different kings in alliance with that emperor had jointly undertaken to complete the unfinished structure of the Olympeium. But it is certain that it was not finally terminated until the time of Hadrian, who, as we learn from Spartianus, was present at the dedication. The whole peribolus was four stadia in circuit, and was crowded with statues of Hadrian, each of the Grecian cities having supplied one; but the Athenians surpassed all in the very remarkable Colossus they had raised behind the temple. In the peribolus were several antiquities, such as a Jupiter in brass, the temple of Saturn and Rhea, the temenus of Olympia, and the chasm through which the waters of Deucalion's flood are said to have retired. To Deucalion is attributed the most ancient temple of Jupiter Olympius; and his tomb was shown not far from the present building. Hadrian also embellished Athens with other edifices; namely, a temple of Juno, another of Jupiter Panhellenius, and a temple common to all the gods. But the most remarkable of these was a building in which were 120 columns of Phrygian marble. There was also a gymnasium erected by that emperor, in which were to be seen 100 columns of African marble. The site of this building is now occupied probably by the church of Panaghia Gorgopiko. From the Prytaneium a street led towards the Olympeium after diverging to the west of that edifice; it was called the street of the Tripods, from the circumstance of its being lined with small temples, where prize tripods were usually deposited: of this description was the beautiful little choragic monument of Lysicrates, vulgarly called the Lantern of Demosthenes, which serves as an excellent illustration of this passage of Pausanias, and points out accurately the site and direction of the street to which he refers. One of the temples contained a satyr, which was regarded by Praxiteles himself as his chef d'œuvre. Near this quarter was the LENÆUM, a most ancient sanctuary of Bacchus, and probably the same to which Thucydides alludes as the temple of that god in Limnis. Near the Lenæum stood the celebrated Dionysiac theatre, in which, as we learn from Pausanias, were many statues of tragic and comic poets; among the latter, Menander is the most celebrated. Here were also the effigies of the famous tragic writers Euripides, Sophocles, and Æschylus; that of the latter was done long after his death. In this theatre, which, according to Dicæarchus, was the most beautiful in existence, dramatic contests were decided. From Plato we may collect that it was capable of containing 30,000 spectators. The situation of the Dionysiac theatre is a disputed point among the writers on Athenian topography; but Col. Leake, I think, has satisfactorily proved that it must have stood near the south-eastern angle of the acropolis. Like the other theatres of Greece, its extremities were supported by solid piers of masonry, while the middle of it was excavated on the side of the hill. Not far from thence was the ODEIUM of Pericles, said to have been constructed in imitation of the tent of Xerxes. Plutarch informs us it was richly decorated with columns, which terminated in a point. Xenophon states, that during the tyranny of the Thirty the Odeium was generally occupied by their satellites. It was afterwards set on fire by Aristion, general of Mithridates, who defended Athens against Sylla. We learn however from Vitruvius, and an inscription cited by Col. Leake, that the building was afterwards restored at the expense of Ariobarzanes king of Cappadocia. No vestiges have yet been discovered which can be ascribed to this building, nor are there any remains of the Lenæum and the temples which it once enclosed; but this may be accounted for by the evident accumulation of soil which has taken place under this end of the acropolis. The Cecropian citadel, which forms so conspicuous a feature in the topography of Athens, was situated on an elevated rock, abruptly terminating in precipices on every side, with the exception of its western end, from whence it was alone accessible. Here stood the magnificent PROPYLÆA of the acropolis, erected by Pericles, which, though intended only as an approach to the Parthenon, were supposed to rival that edifice in beauty and dimensions. This work was probably designed as well for the purposes of security and defence as that of ornament, from the massive solidity of its construction. The whole was of Pentelic marble, and, as Pausanias informs us, the size of the blocks surpassed all that he had ever seen. It consisted of a great vestibule, with a front of six Doric columns; behind which was another supported by as many pillars of the Ionic order; these formed the approach to the five gates or entrances to the citadel. On each side were two wings projecting from the great central colonnade, and presenting a wall simply adorned with a frieze of triglyphs. This great structure is said to have been five years in progress, and to have cost 2000 talents. Pausanias informs us that the Propylæa were ornamented with equestrian statues. On the right stood a temple of Victory Apteros. On the left a building containing several paintings representing different events which occurred at the siege of Troy. Near the entrance to the acropolis were the statues of Mercury Propylæus, and the three Graces, said to be the work of Socrates. The PARTHENON, or temple of Minerva, was placed on the summit of the acropolis, being far elevated above the Propylæa and the surrounding edifices. It occupied apparently the site of an older temple called Hecatompedon, also dedicated to Minerva, and which had been destroyed in the Persian invasion. In beauty and grandeur it surpassed all other buildings of the kind, and was constructed entirely of Pentelic marble. The architect was Ictinus. Those who have studied its dimensions inform us that it consisted of a cell, surrounded with a peristyle, having eight Doric columns in the two fronts, and seventeen in the sides. These were six feet two inches in diameter at the base, and thirty-four feet in height, standing upon a pavement, to which there was an ascent of three steps, the total elevation of the temple being 65 feet from the ground; the length was 228, and the breadth 102 feet. It was also enriched both within and without with matchless works of art by the first sculptors of Greece. We learn from Pausanias, that those which decorated the pediment in front related to the birth of Minerva, and those behind to the contest between the goddess and Neptune for Attica. The statue of Minerva was of ivory and gold. On the summit of the helmet was placed a sphinx, with griffins on each of the sides. The statue itself was erect, and clothed in a robe reaching to the feet. On the breast was a head of Medusa wrought in ivory, and a figure of Victory about four cubits high. She held a spear in her hand, and a shield lay at her feet; near the spear was a serpent, which might be supposed to represent that of Erichthonius. According to Pliny the figure was twenty-six cubits high. The whole was executed by Phidias, who had further contrived that the gold with which the statue was encrusted might be removed at pleasure. The sculpture on the pedestal represented the birth of Pandora. Pausanias also notices the statues of Iphicrates, Pericles, and his father Xantippus, Anacreon, and a brazen Apollo, by Phidias. On the southern wall were sculptured the war of the giants who inhabited Pallene, and the battle of the Athenians and Amazons; also that of Marathon, and the defeat of the Gauls in Mysia, presented by Attalus. Here was likewise the statue of Olympiodorus, who freed the Athenians from the Macedonian yoke in the time of Cassander. On the northern side of the acropolis stood the Erechtheium, or temple of Erechtheus, a building of great antiquity, since it is alluded to by Homer, and adjoining it was the temple of Minerva Polias, the tutelary deity of the city, whose statue is said to have been a common offering of the demi before they were collected into one metropolis by Theseus. The lamp which was suspended in the sanctuary was never suffered to be extinguished. Another part of this compound building was the Pandrosium, or chapel, sacred to Pandrosus, one of the daughters of Cecrops. The Erechtheium contained the olive tree, and the well of salt water, produced by Minerva and Neptune during their contest for Attica, also the serpent of Erichthonius. In the temple of Minerva Polias was a wooden Hermes, said to have been presented by Cecrops, a chair, made by Dædalus, and some spoils of the Medes, such as the silver-footed seat of Xerxes, the sword of Mardonius, and the breastplate of Masistius. Cecrops was said to have been buried in the acropolis; and it is probable that a chapel was consecrated to him under the name of Cecropium. We are informed by Xenophon that the temple of Minerva was burnt in the twenty-third year of the Peloponnesian war, but it is not known by whom it was subsequently restored. The whole of the acropolis was surrounded by walls raised on the natural rock, of which the entire hill is composed. The most ancient part of these fortifications was constructed by the Tyrrheni Pelasgi, who, in the course of their migrations, settled in Attica, and, being probably skilled in works of this nature, were employed by the Athenians in the erection of these walls. Pausanias mentions the names of Agrolas and Hyperbius as being probably the chiefs of the colony. The rampart raised by this people is often mentioned in the history of Athens under the name of Pelasgicum, which included also a portion of ground below the wall at the foot of the rocks of the acropolis. This had been allotted to the Pelasgi whilst they resided at Athens, and, on their departure, it was forbidden to be inhabited or cultivated. It was apparently on the northern side of the citadel as we are informed by Plutarch that the southern wall was built by Cimon, from whom it received the name of Cimonium. Another portion appears from Thucydides to have been constructed under the administration of Themistocles; and there is still great evidence of the haste with which the historian describes that work to have been performed on the termination of the Persian war. From the acropolis Pausanias proceeds to the Areopagus, or hill of Mars, which rises at a little distance from thence to the north-west. It was so called in consequence, as it was said, of Mars having been the first person tried there for the murder of Halirrhothius son of Neptune. The Pnyx was, in the days of Athenian greatness, the usual place of assembly for the people, especially during elections. It appears to have been situated on rising ground opposite the Areopagus, and in a line with the Propylæa of the acropolis, which faced it to the east. It was also close to the walls of the city, as we learn from the scholiast to Aristophanes. The celebrated Bema, from which the orators addressed the people, was a simple pulpit of stone, which at first looked to the sea, but in the time of the thirty Tyrants it was turned towards the interior of the country. Some traces of this ancient structure are still to be seen on a hill, the situation and bearings of which answer perfectly in all respects to what has been collected from ancient authorities relative to the Pnyx. The Museium was another elevation in the same vicinity, to the south-west of the acropolis, and, like the Pnyx, included also within the ancient periphery of the city wall. It is said to have been named from the poet Musæus, who was interred there. At a much later period a monument was erected here by Philopappus, a descendant of the kings of Commagene, and who, having been consul under the reign of Trajan, retired to Athens, as we learn from the inscription on this structure. Pausanias, who cursorily notices the monument, simply says it belonged to a Syrian. After speaking of the Areopagus, the same writer proceeds to mention some other courts of judicature of less note. The Parabystum, where petty causes were tried: the Trigonum, so called from its shape: Batrachium and Phœnicium, from their colour. The Heliœa, a tribunal of much greater importance, which is often alluded to by Aristophanes and other classical writers, was situated near the Agora, and so named from its being held in the open air. The PALLADIUM was a court in which persons accused of murder were tried; those who confessed its perpetration, but were prepared to defend the act, were judged in the DELPHINIUM, which tribunal was probably near the temple of Apollo Delphinius. Having now noticed the principal buildings and monuments within the city, we must proceed to remark upon those in its suburbs and environs. The quarter called CŒLE was appropriated to sepulchres, and consequently must have been without the town, since we are assured that no one was allowed to be interred within its walls. Cimon and Thucydides were both entombed in this quarter. Cœle is classed by Hesychius among the Attic demi. Col. Leake places with great probability this hollow way or valley, 'to the south of the acropolis, near the gate of Lambardhari, which answers to the Portæ Melitenses.' MELITE, of which Pausanias makes no mention, is supposed by the same judicious antiquary to have been principally within the walls. Here also was the place of rehearsal for the tragic actors, the EURYSACEUM or sanctuary of Eurysaces son of Ajax, and the temple of Menalippus. Melite was a demus of the tribe Œneis, but, according to Harpocration, of the Cecropian. COLYTTUS was another suburban demus. It was remarked that the children of this place were very precocious in their speech. Plato, according to some writer quoted by Diog. Laert. in his life of the philosopher, was a native of Colyttus, as also Timon the man-hater. Æschines the orator was said to have resided here for forty-five years. It is sometimes written Collyttus, as may be seen from some inscriptions cited by Spon, t. II. p. 427. Near the Ilissus stood another Odeium, as Pausanias informs us, which was adorned with various statues of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, as well as of Philip and Alexander, Lysimachus and Pyrrhus. This was apparently one of the minor theatres, and probably erected by some prince of the Macedonian dynasty. In the same vicinity was the ELEUSINIUM, or temple of Ceres and Proserpine, set apart for the celebration of the lesser Eleusinian mysteries. It stood probably in an island formed by the Ilissus, which is well adapted for so sacred and retired a sanctuary, and where the foundations of an ancient building are still observable. Near the Eleusinium, and on the left bank of the Ilissus, was the STADIUM erected for the celebration of games during the Panathenaic festival by Lycurgus, the son of Lycophron, as we find in Plutrach's life of that orator. Antiquaries affirm that the area of this building remains entire, together with other vestiges. Higher up the river was Agræ and the temple of Diana Agrotera. Herodotus reports that a temple was erected to Boreas by the Athenians, to commemorate the storm which destroyed so many of the Persian ships on the coast of Magnesia. Beyond was the LYCEIUM, a sacred enclosure dedicated to Apollo, where the polemarch formerly kept his court. It was decorated with fountains, plantations, and buildings by Pisistratus, Pericles, and Lycurgus, and became the usual place of exercise for the Athenian youths who devoted themselves to military pursuits. Nor was it less frequented by philosophers and those addicted to retirement and study. We know that it was more especially the favourite walk of Aristotle and his followers, who thence obtained the name of Peripatetics. Here was the fountain of the hero Panops, and a plane-tree of great size and beauty mentioned by Theophrastus. The position commonly assigned to the Lyceium is on the right bank of the Ilissus, and nearly opposite to the church of Petros Stauromenos, which is supposed to correspond with the temple of Diana Agrotera on the other side of the river. AREOPAGUS was a judicial court on the banks of the Ilissus, and not far removed from the Stadium. CYNOSARGES was a spot consecrated to Hercules, and possessed a gymnasium and groves frequented by philosophers. Here was a tribunal, which decided upon the legitimacy of children in doubtful cases. After the victory of Marathon the Athenian army took up a position at Cynosarges, when the city was threatened by the Persian fleet, which had sailed round the promontory of Sunium. Cynosarges is supposed to have been situated at the foot of mount Anchesmus, now the hill of St. George, and to the south-west of Asomato. In the same vicinity we must place the demus of DIOMEIA, which, according to Steph. Byz. appertained to the tribe Ægeis. From Aristophanes we collect that a festival was celebrated here in honour of Hercules. Pausanias speaks of ANCHESMUS as an inconsiderable height, with a statue of Jupiter on its summit. It now takes its name from the church of St. George, which has replaced the statue. Proceeding beyond this hill round the walls of the city, we shall arrive at the outer CERAMICUS, which contained the remains of the most illustrious warriors and statesmen of Athens. Here were interred Pericles, Phormio, Thrasybulus, and Chabrias; the road, in fact, was lined as far as the Academy on either side with the sepulchres of Athenians who had fallen in battle. Over each tomb was placed a pillar with an inscription recording the names of the dead, and those of their demi and tribes. One column commemorated the names of those who had fallen in Sicily; that of Nicias, however, was excepted, in consequence of his having surrendered himself to the enemy; while Demosthenes was adjudged worthy of having his name inscribed for this reason, that having capitulated for his army, he refused to be included in the treaty, and made an attempt on his own life. Here were also the cenotaphs of those who fell in the naval fight at the Hellespont, in the battle of Chæronea, and during the Lamiac war. Beyond were the tombs of Cleisthenes, who increased the number of the Attic tribes; of Tolmides; of Conon and Timotheus, a father and son, whose exploits are only surpassed by those of Miltiades and Cimon. Here were interred Zeno and Chrysippus, celebrated Stoics, Harmodius and Aristogeiton, and the orators Ephialtes and Lycurgus. The latter is said to have deposited in the public treasury 6500 talents more than Pericles had been able to collect. It was in the outer Ceramicus that the games called Lempadephoria were celebrated. The Academy was at the extremity of this burial ground, and about six stadia from the gate Dipylum. 'A few scattered olives grow on it, and some paces further west we saw a number of gardens and vineyards, which contained fruit-trees of a more exuberant growth than in any other part of the plain.' A little to the north-west of the Academy was the demus of COLONUS, named Hippeios from the altar erected there to the Equestrian Neptune, and rendered so celebrated by the play of Sophocles as the scene of the last adventures of Œdipus. From Thucydides we learn that Colonus was distant ten stadia from the city, and that assemblies of the people were on some occasions convened at the temple of Neptune. The celebrated long walls which connected Athens with its several ports were first planned and commenced by Themistocles after the termination of the Persian war; but he did not live to terminate this great undertaking, which was continued after his death by Cimon, and at length completed by Pericles. Sometimes we find them termed the legs, (σκέλη,) and by Latin writers the arms, (brachia,) of the Piræus. One of these was designated by the name of Piraic, and sometimes by that of the northern wall, βορεῖον τεῖχος; its length was forty stadia. The other was called the Phaleric, or southern wall, and measured thirty-five stadia. The intermediate wall, (διαμέσον τεῖχος,) spoken of by some ancient writers, may have been that portion which was enclosed between the two longomural arms. In the Peloponnesian war, the exterior or Piraic wall alone was guarded, as that was the only direction in which the enemy could advance, there being no passage to the south and east of Athens, except through a difficult pass between the city and mount Hymettus, or by making the circuit of that mountain, which would have been a very hazardous undertaking. The long walls remained entire about fifty-four years after their completion, till the capture of Athens by the Peloponnesian forces, eleven years after which, Conon rebuilt them with the assistance of Pharnabazus. Col. Leake informs us that some vestiges of this great work are still to be seen. 'They are chiefly remarkable towards the lower end, where they were connected with the fortifications of Piræus and Phalerum. The modern road from Athens to the port Drako, at something less than two miles short of the latter, comes upon the foundations of the northern long wall, which are formed of vast masses of squared stones, and are about twelve feet in thickness. Precisely parallel to it, at the distance of 550 feet, are seen the foundations of the southern long walls; the two walls thus forming a wide street, running from the centre of the Phaleric hill exactly in the direction of the entrance of the acropolis.' Maritime Athens may be considered as divided into the three quarters of PIRÆUS, MUNYCHIA, and PHALERUM. 'PIRÆUS,' says Pausanias, 'was a demus from the earliest time, but it did not become a port for ships before the administration of Themistocles. Hitherto Phalerum had been the usual harbour, as it was nearest the sea; and Menestheus is said to have sailed from thence for Troy, and Theseus for Crete. But Themistocles perceiving that the Piræus presented greater advantages for the purposes of navigation, and contained three ports instead of one, when he was placed at the head of the government, caused it to be adapted for the reception of shipping. And now there are still remaining the covered docks, and the tomb of Themistocles, close to the largest of the harbours; for it is said that the Athenians having repented of their conduct towards him, his relatives conveyed thither his remains from Magnesia.' Strabo compares the maritime part of Athens to the city of the Rhodians, since it was thickly inhabited, and enclosed by a wall, comprehending within its circuit the Piræus and the other ports which could contain four hundred ships of war. These lines being connected with the long walls, which were forty stadia in length, united the Piræus with the city. But, during the many wars in which the Athenians had been engaged, they were demolished, and the Piræus is now reduced to a few habitations, which stand round the ports and the temple of Jupiter Soter. The temple alluded to by the geographer is doubtless the same described by Pausanias as the temenus of Minerva and Jupiter, in which were deposited the statues of these two deities in brass. That of Minerva was an admirable work by Cephissodotus. The arsenal, erected and supplied by the architect Philo, was said to suffice for the equipment of a thousand ships. It was destroyed by Sylla. The maritime bazar or emporium was called MACRA STOA, and was situated near the sea. The agora named HIPPODAMEIA was at a greater distance from the coast; it was so called from Hippodamus, a Milesian, who had been employed by Themistocles to fortify the Piræus, and to lay out its streets as well as those of the capital. The place called DEIGMA seems to have answered the purpose of an exchange or mart, where goods were exhibited for sale. The SERANGIUM was a public bath. The PHREATTYS was a court of justice which took cognizance of murders when the party accused, having been acquitted for an involuntary act, was now tried for a voluntary crime. The defendant in this case was ordered to plead on board a ship, while the judges heard him from the shore. The port of Piræus was subdivided into three lesser havens, named CANTHARUS, APHRODISIUM, and ZEA. The former was appropriated to dock-yards for the construction and repairs of ships of war. This was probably the innermost of the three basins. Aphrodisium seems to have been the middle or great harbour, and Zea the outermost, so called from the grain which the Athenians imported from the Hellespont and other parts, and deposited in storehouses erected there for that purpose. The entrance to the Piræus was formed on one side by the point of land called Eetioneia, on the other by Cape Alcimus. EETIONEIA was fortified towards the close of the Peloponnesian war by the council of Four Hundred, with a view of commanding the entrance of the harbour, and admitting, if necessary the Peloponnesian fleet. They erected also a large building, in which they caused all imported corn to be deposited. Eetioneia, according to Col. Leake, was that projecting part of the coast which runs westward from the north side of the entrance into the Piræus, and is now called Trapezona. Piræus itself is known by the name of Port Drako, or Leone, derived from a colossal figure of a lion in white marble, which once stood upon the breach, but was removed by the Venetians in 1687. The port of MUNYCHIA was so called, as it is said, from Munychus, an Orchomenian, who, having been expelled from Bœotia by the Thracians, settled at Athens. Strabo describes it as a peninsular hill, connected with the continent by a narrow neck of land, and abounding with hollows, partly natural and partly the work of art. When it had been enclosed by fortified lines, connecting it with the other ports, Munychia became a most important position from the security it afforded to these maritime dependencies of Athens, and accordingly we find it always mentioned as the point which was most particularly guarded when any attack was apprehended on the side of the sea. The whole peninsula abounds with remains of walls, excavations in the rocks for the foundations of buildings, and other traces of ancient habitations. Cape Alcimus, according to Plutarch, was a headland near the entrance of Piræus, close to which was to be seen the tomb of Themistocles, built in the shape of an altar. Phalerum was the most ancient of the Athenian ports; but after the erection of the docks in the Piræus it ceased to be of any importance in a maritime point of view. It was, however, enclosed within the fortifications of Themistocles, and gave its name to the southernmost of the long walls, by means of which it was connected with Athens. Pausanias notices in this demus, belonging to the tribe Antiochis, a temple of Ceres, and another of Minerva Sciras; also a temple of Jupiter at some distance from the shore. Here were, besides, altars sacred to the Unknown Gods, the sons of Theseus, the hero Phalerus, and Androgeus son of Minos, and the tomb of Aristides. Phalerum supplied the Athenian market with abundance of the little fish named aphyæ so often mentioned by the comic writers. The lands around it were marshy, and produced very fine cabbages. The modern name of Phalerum is Porto Fanari." Cramer. The ancients, to distinguish Athens in a more peculiar manner, called it Astu, one of the eyes of Greece, the learned city, the school of the world, the common patroness of Greece. The Athenians thought themselves the most ancient nation of Greece, and supposed themselves the original inhabitants of Attica; for which reason they were called αυτοχθονες produced from the same earth which they inhabited, γηγενεις sons of the earth, and τεττιγες grasshoppers. They sometimes wore golden grasshoppers in their hair as badges of honour, to distinguish them from other people of later origin and less noble extraction, because those insects are supposed to be sprung from the ground. The number of men able to bear arms at Athens in the reign of Cecrops was computed at 20,000, and there appeared no considerable augmentation in the more civilized age of Pericles; but in the time of Demetrius Phalereus there were found 21,000 citizens, 10,000 foreigners, and 40,000 slaves.

Athenæum, I. a place at Athens, sacred to Minerva, where the poets, philosophers, and rhetoricians generally declaimed and repeated their compositions. It was public to all the professors of the liberal arts. The same thing was adopted at Rome by Adrian, who made a public building for the same laudable purposes.——II. A promontory of Italy.——III. A fortified place between Ætolia and Macedonia. Liv. 38, c. 1, l. 39, c. 25.

Athesis, now Adige, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising in the mountains of Tyrol, and, after flowing nearly 200 miles, emptying north of the Po into the Adriatic. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.

Athos, a mountain of Macedonia, 150 miles in circumference, projecting into the Ægean Sea like a promontory. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of the mountain, into which he brought the sea-water, and conveyed his fleet over it, so that two ships could pass one another; thus desirous either to avoid the danger of sailing round the promontory, or to show his vanity and the extent of his power.—A sculptor, called Dinocrates, offered Alexander to cut mount Athos, and to make with it a statue of the king holding a town in his left hand, and in the right a spacious basin, to receive all the waters which flowed from it. Alexander greatly admired the plan, but objected to the place; and he observed that the neighbouring country was not sufficiently fruitful to produce corn and provisions for the inhabitants which were to dwell in the city in the hand of the statue. Athos is now called Monte Santo, famous for monasteries, said to contain some ancient and valuable manuscripts. Herodot. 6, c. 44, l. 7, c. 21. &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 672.—Ælian. de Anim. 13, c. 20, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10.—Æschin. contra Ctesiph.

Athrulla, a town of Arabia Felix. Strab.

Athymbra, a city of Caria, afterwards called Nyssa. Strab. 14.

Atina, 1. one of the most ancient cities of the Volsci, situated to the south-east of Arpinum, a considerable town as early as the Trojan war according to Virgil. Its situation, among the loftiest summits of the Appenines, is marked by Silius Italicus. It was taken by the Romans A. U. C. 440. According to Cicero it was a præfectura, and one of the most populous in Italy. It is now Atins. Cram.—Æn. 7, 629. —Cic. Pro. Planc.——II. A town of Lucania, not far from the Tanager, now Atena.

Atlantes, a people of Africa in the neighbourhood of mount Atlas, who lived chiefly on the fruits of the earth, and were said not to have their sleep at all disturbed by dreams. They daily cursed the sun at his rising and at his setting, because his excessive heat scorched and tormented them. Herodot.

Atlantides, a people of Africa, near mount Atlas. They boasted of being in possession of the country in which all the gods of antiquity received their birth. Diod. 3.

Atlantis, an island mentioned by the ancients, particularly by Plato in his Timæus and Critias, generally placed in the Atlantic ocean. Much diversity of opinion has existed in regard to it. It is commonly considered an island of the Atlantic, but some (Vid. Lempriere, Art. Atlantis, 6th American edition,) by "a diligent examination" of ancient writers, discover it to have been an extensive region, somewhere or other "engulphed by some subaqueous convulsion of nature."

Atlas, a mountain of Africa, of poetical celebrity. It is at present obscurely known to Europeans. M. Desfontaines considers it as divided into two leading chains. "The southern one adjoining the Desert, is called the Greater Atlas; the other, lying towards the Mediterranean, is called the little chain. Both run east and west, and are connected together by several intermediate mountains running north and south, and containing between them both valleys and table lands. But it is worthy of remark, that the great and little Atlas of Ptolemy, the one of which is terminated at Cape Felneh, and the other at Cape Cantin, differ from the chains of the French traveller, being lateral branches which go off from the main system to form promontories on the sea-coast."—"The great height of mount Atlas is proved by the perpetual snows that cover its summits in the east part of Morocco, under the latitude of 32°. According to Humboldt's principles, these summits must be 12,000 feet above the level of the sea."—M. Desfontaines found in the mountains large heaps of shells and marine bodies at a great distance from the sea, a phenomenon noticed by all modern travellers. According to Pliny, "the sides of the Atlas which look to the western ocean, that is, the south sides, raise their arid and dark masses abruptly from the bosom of a sea of sand; while the more gentle northern declivity is adorned with beautiful forests and verdant pastures." M. Ideler denies that the mountains above described were the Atlas of the ancient poets. He is of opinion, that the Phœnicians, who frequented the Archipelago of the Canaries, were astonished at the height of the Peak of Teneriffe; and that the Phœnician colonies "brought to Greece some information respecting that mountain which towered above the region of the clouds, and the happy islands over which it presides, embellished with oranges or golden apples." Hence Homer's Atlas, with its foundations in the depths of the ocean, and the Elysian fields, situated somewhere in the west. Hesiod adds to this, that Atlas was a neighbour of the Hesperian nymphs; to which later poets have added the embellishments of the Hesperides, their golden apples, and the islands of the Blessed. When the Greeks passed the columns of Hercules, they looked for Atlas on the western coast of Africa. It is thus that Strabo, Ptolemy, and other geographers, have altered its position.—To this opinion Malte-Brun objects. He is of opinion that the name Atlas was first applied to an isolated promontory, and cites a passage in Maximus Tyrius in support of this hypothesis. "The Ethiopian Hesperians worshipped mount Atlas, who is both their temple and idol. The Atlas is a mountain of moderate elevation, concave, and open towards the sea in the form of an amphitheatre. Halfway from the mountain a great valley extends, which is remarkably fertile, and adorned with fruit trees. The most wonderful thing is to see the waves of the ocean at high water overspreading the adjoining plains, but stopping short before mount Atlas, and standing up like a wall, without penetrating into the hollow of the valley. Such is the temple and the god of the Libyans; such is the object of their worship and the witness of their oaths." "In the physical delineations," says Malte-Brun, "contained in this account, we perceive some features of resemblance to the coast between Cape Tefelneh and Cape Geer, which resembles an amphitheatre crowned with a series of detached rocks." Vid. Part III. Malte-Brun.—Plin. 5, 1.—*Hom. ATRAX, I. "an ancient colony of the Perrhæbi, was ten miles from Larissa, higher up the Peneus, and on the right bank of that river. It was defended by the Macedonians against T. Flaminius. Dr. Clarke was led to imagine that this city stood at Ampelakia, from the circumstance of the green marble, known to the ancients under the name of Atracium Marmor, being found there; but it is evident from Livy that Atrax was to the west of Larissa, and only ten miles from that city; whereas Ampelakia is close to Tempe and distant more than fifteen miles from Larissa." Cram.——II. A city of Thessaly, whence the epithet of Atracius.——III. A river of Ætolia, which falls into the Ionian Sea.

ATREBATES, a powerful people of Gallia Belgica, contiguous to the Morini and Nervii. Strabo styles them Ἀτρέβατοι (Atrebati), and Ptolemy Ἀτρεβάτιοι (Atrebatii), and calls their chief city Ὀπιγιακόν, a name cited by no other ancient writer. Nemetacum or Nemetocenna, now Arras, or, as the Flemings call it, Atrecht, was their city. In the Nervian war they pledged themselves for 15,000 armed men. Till the time of Cæsar they were independent. He set over them Commius. Their territory is included in the modern l'Artois, or, more properly, at the present time, Département du PAS-DE-CALAIS. D'Anville.—Cæs. Lemaire, Ind. Geog.

ATREBATII, a people of Britain, north of the Belgæ, towards the Thames. Otherwise called Atrebati, Atrobatæ.

ATROPATENE, or ATROPATIA, a province of Armenia, contiguous to Media, so called from Atropates, its satrap, who, in the dissensions which reigned among the Macedonian generals, after the death of Alexander, rendered himself independent, and took the title of king, which his successors enjoyed for many ages. The name now given to this country is Aderbigian, from the Persian term Ader, signifying fire, according to the tradition that Zerdust, or Zoroaster, lighted a pyre or temple of fire in Urmiah, a city of this his native country. We find also in an Arabian geographer Atrib-Kan, in which it is easy to recognise Atropatena. The capital is named Gaza or Gazaca, and its position is that of Tebriz, or, as it is more commonly pronounced, Tauris. D'Anville.

ATTALIA, a city of Pamphylia, built by king Attalus. The modern site is called Palaia Antalia. The present city of Antalia, or, as it is commonly called, Satalia, corresponds with the ancient Olbia. D'Anville.

ATTICA, a country of Greece, to the south of Bœotia. Its name is said to have been derived from that of Atthis, daughter of Cranaus. Previous to the reign of Cranaus, however, it was called Acte, either from a chief Actæus, or from its extent of coast (ἀκτὴ). Its more obscure appellation of Mopsopia was deduced from the hero Mopsopus or Mopsops. From Cecrops the country was called Cecropia, and it was not till the reign of Erechtheus that it assumed its present appellation. Attica was remarkable for the poverty of its soil, in consequence of which, according to Thucydides, it never changed its inhabitants. To this fact we are to attribute the pride of the Athenians in regard to their antiquity, which indulged itself in the hyperbolical assertion of their being sprung from the earth. "Attica may be considered as forming a triangle, the base of which is common also to Bœotia, while the two other sides are washed by the sea, having their vertex formed by Cape Sunium. The prolongation of the western side, till it meets the base at the extremity of Cithæron, served also as a common boundary to the Athenian territory as well as that of Megara. The whole surface of the country contained within these limits, according to the best modern maps, furnishes an area of about 730 square miles, allowing for the very hilly nature of the ground. It appears that the whole population of Attica, about 317 B. C., at which time a census was taken by Demetrius of Phalerum, was estimated at 528,000; of these, 21,000 were citizens, who had a vote in the general assembly of the people. The μετοικοι, or residents, who paid taxes but had no vote, amounted to 10,000; and the slaves to 400,000; which, with a proportionate allowance of women and children, furnishes the number of souls above-mentioned." "The whole of Attica had been divided, as early as the time of Cecrops, into four tribes or wards (φυλαι,) but these were afterwards increased to ten by Cleisthenes, which were severally named after some Athenian hero, who was considered as its ἀρχηγὸς or ἀρχηγέτης. Each tribe had also its president or chief, distinguished by the title of Phylarch (φυλαρχος); these commanded also the cavalry. The word φυλέτης denoted an individual belonging to one of the ten tribes." "The names of these wards we collect from ancient writers to have been as follows: 1. Erechtheis, named after Erectheus.—2. Ægeis, from Ægeus, father of Theseus. 3. Pandionis, from Pandion, son of Erechtheus.—4. Leontis, after the three daughters of Leos, who were said to have devoted themselves to avert a pestilence from their country.—5. Acamantis, from Acamas, son of Theseus. This was the tribe of Pericles.—6. Œneis, from Œneus, grandson of Cadmus.—7. Cecropis, from Cecrops.—8. Hippothoontis, from Hippothoon, son of Neptune and Alope.—9. Æantis, from Ajax, the son of Telamon.—10. Antiochis, from Antiochus, the son of Hercules. Antigonis and Demetrias were added to the number, in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes and his father Antigonus. But the names of these two tribes were afterwards changed to those of Attalis and Ptolemais, in compliment to kings Attalus and Ptolemy, son of Lagus. Each tribe was subdivided into demi or boroughs, the head officer of which was called demarch (δήμαρχος); this arrangement is by some ascribed to Solon, by others to Cleisthenes. The number of the Attic demi is stated to have been 170 or 174, and most of their names are preserved to us." Cram.

Atuatici, or Aduatici, a people of Belgic Gaul, contiguous to the Nervii on the one hand and the Eburones on the other. They were of Celtic origin. The situation of the town of the Atuatici, taken by Cæsar, is a disputed point. Some make it to have been Namurcum (Namur): but D'Anville disproves this, and conceives it to be Falais sur la Mehaigne, the situation of which agrees well with the description of Cæsar. Cæs. Lem. Ind. Geog.

Aturia, a name sometimes applied to the whole of Assyria, though proper only to a particular canton of the country in the environs of Nineveh. D'Anville.

Aturus, a river of Gaul, now the Adour, which runs at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains into the bay of Biscay. Lucan. 1, v. 420.

Avalites sinus, a gulf of the Erythræan sea. Its port, now Zeila, corresponds with the emporium of the Avalites, with whom a Nubian nation was associated. D'Anville.

Avaricum, the chief city of the Bituriges Cubi, in Gallia Celtica. It was situated on the Avara, a southern branch of the Ligeris. In the course of time it received the names of Castrum Mediolanense and Bituriga; the latter from the name of the people; and this, assuming in charts the form of Biorgas, has at length been changed into Bourges. The modern town is in the province le Berry, now departément du Cher.—Cæs. Lem. Ind. Geog.

Avella. Vid. Abella.

Avenio, a rich town of Gallia Narbonensis, on the Rhone, now Avignon, the chief city of the Department of Vaucluse. From 1305 to 1377 it was the residence of the popes. Avignon is dear to the lover of romance, from its association with the memory of Petrarch and Laura. The fountain of Vaucluse is in its vicinity.

Aventicum, or Avanticum, now Avenche, the chief town of the Helvetii.

Aventinus, one of the seven hills of Rome, which, together with the space intervening between its base and the Tiber, composed the thirteenth region of the city. "The origin of the name Aventine seems quite undetermined, though it was currently reported to be derived from Aventinus Silvius, king of Alba, who was buried here. One part of this mount was known by the name of Saxum; the other, of Remuria, from Remus, who is said to have taken his station there when consulting the auspices with a view to founding Rome. The ascent to the Aventine was called Clivus Publicius, having been made by two brothers named Publicii, with certain sums of money which they had embezzled as Curule Ædiles, and which they were compelled to expend in this manner. The Publicii are said to have erected also a temple of Flora on this site. In the same vicinity Roman antiquaries place the baths of Decius; a temple of Diana, which faced the Circus Maximus; and a temple of Luna. That of Juno Regina was built and consecrated by Camillus, after the capture of Veii. The church of St. Maria Aventina, which belongs to the knights of Malta, is supposed to stand on the site of an ancient temple sacred to Bona Dea. Antiquities are not agreed on which side of mount Aventine to place the cave of the robber Cacus; but that is a question too much allied to fiction to be treated of seriously. The other antiquities connected with this hill are, the altar of Evander; the sepulchre of Tatius, in a grove of laurels; the Armilustrum, a place in which soldiers were exercised on certain holidays; a temple of Minerva. The altar of Laverna, the tutelary goddess of thieves, was near the Porta Lavernalis. The altar of Jupiter Elicius, dedicated by Numa, was also on the Aventine. At the foot of the hill issued a rivulet, called the fountain of Picus and Faunus. It is not certain on which part of the hill the temple of Liberty was placed. This edifice, which was constructed by the father of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, is often mentioned in the history of Rome on account of the hall contiguous to it. That building contained the archives of the censors, and was the place in which those officers transacted a great part of their business. Having been consumed by fire, it was rebuilt on a much larger scale by Asinius Pollio, who also annexed to it a library, which was the first building of the kind opened to the public at Rome. The house of Ennius the poet was on the Aventine. At the foot of the Aventine, and close to the Tiber, were the ancient Navalia, or docks, of Rome. The river was here adorned with several porticoes, and an emporium was established outside the Porta Trigemina. Besides these porticoes, Livy mentions the temples of Hercules, of Hope, and of Apollo Medicus, as being near the Tiber. The public granaries stood in this quarter, on account of the convenience, probably, which the river afforded of landing the wheat, which came from Sicily, Egypt, and Africa." Cram.

Avernus lacus, now Lago d'Averno, a lake of Campania, in the vicinity of Cumæ, connected by a narrow passage with the Lucrine lake, which intervened between it and the bay of Baiæ. It was surrounded on every side, except this outlet, by steep hills; its depth was reported to be unfathomable. The story of birds becoming stupified by its exhalations, whence it is said to have obtained its name (ἄορνος,) is well known from Virgil; but Strabo expressly states the whole story to be fabulous; nor is he, of course, more inclined to attach credit to the accounts which placed here the scene of Ulysses' descent to the infernal regions, and his evocation of the dead, as described in the Odyssey, together with the subterraneous abodes of the Cimmerians. According to Heyne, however, the vicinity of Avernus abounded in caves, occupied by Troglodytæ, whence the fables of the Cimmerians; and the dense woods which covered the neighbouring hills, adding to the gloomy nature of the place, made it an appropriate scene for the necromantion, or invocation of the manes. If we further take into consideration the volcanic character of the surrounding country, it will not appear wonderful that the imagination of the Greeks, excited by the exaggerated tales of navigators, fixed here the Phlegræi Campi, and the place of punishment of the rebellious giants: and finally established a connexion between the mysterious Avernus and the infernal regions. "The groves and forests which covered the hills around the Avernus, were dedicated, it seems, to Hecate; and sacrifices were frequently offered to that goddess. These groves and shades disappeared when M. Agrippa converted the lake into a harbour, by opening a communication with the sea and the Lucrine basin. This harbour, which was called Portus Julius in honour of Augustus, served for exercising the galleys; and it is to this circumstance that he is said to have been indebted for his victory over Sextus Pompeius." Cram.—Æn. 6.—Heyne. Exc. 2, 3.

Aufidena, now Alfidena, the principal town of the Caraceni, in Samnium, on the Sagrus or Sarus, now Sangro. It was taken by a Roman consul, A. U. C. 454, and became a military colony and a municipal town. Cram.

Aufidus, now Ofanto, a river of Apulia, which rises in the Appenines and empties into the Hadriatic. The plain between this river and Cannæ was the scene of Hannibal's signal victory. Polybius remarks, that this river is the only one, which, rising on the western side of the Appenines, finds its way through that continuous chain into the Adriatic. But the Aufidus cannot be said to penetrate entirely through the chain of these mountains, since it rises on one side of it, while the Silarus flows from the other. Cram.] Augeæ, the homeric name of Ægiæ, a town of Laconia, situated 30 stadia from Gythium. In its vicinity was a small lake, with a temple of Neptune on the shore. Cram.

Augusta, I. Ausciorum, the metropolis of the Ausci, a people of that part of Aquitania called Novem populana. Vid. Ausci. D'Anville.——II. Emerita, a colony of veterans or pensioners, founded by Augustus, on the Anas in Lusitania. It was the residence of the prætor or governor of the province, and the capital of a conventus. It is now Merida, on the Guadiana.——III. Prætoria, a city in the territory of the Salassi, built upon the spot occupied by the camp of Terentius Varro during the exterminating war carried on against that people by order of Augustus, who gave his name to the new city. It is now Aoste, from which the fine valley in which it lies is called, and where several remains of the ancient city are still to be seen. According to Pliny, Augustus Prætoria was reckoned the extreme point of Italy to the north. Cram.——IV. Rauracorum, now Augst, a colony founded under the auspices of Augustus, and sometimes called simply Rauraci, from the people in whose territory it is situated. It is on a bend of the Rhine, a little above Basle. D'Anville.——V. Suessionum, the capital of the Suessiones, in Belgica, on the Axona. By some supposed to be the Noviodunum Suessionum of Cæsar. It is now Soissons.—Cæs. Lem. Ind. Geog.——VI. Taurinorum, the capital of the Taurini, plundered by Hannibal soon after his descent of the Alps. Appian calls it Taurasia. As a Roman colony it was named as above, and is now Torino or Turin, the present capital of Piedmont. Cram.——VII. Trevirorum, now Treves, the metropolis of Belgica Prima. It served as the residence of several Roman emperors, whom the care of superintending the defence of this frontier retained in Gaul. D'Anville.——VIII. Tricastinorum, a town of the Tricastini, on the Rhone, now St. Paul-Trois-Chateaux.——IX. Vagiennorum, the capital of the Vagienni, now Vico, according to D'Anville; more probably, according to Durandi, the modern Bene. Cram.——X. Veromanduorum, the capital of the Veromandui, now St. Quintin.——XI. Vindelicorum, a powerful colony established in the angle formed by the two rivers Vindo and Licus. It is now Augsburgh, between the rivers Lech and Wertach; the former of which separated Suabia from Bavaria. D'Anville.

Augustobona, the capital of the Tricasses, on the Sequana, now Troyes, formed by the gradual corruption of the ancient name.

Augustoritum, now Limoges, the capital of the Lemovices in Aquitania.

Aulerci, a people of Gaul, inhabiting that part which was called Lugdunensis. They were divided into the Brannovices, the Cenomani, the Diablintes, and the Eburovices. The district of country inhabited by the first is not precisely known, but it is pretty well ascertained that they dwelt upon the banks of the Loire; or, like the rest of the Aulerci, between that river and the Seine, in that which was afterwards the province of Maine. The Cenomani occupied a tract of country belonging afterwards to Maine and Orleans. They were among the most eminent of the Gallic tribes, and are mentioned by name among the Celtæ who passed the Alps in the reign of the Tarquins. The Diablintes dwelt upon the west and north-west of the Cenomani, having upon their north the Eburovices, who occupied so much of that part of the country which was afterwards conquered by the Northmen, and took from them the name of Normandy, as has since been formed into the department de L'Eure. They have been confounded with the Eburones, and their name became afterwards by corruption Ebroici. Cæs. B. G. 7, 75, and 3, 17.—Liv. 5, 34.

Aulis, a town of Bœotia, on the Euripus, nearly opposite to Chalcis. The harbour, according to Strabo, was so small that not more than fifty vessels of the Grecian fleet could be moored in it; from whence he infers that not the port of Aulis, but that of Bathys, must have been the true rendezvous of the Greeks when about to sail for Troy. Diana seems to have been peculiarly an object of worship at Aulis; and Pausanias observes that though the place was greatly reduced and almost depopulated in his day, the temple of that goddess was still in existence. The harbour is now called Megalo-Vathi. Eurip. Iph. in Aul. 120.—Hom. 2, 496 and 303.—D'Anville. Vid. Iphigenia.

Aulon, I. the name of a fertile ridge and valley of Apulia, on the left bank of the Galæsus. Its beauty and fertility are celebrated by Horace and Martial; the former of whom compares the wine produced in this region to the famous Falernian. It is now Terra di Melone. Hor. 2, 6.—Mart. 13, ep. 125.——II. The name of that part of Messenia which lay on the Neda near its mouth, and was separated by that river from Triphylia of Elis and from Arcadia. Paus.—Messen. 36.—Strab.——III. Cilicius, the strait lying between Cilicia in Asia Minor and the island of Cyprus was called Aulon Cilicius.——IV. A name of the Magnus Campus, or plain lying along the course of the Jordan, from the Tiberian lake to that of Asphaltides. It is called by the Arabs el Gour.

Auranitis, now Belad-Hauran, a tract of country, having, as some suppose, a town of the same name, on the confines of Syria and the desert of Arabia, with which its limits were confounded, on the east. It had Iturea on the north, which formed a part of the same boundary. Josephus.—D'Anville.

Aurasius mons, now Gebel Auras, a mountain of Numidia. It is represented as offering a rugged and uncultivated appearance, but with extensive fields and fertile spots upon its top. Procop.—D'Anville.

Ausunci, an ancient people of Latium, sometimes confounded with the Ausones, but distinguished by Livy. They occupied at first the northern part of this region bordering on the Volsci, but were driven by that people towards the south, and settled near the borders of Campania and the Ausones. "Some vestiges of their principal town, Aurunca, it is said, may still be traced near the church of Santa Croce, situated on the elevated ridge which rises in the vicinity of Rocca Monfina." Liv. 2, 16 and 17.—Virg. 7, 725.—Cram. Anc. Gr.

Ausci, the inhabitants of a part of Aquitaine, among the bravest of the various races that dwelt in that region. Their capital was Clemberris till the time of Augustus, when it assumed the name of Augusta in compliment to that sovereign. At a later period it was known by the name of the people who dwelt in it, and was called Ausci; whence its modern name of Auscli in Gascony and the modern department of the Gers. Ptol.—Plin.

Auser, Auseris, and Anser, now the Serchio, a river of Etruria. It rises in the Appenines, towards the borders of the northern duchy of Modena, and, running south-west after passing by the city of Lucca, it empties into the Arno between the city of Pisa and the sea.

Ausones, a people of Italy of remote antiquity, and whose origin is unknown. It is believed by some, who consider them to have been originally a powerful tribe, that they extended over a wider region; but at the period at which they are found in connexion with Roman history they were confined to the narrow region lying between the Liris and the coast. In poetry the name of Ausonia is often intended to signify the whole of Italy. This may have arisen from the fact, that Ausonia was among the parts of the peninsula first known to the Greeks, from whom it may have come as a poetical designation of their country to the Italians themselves. A part of this region still bears the ancient name; and here it is pretended the early Ausona, the capital of the Ausones, was situate. This place is known in history but from the account which Livy gives of the massacre of the inhabitants. The principal ancient authorities on this subject are Dion. Hal. 1, 11.—Strab. Vid. also Cram. An. It.

Autariatæ, an Illyrian tribe, at one time the most powerful of all the semi-barbarous people residing in those parts. They were frequently engaged in war with the Ardiæi of Dalmatia, whose territory they bounded on the south. They were conquered at last by the Scordisci. Diod. Sic.—Strab.

Autolŏlæ, a people of Mauritania, descended from the Gætuli.

Automatæ, one of the Cyclades, between the islands of Theræ and Therasia. It arose from beneath the water, probably from the action of submarine fire, in the time of Pliny the naturalist. It was called also Hiera.

Autūra, the Eure, a river of Gaul which falls into the Seine.

Auxinum, now Osimo, a Roman colony, and one of the strongest towns of Picenum. It stood not far from Ancona, on the Flaminian Way. Vel. Pat. 1, 15.

Axēnus, the ancient name of the Euxine Sea. The word signifies inhospitable. Ovid. 4, Trist. 4, v. 56.

Axius, a river of Macedonia. It rises in the chain of mount Scardus, and empties into the gulf of Thessalonica. Its present name is the Vardar, derived from that of Bardarus, which it bore in the middle ages. All the principal rivers of Macedonia, except the Strymon and its tributaries, fall into this stream. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

Axona, a river of Belgic Gaul, now the Aisne. It rises in the lands of the ancient Remi, and discharges itself into the Oise, the ancient Isara.

Axus, a town about the middle of Crete. Apollod.

Azan, a tract of country lying between the Ladon and the Alpheus. It is so named, according to the mythologist, from Azan, the son of Arcas, who gave his name to Arcadia. Paus.—Arcad. 25.

Azeris, a place of Libya, surrounded on both sides by delightful hills covered with trees, and watered by a river where Battus built a town. Herodot. 4, c. 157.

Azōtus, now Ashdod, a large town of Judæa, near the borders of the Mediterranean. Joseph. Ant. Jud. 15.

Babylon, I. a celebrated city, the capital of the Assyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates. It had 100 brazen gates; and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, and greatly enlarged and embellished by the activity of Semiramis, measured 480 stadia in circumference, 50 cubits in thickness, and 200 in height. It was taken by Cyrus, B. C. 538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town through the dried bed; and it is said that the fate of the extensive capital was unknown to the inhabitants of the distant suburbs till late in the evening. Babylon became famous for the death of Alexander, and for the new empire which was afterwards established there under the Seleucidæ. Vid. Syria. Its greatness was so reduced in succeeding ages, according to Pliny's observations, that in his time it was but a desolate wilderness, and at present the place where it stood is unknown to travellers. The inhabitants were early acquainted with astrology. Plin. 6, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3.—Justin. 1, &c.—Diod. 2.—Xenoph. Cycrop. 7, &c.—Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 2.—Martial. 9, ep. 77.——II. There is also a town of the same name near the Bubastic branch of the Nile, in Egypt.

Babylōnia, I. the surname of Seleucia, which rose from the ruins of Babylon under the successors of Alexander. Plin. 6, c. 26.——II. A country of Asia, forming once a portion of the Assyrian monarchy. It was bounded on the east by Susiana, on the north by Mesopotamia, on the west by Arabia Deserta, and on the south by a part of the Sinus Persicus and the Happy Arabia. This was the country known as Chaldæa, and was of greater extent than that which was generally included under the name of Babylonia. The capital was Babylon.

Babylōnii, the inhabitants of Babylon, famous for their knowledge of astrology, first divided the year into 12 months and the zodiac into 12 signs.

Babyrsa, a fortified castle near Artaxata, where Tigranes and Artabazus kept their treasures. Steph. Byz.

Bacenis, a part of the great Hercynian forest, described by Cæsar in the 6th book of his Bell. Gall. These woods, according to the best authorities, constituted the natural separation between the Suevi on the east and the Cherusci on the west. All authors, however, do not agree upon this point; and it may be considered as doubtful still what portion of the great wilderness to which it belonged was intended by ancient writers in the name of Bacenis. It is a part of the famous Hartz, according to the authority followed above.

Bactra, and Zariaspe, now Balk, the capital of Bactriana. It was divided by the Bactrus, which ran through it, and from which it took its name. Ancient authors themselves are at variance in regard to the real site of this capital city. Plin.—Strab.—Ptol.

Bactri, and Bactriāni, the inhabitants of Bactriana, who lived upon plunder, and were always under arms. They were conquered by Alexander the Great. Vid. Bactriana. Curt. 4, c. 6, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 23.—Plut. in vitios. ad infell. suff.-Herodot. 1 and 3.

Bactriāna, a country of Asia, forming a part of the Persian empire. It was bounded on the north by the river Oxus, on the west by Margiana, on the south by the mountains called Parapamisus, and on the east by the chain that connects those mountains with the Imaus. According to D'Herbelot, the name is derived from Bacter, which signifies the East. The extent of this country was not at all periods the same, and, to consider it properly, we must treat of it as it stood in the time of Alexander; and separately, as it existed under the empire of his successors. At the latter period it included a portion of India. The inhabitants had early advanced in civilization; and Zoroaster, the law-giver of Persia, is pretended by some to have flourished in Bactriana. Strab.—Q. Curt.—Arr.

Bactros, now Dahesh, a river from which Bactriana receives its name. Like the other rivers of that country it runs almost in a straight line from south to north, and empties into the Oxus, which separates Bactriana from Sogdiana. Lucan. 3, v. 267.

Bacuntius, a river of Pannonia, which falls into the Save above Sirmium. Some writers suppose it to be the Bosna, from which the province of Bosnia takes it name, and of which it is a principal stream. According to D'Anville it is now the Bozzuet.

Badia, a town of Spain, by some supposed to be the modern Badajoz, on the Guadiana. Val. Max. 3, 7.

Baduhennæ, a sacred grove in the country of the Frisii, where 900 Romans were killed. Tacit. 4. Ann. c. 73.

Bætica, a part of Spain, corresponding, for the most part, to the present Andalusia. It formed, at first, a part of the division of Hispania Ulterior; and a province apart, when, after having completely reduced the whole peninsula, the Romans divided all Spain into Tarraconensis, Bætica, and Lusitania. Bætica was confined by the Anas (Guadiana) and the Mediterranean on the north and south, on the west it was washed by the Atlantic, and on the east, though its boundary was not so well defined, it may be considered to have extended to the Orospeda mons. All the region contained between the Anas and the Bætis was called Bæturia; and that which bordered on the left of the latter river, inhabited by the Bastetani, Bastuli, and Turdetani, a name applied, perhaps, to the whole country by the natives before the Roman dominion. The surname of Pœni, by which the Bastuli were distinguished, continued to mark the connexion of Bætica with the empire of the Carthaginians in Europe. It derived its name from the river Bætis, which flowed completely through it, almost east and west. It was considered by the Romans as the most important part of their Spanish provinces, and is said to have contained no less than eight Roman colonies, the same number of municipal cities, and at least 29 others enjoying the privileges of the Italian towns. It submitted earlier than the rest of Spain to the yoke of the despotic republic.

Bætis, a river of Spain, from which a part of the country has received the name of Bætica. It was formerly called Tartessus, and now bears the name of Guadalquiver. The wool produced there was so good, that Bætica was an epithet of merit applied to garments. Vid. Bætica. Martial. 12, ep. 100.

Bæturia, a part of Bætica. The inhabitants were of two distinct origins: the Celtici, who border on Lusitania, and the Turduli, who border on Lusitania and Tarraconensis. Vid. Bætica.

Bagrada, now Megerda, a river of Africa, now Utica, where Regulus killed a serpent 120 feet long. Towards its mouth it stagnates, and, overflowing its banks, is formed into pools and lakes which overspread the adjacent country. Plin. 8, c. 14.

Baiæ, a city of Campania near the sea, between the promontory Misenum and Puteoli, the name of which, according to the mythologists, was from Baius, a follower of Ulysses. It was famous for its delightful situation and baths, where many of the Roman senators had country-houses. Its ancient grandeur, however, has now disappeared, and Baiæ, with its magnificent villas, has yielded to the tremendous earthquakes which afflict and convulse Italy, and it is no longer to be found. Martial. 14, ep. 81.—Horat. 1, ep. 1.—Strab. 5.

Baleares, two islands in the Mediterranean, modernly called Majorca and Minorca, on the coast of Spain. They were Carthaginian colonies before the wars of Carthage with the Roman republic, but were subjected to the latter by Metellus, thence called Balearicus. The chief town of Majorca retains its ancient name of Palma; and the Portus Magonis of the smaller island is yet extant in the modern Port Mahon. The island of Ivica, which lies near these, was not considered to belong to the Baleares, but, together with Ebusus and Ophiusa, was called in Greek "Pityusæ, the Isles of Pines." The Baleares were included in the province of New Carthage by their Roman conquerors. Mel. 2, 7, 199.—Liv.—D'Anville. By Apollonius, the Baleares are called Choerades; and by Strabo, Choeradades. The word Baleares is derived from βαλλειν, to throw, because the inhabitants were expert archers and slingers, besides great pirates. We are told by Florus, that the mothers never gave their children breakfast before they had struck with an arrow a certain mark in a tree. Strab. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 8.—Diod. 5.

Balista, a mountain of Liguria, corresponding with the Appenines about S. Pellegrino and Monte Balestra. Cram.—Liv. 40, c. 41.

Balla, also Valla, a town of Macedonia, not far from the foot of Olympus. It commanded the passage from Macedonia into Thessaly. Its site is now occupied by the town of Servitza. Plin. 4, 10.—Steph. Byz.—Cram.

Balyras, a river of Messenia. It was a principal branch of the Pamisus, and is now the Mauro Zoumena. Paus. 4, c. 33.

Bantia, now St. Maria de Vanse, a town of Apulia, whence Bantinus. Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 15.

Baphyrus, a river of Macedonia, called by Ptolemy Pharybas. Pausanias informs us that the first part of this stream from its fountain was called Helicon; that, after flowing some distance, it was lost, and running under ground a course of about 75 stadia, it rose again, assumed the name of Baphyrus, and discharged itself by that name into the Thermaic gulf. It belonged to that little district of Roumelia which was by the ancients called Pieria. Paus. Bœot. 30.—Lycoph. 273.—Cram.

Barathrum, a deep and obscure gulf at Athens, where criminals were thrown.—The word is applied to the infernal regions by Val. Flacc. 2, v. 86 and 192.

Barbaria, a name given to that part of the African coast which extends northward from Cape Gardafui. It was otherwise called Azania, now Ajan. D'Anville.

Barbosthenes, a mountain of Peloponnesus, 10 miles from Sparta. Liv. 35, c. 27.

Barce, a city of Cyrenaica, about nine miles from the sea, founded by the brothers of Arcesilaus king of Cyrene, 515 years before the Christian era. Strabo says that in his age it was called Ptolemais; but this arises because most of the inbabitants retired to Ptolemais, which was on the sea-coast, to enrich themselves by commerce. Strab. 17.—Ptol. 4, c. 4.

Barcino, now Barcelona, the capital of Catalonia, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis. It was a Roman colony.

Bardine, a river in the vicinity of Damascus, called by the Greeks Chrysorroas. It divides into many streams, of which some flow through the city, others through its environs. D'Anville.

Bargylie, a town of Caria, on the Sinus Jasius.

Barium, a town of Apulia, on the Adriatic, now called Bari. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 97.

Basilia, a town of the Rauraci, on the Rhine, now Basle, the capital of a Swiss canton of the same name.

Basilia, or Baltia. Vid. Abalus.

Basilipotamos, the ancient name of the Eurotas. Strab. 6.

Basilis, a city of Arcadia, built by Cypselus near the river Alpheus. Paus. 8, c. 29.

Bassæ, a village of Arcadia, near mount Cotylius. "Here was a temple of Apollo Epicurius. It was the most beautiful edifice of the kind in all Peloponnesus, with the exception of that at Tegea: the architect was Ictinus, who built also the Parthenon at Athens. A great part of this temple is yet standing; it was 125 feet in length, about 48 in breadth, and decorated with 48 columns of the Doric order, of which 36 are still in their places. The sculptures of the frieze, representing the battle with the Amazons, and that of the Lapithæ and Centaurs, were discovered in 1812, and have been deposited in the British Museum, and are called the Phigalean marbles. Vid. Phigalea. The site occupied by the ruins of that interesting edifice is now known by the name of the Columns." Cram.

Bastarnæ, and Basternæ, a people of European Sarmatia, destroyed by a sudden storm as they pursued the Thracians. Liv. 40, v. 58. —Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 198.—Strab. 7.

Batavi, a people of German origin, who separated from the Catti in consequence of domestic commotion, and migrating to Gaul, settled in the island enclosed by the ocean, the Vahalis (Waal), and the main branch of the Rhine. From them the island was called Batavorum Insula, and also Batavia; whence the modern Batavian Republic took its name. The Batavi, according to Tacitus, were peculiarly distinguished for their valour, and were for this reason exempt from paying tribute to the Romans, who used their services in war. Tacit. Germ. 29.

Bauli, a town of Campania, near the promontory of Misenum. According to tradition it was originally called Boaulia, from the circumstance of Hercules having landed there with the oxen of Geryon on his return from Spain. It was one of the most attractive spots on the coast. Bauli was the scene of Nero's successful plot against Agrippina, his mother. Cram.

Bedriăcum, or Bedriacum, a village of Gallia Cisalpina, near Cremona, which witnessed both the success of Vitellius over Otho, and the defeat of his generals by Antonius, lieutenant of Vespasian. It was situated on the Via Postumia, the road which led from Cremona to Mantua, about 15 miles from the former city, and at no great distance from the Po. Cluverius imagined that Canelo, on the river Oglio, might represent the situation of Bedriacum; but D'Anville is more accurate in fixing its position at Cividale. There was a temple and grove sacred to Castor between Cremona and Bedriacum. Cram.

Belgĭca, a third part of Gaul in the Cæsarian distribution, having on the west the ocean from the Seine to the principal mouth of the Rhine, and on the north the latter river as far as the territory of the Ubii, near the capital city Colonia Agrippina. Here the river makes an angle in coming from the south, and from hence it may be considered, together with the Vosges chain of hills, as the eastern boundary of Belgica as far as the Brigantinus Lacus (Lake of Constance.) The Alps continue the line as far as the source of the Rhone, which carries it around the south-east corner of this province as far as its junction with the Arar or Saone. The Seine and the Marne upon the south divided Belgica from Celtic Gaul. Within the limits thus defined this part of Gaul contained the modern countries of Holland south of the Rhine, the Netherlands, together with so much of Germany as lies upon the left bank of the same river, and contains the cities of Cleves, Cologne, Coblentz, and Worms, which all with other names were on the western boundary of Belgica in the time of Augustus, Tiberius, and Constantine. In addition to these were the French side of Switzerland and the provinces of Picardy, Artois, French Flanders, part of the Isle of France, Champaigne, Lorraine, Alsace, and Burgundy in France. A vast people inhabited this region, divided and subdivided into innumerable tribes. When the Romans effected its complete subjugation, they divided it at different times into smaller provinces. Augustus divided it into four, and the subdivision of one of these into Germania Prima and Germania Secunda remained so late as the era of Constantine. The early division into Belgica Prima and Belgica Secunda was formed by the course of the Mosa, Meuse, which traversed nearly the whole length of the province from south to north. Belgica Prima was possessed by the Luci, the Mediomatrici, and the Treveri; whose capital, after having for a period borne the name of Augusta, assumed at last that of the people, and became the capital of this subdivision, being also frequently the abode of the emperors during their residence in Gaul. Throughout the whole of that country the names of its different inhabitants have been in a great measure preserved in those of the modern towns of France, &c. while the names of the ancient places have been for the most part lost. Thus, in Belgica Secunda, Durocotorum, the capital of the Remi, was lost in the gentilitious name of Rheims, and Augusta of the Suessones in that of Soissons. So the Veromandui of the same province have transmitted their name in Vermandois, the Bellovaci in Beauvais, and the Ambiani, who had called their capital Samaro-Briva, have left their name to modern times in that of the city of Amiens. This part of Gaul was more properly called Belgium according to Cæsar's account; and its inhabitants, i. e. the Atrebates, the Ambiani, and the Bellovaci, may be considered as the Belgæ distinctly from the other people of Belgica. Their corner of the province lay upon the Fretum Gallicum, now Dover straits, extending inland to the Axona, now the Aisne, and the Oise, which empties into the Seine, a little below the present city of Paris. This, it will be seen, corresponds to the limits of the new kingdom of the Netherlands, exclusive of the disputed Luxemburgh. Besides these provinces, in the distribution of Augustus was the Great Sequanois, Maxima Sequanorum, lying south of the second Belgica, between Celtica upon the west and Italy upon the east, with the Province specially so called upon the south. Here the Jura chain of mountains formed a natural division between the Sequani and the Helvetii, the latter of which people extended themselves over the country lying along that mountain from Lake Constance to the Lake of Geneva. The subdivision into the two Germanies may be referred to the time of Tiberius, and is said by D'Anville to have been the earliest made in any part of Gaul after the division of the whole into four parts by Augustus, which succeeded the threefold division described in the Commentaries. Germania prima joined upon the south the Maxima Sequanorum. Its principal inhabitants were the Tribaci, the Nemetes, and the Vangiones, who supplanted the Leuci and the Mediomatrici upon the eastern frontier of Belgica bordering on Germany. The city of Strasburgh may be considered the capital. Between Germania prima and Germania secunda was the famous forest of Ardennes. The people of both these districts resembled the Germans in manners, appearance, and habits; but those of the second Germany in a greater degree than those of the first. Tribes from the right bank of the river were continually crossing to the Gallic side, and thus maintained the German characteristics, introduced at the early mingling of the strange tribes with the first Celts of those regions; and which, in the other parts of Belgica, had been more equally blended with those of the earlier inhabitants. In the remote corner of Belgica, between the Vahalis, now the Waal, and the proper Rhine, were situated the Batavi, considered the last of the Gauls. It may here be observed, that the first settlers of this portion of Gaul were Celts; but tribe after tribe, in subsequent years, having incorporated themselves with the first possessors, they together constituted the people afterwards called by ancient authorities Belgæ.

Bellovĭci. Vid. Belgica.

Benacus, a lake of Italy, now Lago di Garda, from which the Mincius flows into the Po. Virg. G. 2, v. 160. Æn. 10, v. 205. It formed the division between Venetia, and Cisalpine Gaul from the borders of Rhætia, which lay upon its northern extremity, to the Æmylian Way, which passed along its southern border; that is to say, a distance of about 30 miles from north to south, or 35 Roman miles. Its greatest width did not exceed 12 miles by the same ancient scale.

Bendidium, a temple of Diana Bendis at Munychia.

Beneventum, a town of the Hirpini, built by Diomedes, 28 miles from Capua. Its original name was Maleventum, changed into the more auspicious word of Beneventum when the Romans had a colony there. It abounds in remains of ancient sculpture above any other town in Italy. Plin. 3, c. 11. Though tradition and mythology confer upon Diomedes the honour of founding the city of Beneventum, more certain guides have traced its origin to the ancient Ausones. It received a Roman colony in the time of Augustus, consisting of the veterans of the emperor's army; and Nero supplied it in part with a new population. But the importance of this place commenced with the era of the Lombard conquests and rule in Italy. With a portion of surrounding country it was one of the dukedoms erected by those conquerors in Italy; and depending in name for a time upon the Lombard sovereign in the north, it quickly became a powerful independent state, and survived the ruin of the monarchy when Desiderius, the last of the Lombard kings, surrendered to the arms of Charlemagne. The German emperor Henry, some generations afterwards, conferred it on the Pope, and it became a part of the patrimony of the church. It is now a principal city of the kingdom of Naples, on the Volturno, the Vulturnus of antiquity.

Berea, the same as Berœa.

Berenice, I. the name of a town in Egypt, on the Arabian gulf. It was called Epidires, because it was situated on that contracted part of the Arabicus Sinus by which it communicated with the Erythrean Sea. This was the last town of Egypt, south, on the Arabian gulf, and was placed in the region called Cinnamonofera, from the quantity of cinnamon which that country produced. It was a place of trade with India, and was named after the mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Plin. 6, 27.—D'Anville.——II. Another of Cyrenaica in Libya, called also Hesperis, the fabled abode of the Hesperides.——III. Another, surnamed Panchrysos, on a bay of the Arabicus Sinus.——IV. A town in Arabia, at the head of the Ælanites Sinus, mentioned by Moses under the name of Ezion Geber. "From this place," says D'Anville, "the fleets of Solomon took their departure for Ophir, and the Arabic name of Minet ed-dahab, signifying the port of gold, had reference to the riches that were there debarked on the return from Ophir."

Bergistăni, a people of Spain, at the east of the Iberus. Liv. 34, c. 16.

Bergomum, now Bergamo, a town of the Orobii in Cisalpine Gaul on the Æmylian Way. It stood nearly midway between the Umatinus (Serio) and the Ubartus (Brembo), and is supposed to have been founded by some early Gallic tribes. Plin. 3, 17.—Just. 20.

Bermius mons, now Xero Livado, a mountain forming "a continuation of the great chain of Olympus." The mountain was said to be impracticable from the intensity of the cold, yet in its vicinity were fabled to have been the fruitful and flourishing gardens of Midas that bloomed spontaneously. Here the Temenidæ first established themselves in Macedonia. Herod. 8, 138.—Cram.

Bernus, or Bora mons, the southern extremity of the Scardus Mons, which separated Illyria from Macedonia.

Berœa, I. a city of Syria, which received this name in the time of the Macedonian princes. It is now Aleppo, the richest and most powerful city of Syria. D'Anville.——II. A town of Macedonia, now Kara Veria. This town of a very great antiquity, was situated at the foot of the Bermius Mons, and was distant from Pella, the capital of the country, about 30 miles. It is particularly mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and its inhabitants are commended for the readiness with which they received the gospel on the preaching of St. Paul. Thuc. 1, 61.—Acts, 17, 11.——III. A town "on the confines of the province of Thrace proper and Mœsia. This city, when re-established by the empress Irene, assumed her name." D'Anville.

Berrhœa. Vid. Berœa.

Berytus, now Berut, an ancient town of Phœnicia on the coast of the Mediterranean, famous in the age of Justinian for the study of law. Plin. 5, c. 20.

Besippo, a town of Hispania Bætica, where Mela was born. Mela. 2, c. 6.

Bessi, a people of Thrace, who lived upon rapine. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 67. They inhabited the district of country called Bessica towards the borders of Macedonia, and formed, as it is thought, a portion of the tribe called Satræ, which could boast that of all the Thracian people they alone had never been subdued. Bessica is believed to have extended from the sources of the Hebrus to the Nestus; but the Hæmus was the favourite resort of this predatory but spirited race. They were finally subdued by Augustus.—Flor. 12, 4. Herodot. 7, 110.

Betis, a river in Spain. Vid. Bætis.

Beturia, a country in Spain. Vid. Bætica.

Bibracte, a large town of the Ædui in Gaul, where Cæsar often wintered. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 55, &c. Ptolemy calls it Augustodunum, which of course it assumed after its subjugation by Cæsar and the accession of his successor. The corruption of this name gives the modern Autun.

Bigerrones, a people of Aquitaine, at the foot of the Pyrenees. The town of Bigorre occupies, it is supposed, the site of their capital.

Bilbilis, a town of Celtiberia, where Martial was born. It stood near a river named Salo, now Xalon; but Justin calls this river also Bilbilis. Its waters were "famous for tempering steel, which Martial accounts the best in the world." The town is now "known only," says D'Anville, "by the name of Baubola, in the vicinity of a new city constructed by the Moors called Calalayud." Just. 44, 3.—Mart. 1, ep. 50.

Bingium, a town of Germania Secunda, in Belgica. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 70.

Bisaltia, "that part of Macedonia between the lake Bolbe and the Strymon," says Cramer, "appears to have been called Bisaltia, from the Bisaltæ, a Thracian nation, who were governed by a king at the time of the invasion of Xerxes," and who fell under the rule of the Macedonians not long afterwards. Herodot. 7, 115.—Thucyd. 2, 99.

Bisanthe, a town of Thrace, upon the Propontis. It is now Rodosto, by corruption from the name of Rhœdestus, which it also bore with the ancients.

Bistonis, a lake of Thrace, near Abdera. Herodot. 7, c. 109. It is so called from the Bistones, a Thracian people, who dwelt upon its shores and ruled over the neighbouring inhabitants. The poets sometimes bestow the name of this people upon Thrace in general. Cram.

Bithynia, a country of Asia Minor, according to Strabo first peopled by the Mysiani, to whom succeeded the Thyni and Bithyni from Thrace. From these people the whole region took its name, having until the era of their settlement, been called Bebrycia. It was bounded on the north by the Euxine and the Thracian Bosphorus, on the east by Paphlagonia, on the south by the Galatæ, Tectosages, and a part of Phrygia, and on the west by the Propontis and Mysia, from which mount Olympus separated it. The principal towns of Bithynia were the royal city of Prusa, Nicomedia, and Nice. This country underwent various changes under its different possessors and masters. Thus, D'Anville remarks, "there was a time when the dependencies of Pontus extending to Heraclea, confined Bithynia within narrow bounds; and under the lower empire, the principal part of Bithynia, in the vicinity of the Propontis, assumed the name of Pontica, and the part adjacent to Paphlagonia composed a separate province named Honorias. The north-eastern corner, washed by the Euxine and the Propontis, was the peculiar seat of the Thyni." Strab. 12.—Herodot. 7, c. 75.—Mela, 1 and 2. According to Paus. 8, c. 9, the inhabitants were descended from Mantinea in Peloponnesus.

Bithynium, a town of Bythynia on the Bilbæus, in the country of the Caucones. It was the capital of the province of Honorias in the east of Bithynia, and became famous as the birth place of the beautiful Antinous, the favourite of the emperor Adrian.

Bituriges, a people of that part of Gallia Celtica which was added to the original Aquitania in the time of Augustus. They were among the principal of all the Gallic people before the arrival of Cæsar, and were under the government of a powerful king in the time of the Tarquins. They were placed between the Carnutes and Senones on the north, the Boii and Arverni on the east, the Lemovices on the south, and the Turones and Pictones on the west. These were the Bituriges Cubi. Another tribe of the same people, distinguished as the Vibisci, belonged to Aquitania Secunda, in which they were the principal tribe, as the Cubi were in Aquitania prima. Their capital was Burdigala, Bourdeaux. Vid. Aquitania.

Bizia, a citadel near Rhodope, belonging to the kings of Thrace. Tereus was born there.

Blandusia, a fountain in Apulia, "situated near Venusia, about six miles from Venosa, on the site named Palazzo." The more proper name was Bandusia. Cram.

Blemmyes, a people of Africa, near the cataracts of the Nile, who, as is fabulously reported, had no heads, but had the eyes and mouth placed in the breast. Mela. 1, c. 4.

Blucium, a castle where king Dejotarus kept his treasures in Bithynia. Strab. 12.

Boagrius, a river of Locris, sometimes called also Manes. It was rather a torrent than a river, and depended almost entirely on the seasons for its waters, being often quite dry. Strab. 9.

Bocalias, a river in the island of Salamis.

Bodotria fretum. The Frith of Forth.

Bodüni, a people of Britain, who surrendered to Claudius Cæsar. Dio. Cass. 60.

Boeæ, a town of Laconia, now perhaps Palæo Castro, on the Sinus Bœoticus.

Bœoticus sinus, at the southern extremity of the Peloponnesus, lying opposite the island of Cythera, and taking its name from the town of Boeœ, on its northern shore. Now the Gulf of Vatika.

Bœbëis, a lake of Thessaly, near mount Ossa, from which the Anchestus derives its waters. The name was taken from the town Bœbe, which stood upon its banks. It is now Carlos. Lucan. 7, v. 176.

Bœotia, a province of Greece, bordering on Phocis to the west and north-west. On the north its confines reached to the territory of the Locri Opuntii; it was bounded by the shore of the Euripus, from Halæ to the mouth of the Asopus, on the east; while to the south it was separated from Attica by the chain of Cithæron and the continuous range of Mount Parnes. The earliest inhabitants of this region were the Aones, Hyantes, &c. who formed, perhaps, a part of the great family to which belonged also the Leleges. Under Cadmus, Bœotia received a Phœnician colony, who, after being expelled at one time by the Thracians and Epigoni, and afterwards by powerful hordes of Pelasgi, succeeded in establishing themselves in this most fertile district of all Greece, and in conferring on it the name of Bœotia, from that which they had themselves assumed about the period of their second expulsion. When, like the other provinces of Greece, Bœotia rejected the monarchical form of government, the institutions established in their room were aristocratical, though not without a mixture of the democratical in their form; but the aristocracy greatly preponderated in the administration of the government and laws. This, and the natural jealousy of a powerful and arrogant neighbour, begot an early hostility between the Bœotians and Athenians, who, in every struggle of the democratic interest in Bœotia, were ready to lend their aid against the aristocracy of Thebes. Hence, in the Persian war, the Bœotians, with the exception of those of Platæa, were found assisting earnestly the Persian arms. The same feeling arrayed them on the side of the Lacedæmonians in the Peloponnesian war; and when the battle of Ægospotamoi determined the war in favour of the Spartans, the Bœotians zealously urged their victorious allies to perfect their conquest by the absolute destruction of Athens. When nothing was left for the Bœotians to fear on the side of their ancient enemy, they soon conceived an equal jealousy of that power which they had been greatly instrumental in forming; and an hostility of twelve years that thereupon ensued, was terminated only by the battles of Leuctra and Mantinea, "when Sparta saw a formidable army occupied in freeing Arcadia and Messenia from her chains, and menacing her own walls and existence." "After the last stand," says Cramer, "made by the Achæans for the liberties of Greece, Bœotia ceased to exist, and became included under the general name of Achaia, by which Greece was designated as a province of the Roman empire." The inhabitants were reckoned rude and illiterate, fonder of bodily strength than of mental excellence; yet their country produced many illustrious men, such as Pindar, Hesiod, Plutarch, &c. Bœotia is celebrated, moreover, for the port of Aulis, whence the Greeks departed for the siege of Troy; for the battle of Platæa, that established the liberties of Greece; and for the fatal field of Cheronæa, in which they expired for ever. Herod. 2, c. 49, l. 5, c. 57.—Ovid. Met. 3. v. 10.—Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.—C. Nep. 7. c. 11.—Strab. 9.—Justin. 3, c. 6, l. 8, c. 4.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 244.—Diod. 19.—Liv. 27, c. 30, &c.

Boii, a people of Celtic origin, coming originally from the neighbourhood of the Helvetii, and occupying a large district of Cisalpine Gaul, between the Po, the Tarus (Taro,) and the Appennines, corresponding, in some measure, to the duchies of Parma and Modena, and the Ecclesiastical state north of Tuscany. They waged the most destructive wars with the Romans, who were at length obliged to expel them from their ancient seats. They then appear to have taken up their residence in the tract of country lying within the Hercynian mountains, which separated them on the north-west from the Hermanduri, on the north-east from the Marsigni of the modern Silesia, on the south-east from the Quadi, who inhabited the present Moravia, and on the south-west from the Nasici, who dwelt between the hilly country and the left side of the Danube. "In the name of this country," observes D'Anville, "that of the more ancient people who occupied it is followed by a term in the German language which signifies habitation; and this name has continued to the same country in that of Bohemia, although the Boii had given place to the Marcomans, and these to a Sclavonic people who have possessed it since." On the entrance of the Marcomanni, the Boii "abandoned these their native seats," continues the same author, "and carried the same name with them into that now called Boiaria, Bagaria, or Bavaria." A small tribe of the Boii settled in the time of Cæsar in that part of Gaul which is now the Bourdonais; but De Mandajor places them in Le Bas-Forest.

It stood about midway between Ravenna on the coast of the Adriatic, Mutina now Modena, the Appenines, and the Po; and was exactly on the Æmylian Way.——II. A city on the Danube, below the mouth of the Save, on the site of which is Illok. ——III. Another on the Danube, now Bidin. ——IV. Borysthĕnes, a large river of Scythia, falling into the Euxine Sea, now called the Dnieper, and inferior to no other European river but the Danube, according to Herodotus, 4, c. 45. Above the city Kiov, in the modern province of Volhynia, the principal branches of this river unite. Of these the southern is now called the Prypec. It assumed, in the middle ages, the name of Denapris, which by corruption has become the Dnieper. The proper division of Poland and Russia was formed by this river before the dismemberment of the former unfortunate country. Very little of this river, or of the basin through which it flows, was known with accuracy by the people of antiquity. D'Anville.

Bosphŏrus, and Bospŏrus, two narrow straits, situated at the confines of Europe and Asia. One was called Cimmerian, and joined the Palus Mœotis to the Euxine, now known by the name of the straits of Caffa; and the other, which was called the Thracian Bosphorus, and by the moderns the strait of Constantinople, made a communication between the Euxine Sea and the Propontis. It is sixteen miles long, and one and a half broad; and, where narrowest, 500 paces or stadia, according to Herodotus. The word is derived from Βοοστροφος, bovis meatus, because, on account of its narrowness, an ox could easily cross it. Cocks were heard to crow, and dogs to bark, from the opposite banks; and in a calm day persons could talk one to another. Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 1.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 4, v. 49.—Mela. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.

Bottia, a colony of Macedonians in Thrace. The people were called Bottiæi. Plin. 4, c. 1. —Herodot. 7, c. 185, &c.—Thucyd. 2, c. 99.

Boulanum, an ancient colony of the Samnites, at the foot of the Appenines not far from Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 18.

Bovillæ, I. a town on the Appian Way, about ten miles from Rome. It was one of the first towns reduced by the Romans, and was among the conquests of Coriolanus. At Bovillæ took place the meeting of Milo and Clodius, which terminated in the death of the latter and in the perpetual banishment of his murderer. Flor. 1, 2.—Dion. Hal. 8, 20.—Cic. Orat. pro Mil.——II. Another, also in Latium, in the country of the Hernici, mentioned by Florus, 1. 2.

Brauron, a town of Attica, where Diana had a temple. The goddess had three festivals, called Brauronia, celebrated every fifth year by ten men, who were called ιεροποιοι. They sacrificed a goat to the goddess, and it was usual to sing one of the books of Homer's Iliad. The most remarkable that attended were young virgins in yellow gowns, consecrated to Diana. They were about ten years of age, and therefore their consecration was called δεκατευειν, from decem; and sometimes αρκτευειν, as the virgins themselves bore the name of αρκτοι, bears, from this circumstance. There was a bear in one of the villages of Attica, so tame that he ate with the inhabitants, and played harmless with them. This familiarity lasted long, till a young virgin treated the animal too roughly, and was killed by it. The virgin's brother killed the bear, and the country was soon after visited by a pestilence. The oracle was consulted, and the plague removed by consecrating virgins to the service of Diana. This was so faithfully observed, that no woman in Athens was ever married before a previous consecration to the goddess. The statue of Diana of Tauris, which had been brought into Greece by Iphigenia, was preserved in the town of Brauron. Xerxes carried it away when he invaded Greece. The ruins of Brauron are pointed out by modern travellers near the spot now called Palaio Braona. Chandler calls the modern site Vrouna. Cram.—Paus. 8, c. 46. —Strab. 9.

Brigantinus lacus, now the lake of Constance or Border-Zee, a lake belonging equally to Vindelicia and Rhætia, or the latter alone, if, with Tacitus, we consider Vindelicia as a part of Rhætia.

Brilessus, a mountain of Attica. Thucyd. 2, c. 23.

Britannia, now Great Britain, the largest island known to the people of antiquity; the sea north of Britannia was entirely unknown to them. On the east the island was bounded by the Oceanus Germanicus, now the North Sea or German Ocean; on the south by the Fretum Gallicum, Pas de Calais or Straits of Dover, and the Brittanicus Oceanus, the English Channel; and on the west it was separated from Hibernia by the Verginium Mare, St. George's Channel, and the Mare Internum vel Hibernicum, now the Irish Sea. "At the time of the Roman occupation of this island, its population comprised about forty tribes. The long tract of land to the south of the Severn and Thames was unequally portioned among ten nations, of which the principal were the Cantii, men of Kent; the Belgæ, or inhabitants of the present counties of Hampshire and Wilts; and the Damnonii, who, from the river Ex, had gradually extended themselves to the western promontory. Across the arm of the sea, now the Bristol Channel, the most powerful was the tribe of the Silures. From the banks of the Wye, their original seat, they had carried their arms to the Dee and the ocean; and their authority was acknowledged by the Ordovices and the Dimetæ, the inhabitants of the northern mountains and of the western district of Wales. On the eastern coast of the island, between the Thames and the Stour, lay the Trinobantes, whose capital was London; and from the Stour to the Humber stretched the two kindred nations of the Iceni, called Cenimagni and Cortanni. The Dobunii and Cassii, confederate tribes under the rule of Cassibelan, extended along the left bank of the Thames, from the Severn to the Trinobantes; and above them dwelt the Carnabii, and several clans of minor consequence. The Brigantes were the most powerful of all the British nations. They were bounded by the Humber on the south, and by the Tyne on the north; and had subdued the Volantii and Sistuntii of the western coast. To the north of the Brigantes were five tribes, known by the general appellation of the Mæatæ; and beyond these wandered, amid the lakes and mountains, various clans, among which the Caledonians claimed the praise of superior courage or superior ferocity." "When the Roman conquests of Britain had reached their utmost extent, they were irregularly divided into six provinces, under the government of prætors appointed by the præfect. The long tract of land which runs from the western extremity of Cornwall to the South Foreland in Kent, is almost separate from the rest of the island by the arm of the sea now called the Bristol Channel, and by the course of the river Thames. This formed the most wealthy of the British provinces; and from priority of conquest or proximity of situation, was distinguished by the name of Britannia Prima. Britannia Secunda comprised the present principality of Wales, with the addition of that tract which is included by the Severn in its circuitous course towards St. George's Channel. Flavia Cæsariensis was the next in order but the first in extent. It was bounded on two sides by the former provinces, and on the two others by the Humber, the Don, and the German Ocean. To the north of the Humber lay the province of Maxima. It reached to the Eden and Tyne, and its opposite shores were washed by the western and eastern seas. Valentia followed, including the Scottish lowlands, as far as the Friths of Clyde and Forth. The tribes beyond the Friths formed the sixth government of Vespasiana, divided from the independent Caledonians by the long chain of mountains, which, rising near Dumbarton, crosses the two counties of Athol and Badenoch, and stretches beyond the Frith of Murray. But the greater part of this province was wrested, at so early a period, from the dominion of Rome, that it is seldom mentioned by writers; and the pretentura of Agricola has been generally considered as the northern limit of the empire in Britain." Throughout these provinces was scattered a great number of inhabited towns and military posts, partly of British and partly of Roman origin. They were divided into classes, gradually descending in the scale of privilege and importance. 1. The first rank was claimed by the colonies, of which there were nine, among them London. Each colony was a miniature representation of the parent city, both as regarded customs, laws, and government. 2. Second in rank were the municipia, or municipal cities, which enjoyed privileges nearly, if not quite, equal to those conferred on the colonies. These were but two, Verulam and York. 3. The Latian cities were next in order, and were ten in number; enjoying the privilege of electing their own magistrates, who became citizens of Rome at the expiration of their office. 4. The remaining towns were stipendiary, and governed by Roman officers. It seems most reasonable to conclude that Britain was originally peopled by the Celtæ, who were first in order of those nations that occupied gradually and successively the western regions of the ancient world. Next to the Celtæ came the Belgæ, who were either a branch of the Celtæ that migrated at a later period than the first occupants of Britain, or the van of the Gothi who followed the Celtæ in their progress westward. These new invaders drove the first settlers of the isle inward from the coast. Accordingly Cæsar represents the Britons on the coast whom he encountered as of Belgic descent, by whom the inhabitants of the interior were considered the spontaneous production of the soil. Britain, or more properly, the staple commodity of the adjacent islands, was first made known to the Europeans of the south by the Phœnicians of Cadiz, who, by keeping its situation secret, monopolized the tin trade. At length Himilco, the Carthaginian, discovered the Œstrymnides, as he calls them; and afterwards Pytheas of Massilia was equally successful. The Cassiterides, or Scilly Isles, were henceforth the sole attraction to these seas. Till Cæsar's time the island was known to the Romans only by fame. In the reign of Claudius, A. D. 43, the Romans first prepared seriously for the conquest of Britain, and to this were directed the exertions of Aulus Plautius and Vespasian; and also of Ostorius Scapula, who made captive Caractacus. The next general of great abilities in this service was Suetonius Paulinus, who reduced Anglesey and defeated Boadicea. After Vespasian had assumed the purple, Petilius Cerealis subdued the Brigantes, and Julius Frontinus nearly conquered the warlike Silures. In the year 78 Agricola became commander of Britain. Tribe after tribe submitted, and the victor, in the fourth summer, built a line of forts from the Frith of Forth to that of Clyde, to check the inroads of the northern Britons, whose territories he invaded with success in the eighth and last year of his command. Agricola was the first who taught the Britons to cultivate the arts of peace, and inspired them with a love of Roman manners. In A. D. 120, the inroads of the Caledonians compelled Hadrian to repair to Britain, where, in defence of southern Britain, he drew a rampart and a ditch across the island, from the Solway Frith on the western, to the mouth of the Tyne on the eastern, coast. Severus, the better to protect the southern provinces, raised a solid wall of stone a few paces to the north of the Vallum of Hadrian. The wall was twelve feet high, and in front of it was sunk a ditch of the same dimensions with that of Hadrian. This wall is called by the historian of Severus "the glory of his reign." Towards the beginning of the 5th century, the irruptions of the Picts and Scots became more and more formidable; till at length the emperor Honorius wrote to the states of Britain "to provide for their own defence." Thenceforward Britain was independent of Roman power. It is remarkable, that in the 4th century the Caledonians and Mætæ disappeared from history, the Picts and Scots taking their place. Dr. Lingard thus accounts for it: "To me it seems manifest that the Picts were under a new denomination the very same people whom we have hitherto called Mæatæ and Caledonians. The name of Caledonians properly belongs to the nations of that long but narrow strip of land which stretches from Loch Finn on the western, to the Frith of Tayne on the eastern coast: but it had been extended by the Romans to all the kindred and independent clans which lay between them and the northern extremity of the island. In the 4th century the mistake was discovered and rectified: and from that time not only the Caledonians, but their southern neighbours, the five tribes of the Mæatæ, began to be known by the generic appellation of Picts; a word derived, perhaps, from the natural custom of painting the body, or more probably from the name which they bore in their own language. 2. The Scots came undoubtedly from Ireland, which, like its sister island, appears to have been colonized by adventurers from different countries. It is not improbable that the Scoti were the most numerous tribe in the interior of the island, and a division of the great Celtic family of the Cotti. At last the strangers acquired so marked a superiority over the indigenous tribes, as to impart the name of Scotland to the northern division of Britain." After the abandonment of Britain by the Romans, the Picts and Scots still continued their incursions against the more civilized Britons, to such a degree that, in the year 449, Vortigern, the most powerful of the British kings, called in the aid of the Saxons Hengist and Horsa. Kent was abandoned to Hengist, A. D. 455, and thus the way was paved to Anglo-Saxon sway. Lingard's England.—Camden.—Heylyn.—D'Anville.

Brixellum, now Bresello, a town of Gallia Cispadana, to the right of the Æmilian Way, on the Po, where Otho slew himself after his defeat at Bedriacum. It was a Roman colony. Cram.

Brixia, now Brescia, on the Mela, the capital of the Cenomani, was a Roman colony, and also a municipium.

Bructĕri, a people of Germany, inhabiting the country at the east of Holland. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 51.

Brundŭsium, or Brundisium, now Brindisi, the most ancient and celebrated town of Calabria, on the Adriatic side of the Iapygian peninsula.—By the Greeks the town was called Βρεντέσιον a word which in the Messapian language signified a stag's head, from the resemblance which its different harbours and creeks bore to the antlers of that animal. The advantageous position of its harbour for communicating with the opposite coast of Greece naturally rendered Brundusium a place of great resort, from the time that the colonies of that country had fixed themselves on the shores of Italy. Large fleets were always stationed there for the conveyance of troops into Macedonia, Greece, or Asia; and for the convenience of its harbour, and its facility of access from every other part of Italy, it became a place of general thoroughfare for travellers visiting those countries. Here Cæsar blockaded Pompey, and, according to his account, it possessed two harbours, one called the interior, the other the exterior, communicating by a very narrow passage. Cram.

Bruttii, a people occupying the southern extremity of Italy. On the south, west, and east their country was enclosed by the sea, being separated from Sicily by the Siculum Fretum. On the north it was separated from Lucania by the rivers Crathis and Laus. The origin of the Brutti or Βρεττία is neither remote nor illustrious. "They were generally looked upon as descended from some refugee slaves and shepherds of the Lucanians, who, having concealed themselves from pursuit in the forests and mountains with which this part of Italy abounds, became, in process of time, powerful from their numbers and ferocity." "The Greek towns on the western coast, from being weaker and more detached from the main body of the Italiot confederacy, first fell into the hands of the Bruttii." The principal cities of this league now sought the aid of Pyrrhus against the now united Bruttii and Lucanians, who were effectually checked during the life of that prince; but, after his death, they soon reduced the whole of the peninsula between the Laus and Crathis, except Crotona, Locri, and Rhegium. At this period Rome put an end at once to their conquests and their independence. Both the Lucani and Bruttii submitted to L. Papirius Cursor, A. U. C. 480, which was two years after Pyrrhus had withdrawn his troops out of Italy. On the arrival of Hannibal, the Bruttii flocked eagerly to the victorious standard of that general, who was by their aid enabled to maintain his ground in this corner of Italy when all hope of final success seemed to be extinguished. But the consequences of this protracted warfare proved fatal to the country in which it was carried on; many of their towns being totally destroyed, and others so much impoverished, as to retain scarcely a vestige of their former prosperity. To these misfortunes was added the weight of Roman vengeance. A decree was passed, reducing this people to a most abject state of dependence: they were pronounced incapable of being employed in a military capacity, and their services were confined to the menial offices of couriers and letter carriers." Cram.

Bryges, a people of Thrace, afterwards called Phryges. Strab. 7.

Bryci, an Illyrian people, whom Strabo seems to place in the vicinity of the Taulantii and Parthini, to the north of Epidamnus. The town of Cydriæ is assigned to them. Cram.

Bubastis, a city of Egypt, in Scripture called Pibeset, now Basta, in the eastern parts of the Delta, where cats were held in great veneration, because Diana Bubastis, who is the chief deity of the place, is said to have transformed herself into a cat when the gods fled into Egypt. Herodot. 2, c. 59, 137 and 154.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 690.

Bubăsus, a country of Caria, whence Bubasides applied to the natives. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 643.

Buca, a sea-port town of the Frentani, the position of which is now subject to much uncertainty. Strabo places it near Teanum, on the confines of Apulia; and again states that it was separated from Teanum by an interval of 200 stadia or 25 miles. It is probable that there is an error in one of the passages. Romanelli informs us that the ruins are to be seen at a place named Penna. Cram.

Bucephăla, a city of India, near the Hydaspes, built by Alexander, in honour of his favourite horse Bucephalus. Curt. 9, c. 3.—Justin. 12, c. 8.—Diod. 17.

Buchetium, or Bucheta, or Bucenta, a town of Epirus, situated close to the Acherusian lake, and at no great distance from Ephyre or Cichyrus. The remains of this town are thus spoken of by Mr. Hughes: "Leaving the Acherusian lake, we bent our steps to the ruins of Buchetium, which are about one mile distant. They are situated upon a beautiful conical rock, near the right bank of the Acheron; and the Cyclopean walls, constructed with admirable exactitude in the second style of ancient masonry, still remain in a high state of preservation." Cram.

Budini, a people of Scythia, mentioned by Herodotus in his account of the expedition of Darius Hystaspes. By a detail which Herodotus furnishes of the canton of the Budinians, we think we discover it on the Borysthenes, a little below Kiow. D'Anville.

Budōrum, or Budorus, a promontory of Salamis, opposite to Megara, with a fortress upon it, which was taken by a Lacedæmonian fleet under Brasidas. Strabo mentions it as a mountain of Salamis. Sir W. Gell must be mistaken in supposing Budorus to be opposite to Ægina. He himself informs us, that "opposite the ferry to Megara are the remains of a very ancient fortress or city, whence there is a fine view towards Corinth." This, no doubt, was Budorus. Cram.

Bulis, a town of Phocis, "which Pausanias seems to assign to Bœotia, at the same time that he allows it had joined the Phocian confederacy in the Sacred War under Philomelus and Onomarchus. Steph. Byz. calls it a Phocian town; as do likewise Pliny and Ptolemy. Pausanias states that Bulis was on a hill, and only seven stadia from its port, which is doubtless the same as the Mychos of Strabo and the Nautochus of Pliny. Cram.

Buphrasium, a town of Elis, often mentioned by Homer as one of the chief cities of the Epeans. It had ceased to exist in the time of Strabo, but the name was still attached to a district situated on the left bank of the Larissus, and on the road leading from Dyme to Elis. This seems to answer to what is now called the plain of Bakouma. Cram.

Bura, "one of the twelve original Achæan cities, which stood formerly close to the sea, but having been destroyed, with the neighbouring town of Helice, by a terrible earthquake, the surviving inhabitants rebuilt it afterwards, about 40 stadia from the coast, and near the small river Buraicus. Bura was situated on a hill, and contained temples of Ceres, Venus, Bacchus, and Lucina; the statues were by Euclidas of Athens. On the banks of the river Buraicus was a cave consecrated to Hercules, and an oracle, usually consulted by the throwing of dice." Sir W. Gell discovered its ruins close to the road from Megastelia to Vostitza, and visited the cave of Hercules Buraicus. Cram.

Burdigala, now Bourdeaux, the capital of the Bituriges Vibisci, in Aquitania Secunda. It was situated at the mouth of the Garumna, and was the birth-place of Ausonius. D'Anville.

Burgundiones, a branch of the ancient Vindili. Their original seat is not easy to ascertain, but they were probably established first between the Oder and the Vistula, whence they were compelled to migrate, and settled near the Alemanni. Finally they passed to Gaul, and from them is derived the modern Burgundy.

Busiris, a town of Lower Egypt, on a branch of the Nile called Busiriticus. It was styled the city of Isis, from its having a famous temple sacred to that deity. The modern Busir occupies the site of the ancient town, which was destroyed by Dioclesian.

Buthrotum, a town of Epirus, situated on a peninsula formed by the Pelodes Portus, into which emptied the Xanthus, and a bay connected with the sea by a narrow channel. Buthrotum was occupied by Cæsar in the civil wars, and was afterwards colonized by the Romans. It was opposite the island of Corcyra. Cram.

Butos, a town of Egypt, where there was a temple of Apollo and Diana, and an oracle of Latona. It was situated on a lake or basin, to the west of the Ostium Sebennyticum. Herodot. 2, c. 59 and 63.

Buxentum, or Pyxus, a town of Lucania, near the promontory of Pyxus, now Capo degl' Infreschi. Policastro is generally considered the site of the ancient town. It became a Roman colony A. U. C. 558. There was a river Pyxus, now Busento. Cram.

Byblus, a town of Syria, not far from the sea, where Adonis had a temple. It was situated between Berytus and Botrus, and the Adonis flowed into the Mediterranean in its vicinity. Strab. 16.

Byrsa. Vid. Carthago.

Byzacium, a country of Africa, adjacent to the Syrtis Minor, also named Emporia. Its great fertility of corn might have caused it to be regarded as a magazine of provisions, which was resorted to by sea. There was a city of the same name with that of the country, whose position Arabian geographers make known under the name of Beghni. D'Anville.

Byzantium, a town situate on the Thracian Bosphorus, founded by a colony of Megara, under the conduct of Byzas, 658 years before the Christian era. Paterculus says it was founded by the Milesians, and by the Lacedæmonians according to Justin, and according to Ammianus by the Athenians. The Spartan claim owes its origin to the occupation of Byzantium by the Lacedæmonians, under Pausanias, with the view of holding in check the threatening power of the Persians. Philip of Macedon in vain attempted to take this city; and so flourishing was it during the period of Roman dominion, that, when it sided with Niger against Severus, it yielded to the victor only after an obstinate siege of three years. The pleasantness and convenience of its situation was observed by Constantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eastern Roman empire, A. D. 328, and called it Constantinople. Constantine endowed Constantinople with all the privileges of Rome, whence at a late period it was styled Nova Roma. Nor did it rival Rome only in its civil and political privileges. In the second ecclesiastical council held here, it was decreed that the patriarch of Constantinople should be second in dignity only to the bishop of Rome. This so excited the jealousy of the Pontiffs, that in after times they strove, inefficiently however, to reduce the power of the patriarchs; who, maintaining their privileges and independence, were therefore accounted schismatics by the church of Rome. John, Patriarch of Constantinople in the time of Gregory the Great, first assumed the title of Universal or Œcumenical Bishop, Pastor General, as it were, of the Christian church. The limits of Byzantium were more contracted than those of Constantinople; the latter city having been extended to include the seven hills, which have given it also a claim to the title of Urbs Septi-Collis. Within the limits of the ancient Byzantium stand, at the present day, the seraglio of the Turkish sultans and the famous temple of Saint Sophia. The ancient city occupied a point of land contracted between the Propontis and a long cove, named Chrysoceras, or the Horn of Gold. This extremity of Thrace and of Europe, contracted between two seas, was enclosed by a long wall called Macrontichos, commencing a little beyond Heraclea, and terminating on the shore of the Euxine, near a place named Derkon, or Derkous. This barrier, of which there are only some vestiges remaining, was constructed by the emperor Anastasius, at the beginning of the sixth century, to resist the incursions of many foreign nations who had penetrated even to the environs of the city. Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turks under Mahomet 2d A. D. 1453. The modern city is called Stamboul, by some considered a corruption of the ancient name, by others as an abbreviation of εἰς τὴν πολιν. A number of Greek writers, who have received the name of Byzantine historians, flourished at Byzantium after the seat of the empire had been translated thither from Rome. Their works were published in one large collection, in 36 vols. folio, 1648, &c. at Paris, and recommended themselves by the notes and supplements of Du Fresne and Du Cange. They were likewise printed at Venice, 1729, in 28 vols. though perhaps, this edition is not so valuable as that of the French. A new and superior edition of this collection was commenced by the late Mr. Niehbuhr in 1828. Strab. 1.—Paterc. 2. c. 15.—*C. Nep. in Paus. CABALLINUM, a town of the Ædui, now Chalons, on the Saone. Cæs. 7, Bell. G. c. 42.

CABIRA, a town of Pontus, though only a castle under Mithridates. It was enlarged under Pompey. It was called Sebaste, (the Greek word answering to the Latin Augusta,) in honour of Augustus, by the queen-dowager of Polemon, king of Pontus. D'Anville.

CACŪTHIS, a river of India flowing into the Ganges. Arrian. Indic.

CADMĒA, a citadel of Thebes, built by Cadmus; whence the Thebans are often called Cadmeans. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 601.—Paus. 2, c. 5.

CADMĒIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

CADURCI, a people of Gallia Celtica, according to the division of Cæsar. They were next to the Ruteni, along the Garumna, and had for their capital Divona, now Cahors. Lemaire.

CADYTIS. Vid. Hierosolyma.

CÆCŪBUS AGER, a tract of country near Caieta in Latium, famous for the excellence and plenty of its wines. According to Pliny, the cultivation of this vine was considerably injured, in consequence of some works undertaken by Nero. Cram.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 20. 1. 2, od. 14, &c.

CÆNEOPOLIS, or CÆNE, I. a town now Kené in the Thebaid, on the right bank of the Nile, nearly over against Tentyra.——II. Another, called also Tænarum. Vid. Tænarum.

CÆNĪNA, a town of the Sabines on the Anio. Liv. 1, c. 9.

CÆNIS, a promontory of Italy, opposite to Pelorus in Sicily, a distance of about one mile and a half, and forming the narrowest part of the strait that lies between Italy and the island of Sicily.

CÆRATUS, an ancient name of Gnossus, according to Strabo.

CÆRE, CÆRES. Vid. Agylla.

CÆSAR AUGUSTA, more anciently Salduba, a town on the river Iberus, in the territory of the Edetani and province of Tarraconensis. It stood a little below the mouth of the Bilbilis, and is now Saragossa. Mel.—Ptol.—D'Anville.

CÆSARĒA, the ancient name of the island of Guernsey.—Another, called Ad Argeum from its situation at the foot of the mons Argæus. Its proper denomination was Mazaca, to which in the time of Tiberius, was superadded that of Cæsarea. It was a capital town of Cappadocia, near the source of the Halys river, and occupied a site not distant from that of the modern Kaisarieh.——A town of Samaria, named, on its becoming the residence of the Roman governors, Cæsarea Palæstinæ. Its earlier name was Turris Stratonis, but standing on the sea, "it was chosen," says D'Anville, "by Herod, for the site of a magnificent city and port." It was this prince that gave it the name of Cæsarea, in honour of the emperor Augustus. It belonged to the province of Palestine first, and became the residence of a patriarch. There remain but a few ruins to mark the spot on which it stood. This name was also given by Philip, the son of Herod, to the town of Paneas, on the division of his father's dominions; and to distinguish it, the surname of Philippi was attached to it. The name of Paneas is derived from its position at the foot of mount Panium, at the sources of the waters of Jordan. It afterwards resumed this name, and was known as Belines to the Crusaders.——There are many small insignificant towns of that name, either built by the emperors, or called by their name in compliment to them.

CÆSENA, "the last town of Cisalpine Gaul on the Via Æmylia, retains its ancient name. It is situated on the river Savio, anciently the Sapis." The name of Curva is sometimes given instead of Cæsena. Cram.

CAICINUS, a river separating the territories of Rhegium and Locri. It was believed that the grasshoppers beside this river, on the Locrian side, were continually singing, and that those on the opposite bank were continually mute. It is thought to be the present Amendolea. Cram.

CAICUS, a river of Mysia, falling into the Ægean Sea opposite Lesbos. Virg. G. 4, v. 370.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 243.

CAIĒTA, a town, promontory, and harbour of Campania, which received its name from Caieta, the nurse of Æneas, who was buried there. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 1.

CALĀBRIA, a country of Italy in Magna Græcia. It has been called Messapia, Iapygia, Salentinia, and Peucetia. The poet Ennius was born there. The country was fertile, and produced a variety of fruits, much cattle, and excellent honey. This was the country of the Calabri, who, however, were confined almost to that part of Messapia and Iapygia between Brundusium and Hydruntum which is now *Terra di Lecce. Virg. Caledonia, a name applied properly to a long but narrow strip of land, which stretches from Loch Finn on the western, to the Frith of Tayne on the eastern, coast of Scotland. It is, however, very frequently made to include all Scotland, except the Maætæ, and sometimes used as a generic term for Northern Britain. Camden traces the name to Kaled, "rough," plural Kaledion; whence Caledonii, "the rude nation." In the article Britannia we gave a solution of the question concerning the disappearance of the Caledonians from history about the middle of the 4th century. Heylyn considers that the word Scot denoted a body aggregated into one, out of many particulars; that Scoti, therefore, implies a union by which that nation was formed; hence Scotland, "the land of the united people." This would lead us to infer that the Caledonii and Maætæ united formed the Scoti; and that the Picts were a distinct body of North Britons. Mac Bean considers the Picts as a branch of the Caledonii, and declares the proper form of the name to be Pecht, "freebooters." The same writer traces Caledonia to Gael-doch, "the country of the Gael or highlander;" and concurs with Lingard in representing the Scoti as a distinct people, who settled at a comparatively late period in the southern part of Scotland.

Cales. Vid. Cale.

Caletes, a people of Gaul. They dwelt in that part of Normandy which is called the Pays de Caux, a peninsula formed by the Seine and the sea. Cæsar assigns them to the Belgæ. There is reason, however, to believe, that though situated in Belgica, the Caletes had some affinity with the Armorici. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 2, 4; and 8, 7; and 7, 75.

Callaīcia, a district of Hispania, extending over that part of Portugal which lay between the Douro and Minho, with the greater part of Galicia. The Lusitanian Callaici, or those south of the Minho, were called Bracarii, and those on the north, Lucenses. Ovid. 6, Fast. v. 461.

Calle, "a town on the Douro, near its mouth, called now Porto. It is remarkable by the combination of its ancient and modern name, for giving the denomination of Portugal to a kingdom which, being limited before to the extent of a county or earldom, was conferred on a French prince by a king of Leon." It was in the country of the Calliaci. D'Anville.

Callichŏrus, a place of Phocis, where the orgies of Bacchus were yearly celebrated.

Callidrŏmus, a place near Thermopylæ. Thucyd. 8, c. 6.

Callipŏlis, I. a city of Thrace, on the Hellespont. Sil. 14, v. 250.——II. A town of Sicily, near Ætna.——III. A city of Calabria on the coast of Tarentum, on a rocky island, joined by a bridge to the continent. It contains 6000 inhabitants, who trade in oil and cotton. All these places retain their ancient names in the slightly altered form Gallipoli.

Callirhoe, or Enneacrounos, a fountain near the city of Athens, from which the Athenians still, as in ancient times, derive their sole supply of water. Some authors place it within the circuit of the ancient town. The natives have preserved its name in that of Kalliroi. Paus. Att. 14.—Thucyd. 2, 15.—Leake's Topog.

Callista, an island of the Ægean Sea, called afterwards Thera. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Paus. 3, c. 1. Its chief town was founded 1150 years before the christian era, by Theras.

Callium, a town of the Ophionenses in Ætolia, upon the road from Heraclea Trachinia, by way of mount Corax to Naupactus. The Gauls of Brennus having crossed the mountains that lie between Ætolia, Doria, and Thessaly, laid waste the town of Callium; but their retreat was intercepted by the Ætolians, who had assembled to revenge the Callienses, and out of 40,000 barbarians who had entered this district, it is said one half were destroyed before the detachment could rejoin the army of Brennus. The name is written also Callipolis and Calliœ.

Calpe, a lofty mountain in the most southern parts of Spain, opposite to mount Abyla, on the African coast. These two mountains were called the pillars of Hercules. The name of Gibraltar, by which it is at present known, is a corruption of Gebel Tarik, given to it about the year 710, from Gebel, a mountain, and Tarik, the name of the Moorish leader, who, crossing this strait, effected the conquest of Spain for his nation. "At the bottom," says D'Anville, "there existed heretofore a town called Cartein, which appears to have been confounded with that mentioned in antiquity under the name of Calpe."

Calydon, a city of Ætolia, where Œneus, the father of Meleager, reigned. The Evenus flows through it, and it receives its name from Calydon, the son of Ætolus. Augustus removed the inhabitants to Nicopolis, and so completed the ruin of the place, which had, in the time of his uncle, still retained something of its ancient importance. In poetry and mythology, the name of Calydon is famous for the chase of the boar, in which nearly all the princes of Greece are reported to have joined. The tusks were shown for a long time at Rome. One of them was about half an ell long, and the other was broken. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 45.—Strab. 8.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 577.—Hygin. fab. 174.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4, &c.

Camalodūnum, a Roman colony in Britain, supposed Malden, or Colchester.

Camarīna, a lake of Sicily, with a town of the same name, built B. C. 552. It was destroyed by the Syracusans, and rebuilt by a certain Hipponous. The lake was drained contrary to the advice of Apollo, as the ancients supposed; and the words Camarinam movere are become proverbial to express an unsuccessful and dangerous attempt. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 701.—Strab. 6.—Herodot. 7, c. 134.

Cambunii montes, mountains separating Thessaly and Macedonia, intersecting almost at right angles the chains of Pindus on the west and Olympus on the east. They were called also Volustana, and retain that name in the modification of Volutza.

Camerīnum, and Camertium, a town of Umbria, on the borders of Picenum. Cluverius supposes it to have been the same as the Camerte mentioned by Strabo; but this is proved by Cramer to be impossible. It may be the same as the modern Camerino. Liv. 9, c. 36.

Campānia a country of Italy included in the dominion of the Osci. It was bounded on the south by the waters of the Tyrrhene Sea; the mountains Callicula and Tifata divided it from Samnium on the north; it was separated by the Liris from Latium, and by the Silarus from Lucania. Into this district of country, celebrated for its fertility by the poet and the historian, the Etruscans, during the period of their military superiority, introduced themselves, and brought with them the civilization and the arts which had been unknown to the earlier Osci, and which afterwards became characteristics of the Campanians. But the influence of the climate affected in their turn the Etruscans, and the hardier Samnites dispossessed them of their best provinces in Campania. Greeks, Sabines, and Volsci, at different periods established themselves in these regions; and from the frequent contests between the actual possessors and the new comers, was imagined, says Strabo, the fiction of the mythological wars that illustrate the Phlegræan plains. The Samnites in Campania were, however, if perhaps we except the Etruscans, by far the most imposing of the conquerors of Campania; and for a time appeared among the boldest and most respected of the Italian nations. The boundaries which we have designated above were not at a later period proper to define the limits of Campania; and the Massic hills became the dividing line between that region and Latium when the latter extended beyond the banks of the Liris. The name of Campania was not used to designate this tract of country till the establishment there of the Samnites, and the dispossession of the Etruscans. In the Carthaginian wars, when the victories of Hannibal began to render it probable that the Roman empire over the Italian cities was about to expire, the Campanians revolted from their allegiance; "an offence which they were made to expiate by a punishment, the severity of which has few examples in the history, not of Rome only, but of nations." Under the Etruscans the scattered Osci were collected into villages, and Vulturnus became after a time the capital of this commingled race. The same city under the Samnitic Campania was afterwards the capital of those people who changed its name to Capua. About the year 421 or 422 U. C. Campania became by conquest subject to Rome, but the inhabitants were admitted to the honours of citizenship, without, however, being permitted to exercise the right of suffrage. *Dion. Hal.—Micali. These plains were sometimes called Tempe; and the name of Dewy Plains, by which the Romans designated them, was intended to convey the notion of their freshness and verdure. They were situated about the valley of the Velinus, and were often overflowed by its waters.

Campus Martius, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their exercises, and learnt to wrestle, and box, to throw the discus, hurl the javelin, ride a horse, drive a chariot, &c. The public assemblies were held there, and the officers of state chosen, and audience given to foreign ambassadors. It was adorned with statues, columns, arches, and porticoes, and its pleasant situation made it very frequented. It was called Martius, because dedicated to Mars. It was sometimes called Tiberinus, from its closeness to the Tiber. It was given to the Roman people by a vestal virgin; but they were deprived of it by Tarquin the Proud, who made it a private field, and sowed corn in it. When Tarquin was driven from Rome, the people recovered it, and threw away into the Tiber the corn which had grown there, deeming it unlawful for any man to eat of the produce of that land. The sheaves which were thrown into the river stopped in a shallow ford, and by the accumulated collection of mud became firm ground, and formed an island, which was called the Holy Island, or the island of Æsculapius. Dead carcasses were generally burnt in the Campus Martius. Strab. 5.—Liv. 2, c. 5, l. 6, c. 20.

"The field of battle was the plain between Cannæ and the Aufidus." These plains were once known by the appellation of the Campi Diomedis. Liv. 22, c. 44.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Plut. in Annib.

Canōpus, a city of Egypt, twelve miles from Alexandria, celebrated for the temple of Serapis. It was founded by the Spartans, and therefore called Amyclæa, and it received its name from Canopus, the pilot of the vessel of Menelaus, who was buried in this place. The inhabitants were dissolute in their manners. Virgil bestows upon it the epithet of Pellæus, because Alexander, who was born at Pella, built Alexandria in the neighbourhood. Ital. 11, v. 433. —Mela, 1, c. 9.—Strab. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 31.—*Virg. Capharēus, a lofty mountain and promontory of Eubœa, where Nauplius, king of the country, to revenge the death of his son Palamedes, slain by Ulysses, set a burning torch in the darkness of night, which caused the Greeks to be shipwrecked on the coast. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 260.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 481.—Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 115.

Capitōlium, a celebrated temple and citadel at Rome, on the Tarpeian rock, the plan of which was made by Tarquin Priscus. It was begun by Servius Tullius, finished by Tarquin Superbus, and consecrated by the consul Horatius after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome. It was built upon four acres of ground; the front was adorned with three rows of pillars, and the other sides with two. The ascent to it from the ground was by an hundred steps. The magnificence and richness of this temple are almost incredible. All the consuls successively made donations to the capitol, and Augustus bestowed upon it at one time 2000 pounds weight of gold. Its thresholds were made of brass, and its roof was gold. It was adorned with vessels and shields of solid silver, with golden chariots, &c. It was burnt during the civil wars of Marius, and Sylla rebuilt it, but died before the dedication, which was performed by Q. Catulus. It was again destroyed in the troubles under Vitellius; and Vespasian, who endeavoured to repair it, saw it again in ruins at his death. Domitian raised it again, for the last time, and made it more grand and magnificent than any of his predecessors, and spent 12,000 talents in gilding it. When they first dug for the foundations, they found a man's head, called Tolius, sound and entire, in the ground, and from thence drew an omen of the future greatness of the Roman empire. The hill was from that circumstance called Capitolium, a capite Toli. The consuls and magistrates offered sacrifices there when they first entered upon their offices, and the procession in triumphs was always conducted to the capitol. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 136, l. 8, v. 347.—Tacit. 3. Hist. c. 72.—Plut. in Poplic.—Liv. 1, 10, &c. —Plin. 33. &c.—Sueton. in Aug. c. 40.

Cappădocia, a country of Asia Minor, separated on the west from Phrygia by the Halys towards its source, and by the Euphrates from Armenia Major. It had upon the north Galatia and Pontus, and on the south the Taurus mountains, which divided it from Cilicia and the coast. In these limits, on the east, was included Armenia Minor. The capital of Cappadocia proper, or Magna, otherwise called Cappadocia by the Taurus, was Masaca, afterwards Cæsarea Vid. Cæsarea. The country named Pontus was, in fact, a part of Cappadocia, and the people of both regions were the same. Till this large district was formed into a separate country, it carried the boundary of Cappadocia on the north quite to the Euxine Sea. It received its name from the river Cappadox, which separates it from Galatia. The inhabitants were called Syrians and Leuco-Syrians by the Greeks. They were of a dull and submissive disposition, and addicted to every vice according to the ancients, who wrote this virulent epigram against them:

Gustato periit sanguine Cappadocis.

When they were offered their freedom and independence by the Romans, they refused it, and begged of them a king, and they received Ariobarzanes. It was some time after governed by a Roman proconsul. Though the ancients have ridiculed this country for the unfruitfulness of its soil and the manners of its inhabitants, yet it can boast of the birth of the geographer Strabo, St. Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen, among other illustrious characters. The horses of this country were in general esteem, and with these they paid their tributes to the king of Persia, while under his power, for want of money. The kings of Cappadocia mostly bore the name of Ariarathes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 39.—Plin. 6, c. 3. —Curt. 3 and 4.— Strab. 11 and 16.—Herodot. 1, c. 73, l. 5, c. 49.—Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 8.

Caprăria, now Cabrera, a mountain island on the coast of Spain, famous for its goats. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Capreæ, now Capri, an island on the coast of Campania, abounding in quails, and famous for the residence and debaucheries of the emperor Tiberius during the seven last years of his life. The island, in which now several medals are dug up expressive of the licentious morals of the emperor, was about 40 miles in circumference, and surrounded by steep rocks. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 709.—Stat. in Tib.—Stat. Sylv. 3, v. 5.

Căpua, the chief city of Campania, of Etruscan origin. Its first founders called it Vulturnus, by which name they also designated the river upon which it stood. Its change of name was effected by its Samnite conquerors. Under these people it established an aristocratic form of government, and by the aristocracy of this place the Romans were invited to extend their authority over the country of Campania; thus gaining, says Micali, in this fertile and well-defended region, more than they had been able to wrest from the people of Tuscany and Latium in four centuries of war. From this time forward the nobility of Capua were greatly favoured by the Roman senate, and the lower orders became still more to this body an object of contempt. Accordingly, on the approach of Hannibal, he found a population ready to receive him with open arms. The vengeance of Rome, on the departure of Hannibal, reduced this beautiful place, with the adjacent country, almost to a desert; and it was not till the time of Julius Cæsar that the senate thought of restoring it. From this time it began to recover its former magnificence, and continued to flourish till, on the invasion of the barbarians, it fell with the rest of the exhausted empire. It is supposed to have contained at one time a population of at least 800,000, and its amphitheatre was built to entertain 100,000 spectators. This city was very ancient, and so opulent that it even rivalled Rome, and was called altera Roma. The soldiers of Annibal, after the battle of Cannæ, were enervated by the pleasures and luxuries which powerfully prevailed in this voluptuous city and under a soft climate. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 145.—Liv. 4, 7, 8, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 44.—Flor. 1, c. 16.—Cic. in Philip. 12, c. 3. —Plut. in Ann.

Carchēdon, the Greek name of Carthage.

Cardia, a town of Thrace, near the isthmus which connects the Chersonesus with the main land. Eumenes, one of Alexander's most able generals and Hieronymus the historian, were natives of Cardia. When Lysimachus took possession of the Chersonese, he founded a city called Lysimachia, near the site of Cardia, and transferred to it the greater part of the Cardians. Lysimachia suffered greatly from the Thracians, and was nearly in ruins when it was restored by Antiochus, king of Syria. In the middle ages its name was lost in that of Hexamilion, a fortress constructed probably out of its ruins, and so called, doubtless, from the width of the isthmus. Cram.

Carduchi, a people of Assyria, who occupied the mountains by which that country is covered on the side of Armenia and Atropatene. From their names is derived that of the Kurdes; also that of Kurdistan, which modern geographers apply to Assyria. D'Anville.

Cāria, a country of Asia Minor, south of Ionia, at the east and north of the Icarian Sea, and at the west of Phrygia Major and Lycia. It has been called Phœnicia because a Phœnician colony first settled there; and afterwards it received the name of Caria, from Car, an ancient king of the country. A confederacy of Dorians from Greece were established on the western coast.

Cariate, a town of Bactriana, where Alexander imprisoned Callisthenes.

Carilla, a town of the Piceni, destroyed by Annibal for its great attachment to Rome. Sil. Ital. 8.

Carīnæ, a quarter in the fourth region of Rome, so called, as Nardini not improbably supposes, from its being placed in a kollqw between the Cœlian, Palatine, and Esquiline hills. According to the same writer it corresponds with that portion of the modern city which is known by the appellation of Pantani. From the passage of Virgil (Æn. 8, 359,) we may infer, that this quarter was distinguished by an air of superior elegance and grandeur. It appears that the Carinæ were contiguous to the forum. Cram.

Carisiăcum, a town of ancient Gaul, now Cressy in Picardy.

Carmānia, now Kerman, a country of Asia, between Persia and India. Its capital, now Kerman or Sirjan, was anciently Carmana. Arrian.—Plin. 6, c. 23.

Carmentalis porta, one of the gates of Rome, in the neighbourhood of the capitol. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the Fabii passed through it in going to that fatal expedition where they perished. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 338.

Carmŏna, a town of Hispania Bætica, not far from Hispalis, Seville. Now Carmone in Andalusia. Lemaire.

Carnasium, in Messenia, situated at the end of the Stenyclerian plain, was a thick grove of cypresses, containing statues of the Carneian Apollo, Mercury, Criophorus, and Proserpine. It was here that the Messenians celebrated the mystic rites of the great goddesses. Cram.—Paus.—Mess. 33.

Carni, a people at the head of the Hadriatic, below the Alps, to a part of which they gave the name of Carnicæ, also called Juliæ. Their name now subsists in what is called Carniola, though more contracted in limits than the territories of the Carni. D'Anville.

Carnion, "a small stream of Arcadia, which had its source in the district of Ægys in Laconia, near the temple of Apollo Cereates. Pliny seems to speak of a town of this name." Cram. —Plin. 4, 6.

Carnuntum, an important town of Pannonia, situated on the Danube, below Vindobona, Vienna. As to the exact position of its site at the present day, opinions vary between Petronel, Haimbourg, and Altenburg, (Old Town) situated between the two former. D'Anville inclines to the latter. D'Anville.

Carnus, one of the Taphian islands, now either Calamo or Kastoni. Cram.

Carnūtes, one of the most powerful nations of Gallia Celtica, known before Cæsar's expedition, and mentioned by Livy among those tribes that crossed the Alps in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus. Notwithstanding their flourishing condition, they were dependent on the Remi. Cæsar represents their country as in the middle of Gaul; not that this was the fact in regard to their geographical relation, but that there was the principal seat of the Druids, and the supreme tribunal of confederate Gaul. The Carnutes had on the north the Aulerci, Eburovices, and Parisii; on the east, the Senones; on the south, the Bituriges and Turones; and on the west, the Aulerci Cenomani. Their chief towns were Autricum, Chartres, and Genabum. Their territory forms the provinces called le pays Chartrain, and l'Orléanais, more properly at the present time Département d'Eure-et-Loir and Dép. du Loiret. Lemaire. Cæs. B. G. 2, 35; 5, 25; 29, 54; 6, 4; 7, 6.

Carpăthus, an island in the Mediterranean between Rhodes and Crete, now called Scarpanto. It has given its name to a part of the neighbouring sea, thence called the Carpathian Sea, between Rhodes and Crete. It was 20 miles in circumference, and was sometimes called Tetrapolis, from its four towns, the principal one of which was called Nisgrus. Ptolemy calls the southern promontory of the island Thoantium, the modern Ephiallium. Plin. 4, c. 12. —Herodot. 3, c. 45.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 10.

Carpetāni, a people in the centre of Spain, on either side of the Tagus. Their capital was Toletum.

Carpi, a people who inhabited the Carpathian mountains. Aurelian subdued them, for which the senate offered him the title of Carpicus. This he declined accepting.

Carræ, and Carrhæ, a town of Mesopotamia, between the Chaboras and Euphrates. Here Crassus was defeated. It is the Charan or Haran to which Terah and his sons removed from Ur of the Chaldees; and whence Abraham and Lot subsequently removed to the land of Canaan. This city must be distinguished from another of the same name in Arabia Felix, named in Ezekiel 27, 23, probably the same mentioned in Plin. 5, 24. Lucan. 1, 107.—Genesis 11, 31.—Rosenmüller ad loc.

Carsĕŏli, a town of the Æqui, on the Via Valeria, about 15 miles from Varia. It became a Roman colony A. U. C. 451. It was one of the 30 cities which refused their assistance to the state at the most pressing period of the second Punic war. The site is now Il piano di Carseli, and its ruins, that of Celle di Carseli. Cram.—Strab. 5, 238.—Liv. 10, 3; 27, 9.

Carsŭlæ, a town of the Umbrians, on a branch of the Flaminian Way, the ruins of which are to be seen between San Gemino and Acqua Sparta. It still retains the name of Carsoli. It is noticed by Strabo among the principal towns of Umbria. Cram.—Strab. 5. 227.

Carthenna, a town of Mauritania, now Tenez, on the shores of the Mediterranean.

Carthăgo, I. an ancient city of Africa Propria, situated on a peninsula, in the north-eastern part of the province. This peninsula terminated in Cape Carthage, and was connected to the main land by an isthmus about three miles wide, which is no longer to be distinguished, the sea having retired from the adjoining beach. D'Anville remarks that "the circuit of 300 stadia given to this peninsula, must be of the shortest measure to be commensurate with the 24 miles assigned by another authority to the vast enclosure comprehending the city with its ports." Another writer, of distinguished learning, seems to apply the latter measurement to the circumference of the city itself, and the former to that of the peninsula. The town, he tells us, is "in compass 24 miles, but, measuring by the outward wall, it was 45. For, without the wall of the city itself there were three walls more, betwixt each of which there were three or four streets, with vaults under ground of 30 feet deep." It had a citadel, named Byrsa, on an eminence; a harbour, still called el-Marza, or the port, but now some distance from the sea; and an interior port, excavated by human labour, and called Cothon. The foundation of Carthage is generally attributed to Dido, whom Virgil makes a contemporary of Æneas. In point of fact, Carthage was more than once founded, if we may use the expression before the Roman conquest. In the ancient writers, not only were those said condere urbem, "to found a city," who laid its first foundations, but also those who repaired, or fortified it, or planted in it a new colony. Carthage was first founded, according to Appian, by Tzorus and Carchedon, 50 years before the fall of Troy, B. C. 1198; or, as Eusebius computes, B. C. 1217. It is said to have been again founded, or rebuilt, 173 years after the former epoch, i. e. B. C. 1025, (Euseb. 1044). Still later, by nearly 190 years, a third foundation is recorded, 143 years after the building of Solomon's temple, B. C. 861, before the building of Rome 108. Dido is said to have given the city the name of Carthadt, or Cartha-Hadath, "the new city," either because built anew by her, or to distinguish it from Utica, on the opposite shore of the intervening bay, which had been founded at an earlier period. From the Phœnician name comes the Grecian Καρχηδών and the Latin Carthago. Carthage was distinguished for the commercial enterprise of its inhabitants, and its consequent wealth and power; which excited to such a degree the jealousy of Rome, that nothing but her rival's extinction would satisfy the destined mistress of the world. (Vid. Punicum Bellum.) Among the navigators of Carthage were, Hanno, who wrote the Periplus, and Himilco, the first Carthaginian who reached the Cassiterides, or Œstrymnides, as he calls them. Among her warriors were Hamilcar, Mago, Asdrubal, and Hannibal. Scipio Africanus Minor destroyed the city 146 B. C.; its re-establishment, projected by Cæsar, was executed by Augustus; and Strabo, writing under Tiberius, speaks of Carthage as one of the most flourishing cities of Africa. It became the residence of the emperor's Vicarius, or Lieutenant-General; and the see of the chief primate of the African churches. During the greater part of the 5th and part of the 6th centuries it was occupied by the Vandals. Having been destroyed by the Saracens, it revived again, and had the reputation of a city of no mean importance till the year 1270, when, being forced by the French under Lewis the 9th, and thereupon deserted by its old inhabitants, it began to languish, and was at last reduced to nothing but a few scattered houses. The final ruin of Carthage contributed to the rise of Tunis, now the capital city. The remains of the ancient city are still visible near a fort, now called "the fort of the Goulette," from the pass which connects the gulf, at the head of which stands Tunis, with the sea without. Heyne, Exc. 1. ad Æn. lib. 4.—D'Anville.—Heyl. Cosm.—Burnouf.— de Brosses.—Justin.——II. Nova, a town in the south-eastern part of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the coast of the Mediterranean, built by Asdrubal the Carthaginian general. It was taken by Scipio when Hanno surrendered himself after a heavy loss. It now bears the name of Carthagena. Polyb. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 43, &c. —Sil. 15, v. 220, &c.

Carya, I. a town of Arcadia.——II. A city of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 10. Here a festival was observed in honour of Diana Caryatis. At that time the peasants assembled at the usual place, and sang pastorals, called Βουκολιασμοι, from Βουκολος a neatherd. From this circumstance some suppose that bucolics originated. Stat. 4, Theb. 225.

Caryanda, a town and island on the coast of Caria, now Karacoion.

Caryātæ, a people of Arcadia. According to Vitruvius, the statues called Caryatides derived their name from this place; but the anecdote that pretends to explain the connexion is improbable.

Carystus, a maritime town on the south of Eubœa, still in existence, famous for its marble. The spot at which it was obtained was called Marmarium. Stat. 2, Sylv. 2, v. 93.—Martial. 9, ep. 76.

Casilīnum, a town of Campania. When it was besieged by Hannibal, a mouse sold for 200 denarii. The place was defended by 540 or 570 natives of Præneste, who, when half their number had perished either by war or famine, surrendered to the conqueror. Liv. 23, c. 19.—Strab. 5.—Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 57.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Casius mons, I. a mountain at the east of Pelusium, where Pompey's tomb was raised by Adrian. Jupiter, surnamed Casius, had a temple there. Lucan. 8, v. 258.——II. Another in Syria, from whose top the sun can be seen rising, though it be still the darkness of night at the bottom of the mountain. Plin. 5, c. 22.—Mela, 1 and 3. It is watered the whole length of its course upon the east by the Orontes.

Caspiæ pylæ, a defile of mount Taurus, affording a passage from Media into Hyrcania. "The Tapusi, inhabiting this country, have given it the name of Tabaristan, though it is otherwise called Mazanderan. Its principal town Zadracarta has not entirely lost this name in that of Sari." D'Anville.—Diod. 1.—Plin. 5, c. 27, l. 6, c. 13.

Caspii, a Scythian nation near the Caspian Sea. Such as had lived beyond their 70th year were starved to death. Their dogs were remarkable for their fierceness. Herodot. 3. c. 92, &c. l. 7, c. 67, &c.—C. Nep. 14, c. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 798.

Caspium mare, or Hyrcānum, a large sea in the form of a lake, which has no communication with other seas, and lies between the Caspian and Hyrcanian mountains, at the north of Parthia, receiving in its capacious bed the tribute of several large rivers. Ancient authors assure us, that it produced enormous serpents and fishes, different in colour and kind from those of all other waters. The eastern parts are more particularly called the Hyrcanian Sea, and the western the Caspian. It is now called the sea of Sala or Baku. The Caspian is about 680 miles long, and in no part more than 260 in breadth. There are no tides in it, and on account of its numerous shoals it is navigable to vessels drawing only nine or ten feet water. It has strong currents, and, like inland seas, is liable to violent storms. Some navigators examined it in 1708, by order of the Czar Peter; and, after the labour of three years, a map of its extent was published. Its waters are described as brackish, and not impregnated with salt so much as the wide ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.—Curt. 3, c. 2, l. 6, c. 4, l. 7, c. 3.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 5 and 6. —Plin. 6, c. 13.—*Dionys. III. Annibalis, a town of the Brutii, now Roccella.——IV. Cyri, a country of Cilicia, where Cyrus encamped when he marched against Crœsus. Curt. 3, c. 4.——V. Julia, a town of Spain.——VI. Posthumiana, a place of Spain. Hirt. Hisp. 8. "The termination Chester, applied to many cities in England, is a depravation of the Latin term Castrum, which the Roman domination had established and rendered familiar in Britain; and which, under the Anglo Saxons, having taken the form of Ceaster, has become Cester or Chester indifferently." D'Anville.

Castŭlo, a town of Spain, where Annibal married one of the natives. It belonged to the Oretani, and stood on the Bætis. Plut. in Sert.—Liv. 24, c. 41.—Ital. 3, v. 99 and 391.

Catabathmos, a great declivity near Cyrene, fixed by Sallust as the boundary of Africa on the side of Asia. It was the last point of Marmarica on the limits of Cyrenaica, and is now Abaket-assolom. Sallust. Jug. 17 and 19.—Plin. 5, c. 5.

Catadūpa, the name of the large cataracts of the Nile, whose immense noise stuns the ear of travellers for a short space of time, and totally deprives the neighbouring inhabitants of the power of hearing. Cic. de Somn. Scip. 5.

Catāna, a town of Sicily, at the foot of mount Ætna, founded by a colony from Chalcis, 753 years before the christian era. Ceres had there a temple, in which none but women were permitted to appear. It was large and opulent, and it is rendered remarkable for the dreadful overthrows to which it has been subjected from its vicinity to Ætna, which has discharged, in some of its eruptions, a stream of lava 4 miles broad and 50 feet deep, advancing at the rate of 7 miles in a day. Catana contains now about 30,000 inhabitants. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53, l 5, c. 84.—Diod. 11 and 14.—Strab. 6—Thucyd. 6, c. 3.

Cataractes, a river of Pamphylia, now Dedensousi. It rose in the mountains which lined that province towards Phrygia, and crossing nearly its whole width from north to south, it emptied into the bay that washed the southern coast of Pamphylia and the south-eastern corner of Lycia.

Cythæa, a country of India, the precise situation of which is not known.

Catti, a people of Germany. Cæsar calls them Suevi, of which they were in reality a powerful tribe. The territory which they possessed it would not be easy to define, as it probably varied with the result of their conflicts with the other Germanic families. They had, if considered in their narrowest bounds, the Sicambri on the west and the Cherusci on the north; the Maine, within which they were not strictly confined, forming their southern boundary towards that triangular tract of country, which, lying between the Danube and the Rhine, forms now the kingdom of Wurtemburg and duchy of Baden. The name of Cassel is supposed by D'Anville to retain something of that of Castellum, a position of the Catti; and Marburg is believed by him to represent Mattium, their capital. Tacit Ann. 13, v. 57.

Caturīges, a people of Gaul, now Chorges, near the source of the Durance. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 10.—Plin. 3, c. 20.

Cavares, a people of Gaul, who inhabited the present province of Comtat in Provence.

Caucăsus, a chain of mountains which close the northern from the southern regions of Asia, between the Euxine and the Caspian seas. "On the south Caucasus joins the numerous chains of mount Taurus; to the north it borders on the vast plains where the Sarmatæ once wandered, and where the Cossacks and Kalmucks now roam; towards the east it bounds the narrow plain that separates it from the Caspian Sea; on the west the high chain terminates abruptly towards Mingrelia, by rugged mountains, called the Montes Ceraunii by the ancients. The two principal passes are mentioned by them under the name of the Caucasian and Albanian gates. The first is the defile which leads from Mosdok to Tiflis. It is the narrow valley of four days' journey, where, according to Strabo, the river Aragon, now called Arakui, flows. It is, as Pliny calls it, an enormous work of nature, who has cut out a long opening through the rocks which an iron gate would almost be sufficient to close. It is by this passage that the barbarians of the north threatened both the Roman and the Persian empires. The ancients gave different names to the strong castle which commanded this passage. It is now called Dariel. The Albanian passes of the ancients were, according to common opinion, the pass of Derbend, along the Caspian Sea: but if we compare with care all the records which the ancients have left us; if we reflect that in no descriptions of this pass is the Caspian Sea mentioned; if we remember that Ptolemy expressly placed the gates on the entrances of Albania, near the sources of the river Kasius, which, according to the whole tenor of his geography must be the modern Koisu; that the same geographer makes the Diduri neighbours to the Tusci, near the Sarmatian passes; and that these two tribes, under the names of Didos and Tushes, still dwell near a defile passing through the territory of Ooma Khan, along the frontier of Daghestan, and then traversing the district of Kagmamsharie; we shall conclude that to be the place where we must look for the Albanian or Sarmatian passes which have hitherto been misunderstood. The name of the Caspian pass, belonging properly to the defile near Teheran in Media, is vaguely applied by Tacitus and some other writers to different passes of mount Caucasus. But we must distinguish from all these passes which traverse the chain from north to south, the Iberian passes or defile of Parapaux. now Shaoorapo, by which they pass from Smeritia into Kartalinia, a defile in which, according to Strabo, there were precipices and deep abysses; but which, in the 4th century, the Persians rendered practicable for armies. The breadth of the isthmus over which these mountains extend, is about 400 miles between the mouths of the Don and the Kooma; about 756 between the straits of Caffa and the peninsula of Absheron; and about 350 between the mouths of the Phasis and the city of Derbend. It contains an extraordinary number of small nations. Some are the remains of Asiatic hordes, which, in the great migrations, passed and repassed these mountains; but the greater number are composed of indigenous and primitive tribes. The etymology of the name is not agreed upon, but it is probably a compound of a Persian word, Caw a mountain, and a Scythian word Caspi, white mountain. Eratosthenes informs us that the natives called it Caspios; but Pliny says that the native name was Graucasus, which may be considered as Gothic." Malte-Brun.

Caucones, a people of Paphlagonia, originally inhabitants of Arcadia, or of Scythia according to some accounts. Some of them made a settlement near Dymæ in Elis. Herodot. 1, &c.—Strab. 8, &c.

Caudi, and Caudium, a town of the Samnites, near which, in a place called Caudinæ Furculæ, the Roman army under T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Posthumius was obliged to surrender to the Samnites, and pass under the yoke with the greatest disgrace. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 2. v. 138.

Caulonia, or Caulon, a town of Italy near the country of the Brutii, founded by a colony of Achæans, and destroyed in the wars between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Paus. 6, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 553.

Caunus, a city of Caria, opposite Rhodes, where Protogenes was born. The climate was considered as unwholesome, especially in summer. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 14. Herodot. 1, c. 176.

Cauros, an island with a small town, formerly called Andros, in the Ægean Sea. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Cayster, now Kitcheck Meinder, which signifies Little Meander, a rapid river of Asia, rising in Lydia, and after a meandering course, falling into the Ægean Sea near Ephesus. According to the poets, the banks and neighbourhood of this river were generally frequented by swans. Ovid. Met. 2. v. 253, l. 5. v. 386.—Mart. 1, ep. 54.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 461.—Virg. G. 1, v. 384.

Ceba, now Ceva, a town of modern Piedmont, famous for cheese. Plin. 11, c. 42.

Cebrenia, a country of Troas, with a town of the same name, called after the river Cebrenus, which is in the neighbourhood. Œnone, the daughter of the Cebrenus, receives the patronymic of Cebrenis. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769. —Stat. 1, Sylv. 5, v. 21.

Cecropia, the original name of Athens, in honour of Cecrops, its first founder. The Athenians are often called Cecropidæ.

Celenæ, or Celene, a city of Phrygia, of which it was once the capital. Cyrus the younger had a palace there, with a park filled with wild beasts, where he exercised himself in hunting. The Mæander arose in this park. Xerxes built a famous citadel there after his defeat in Greece. The inhabitants of Celænæ were carried by Antiochus Soter to people Apamea when newly founded. Strab. 12.—Liv. 38, c. 13.—Xenoph. Anab. 1. Marsyas is said to have contended in its neighbourhood against Apollo. Herodot. 7, c. 26.—Lucan. 3, v. 206.

Celendræ, Celendris, and Celenderis, a colony of the Samians in Cilicia. Lucan. 8, v. 259.

Celenna, or Celena, a town of Campania, where Juno was worshipped. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 739.

Celtæ, a name given to the nation that inhabited the country between the ocean and the Palus Mæotis, according to some authors mentioned by Plut. in Mario. This name, though anciently applied to the inhabitants of Gaul, as well as of Germany and Spain, was more particularly given to a part of the Gauls, whose country, called Gallia Celtica, was situate between the rivers Sequana and Garumna, modernly called la Seine and la Garonne. The Celtæ seemed to receive their name from Celtus, a son of Hercules or of Polyphemus. The promontory which bore the name of Celticum is now called Cape Finisterre. The name of Celtæ was bestowed in antiquity upon numerous tribes of men, called by the Romans, in imitation of the Greeks, Barbarians, and inhabiting at different periods different parts of the "orbis veteribus notus." At the dawn of history they were found residing, in various families, through all the north and north-east of Europe, and by the Palus Mæotis, extending from the Asiatic side. Every possible theory has been imagined and exhausted in regard to their origin; and the sturdiest antiquarians are only satisfied with seeing clearly their descent from the offspring of Noah. With these theories we have nothing here to do. History, however, traces their gradual progress towards the west, as the Cimbric and Gothic races pressed on them from behind from the same forests probably from which they had still earlier migrated themselves. Their connexion with the Cimbri is probable, as with an intermediate race; but their establishment in Gaul, while the Cimbri still occupied the western banks of the Rhine and extended to the Chersonese that bore their name, marks out the chronological order of their progress towards the west. As the northern extremity of this region became likewise subject to the pressure of the later barbarians, the Celtæ passed across the Seine, established themselves between that river and the Loire, and gave their name to the comparatively narrow tract that lay between. In reference to later ages, the people of this region are more specially alluded to when the Roman historians name the Celts. Other bodies, however, crossed over to the British Isles, where they were still subject to the same invasion of their territory, until they appear to have retreated at last to the verge of the western ocean. Then it is that poetry, if not history, drives them even across the Atlantic, and claims for them the discovery of America. When first the Gauls began to find themselves restrained in their settlements about the Rhine, or probably allured by the inducements of a milder climate, they passed the Alps on one side and the Pyrenees on the other, establishing in Italy the name of Gaul from the Alps and the Adige to the Appenines and the Po; and in Spain, the name of Celts in that of Celtiberi. Vid. Gallia, Celtica, Celtiberi, Britannia. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 1, &c. Mela, 3, c. 2.—Herodot. 4, c. 49.

Celtiberi, a people of Spain, descended from the Celtæ. Vid. Hispania. Their country, called Celtiberia, is now known by the name of Arragon. Diod. 6.—Flor. 2, c. 17.—Strab. 4. —Lucan. 4, v. 10.—Sil. It. 8, v. 339.

Celtica, a third of Gaul in the division of the Commentaries; its northern boundary was formed by the rivers Seine and Marne, and the territory of the Leuci; its eastern, by the Rhætian, Pennine, Graian, and Cottian Alps; its southern, by the Province, a part of the Cevennes, and the river Garonne; while the ocean bathed it on the western shore. Within these limits was a Celtic population, divided into at least 43 separate people. This was not, however, the line which, under the empire, included Celtic Gaul. Augustus extended Aquitania to include that portion of Celtica which lay between the Garonne and the Loire; and what remained of this province assumed the name of Lugdunensis, Lionois. It is as thus reduced, that Gallia Celtica is most frequently considered. When the Gauls of the Province assumed in a measure the dress and manners of the Romans, their country was designated as Gallia Braccata, from the garment which they wore; and Celtic Gaul was, from the inhabitants suffering their hair to grow, called Gallia Comata.

Celtici, a people of Lusitania, between the Anas, the Tagus, and the ocean. Their principal city was Pax Julia, now Beja, according to D'Anville, who observes, that a body of this people "having crossed the Anas, was cantoned far distant in the neighbourhood of Finisterre, which, besides the name of Artabrum, was also called Celticum."

Celtoscythæ, a northern nation of Scythians. Strab. 10.

Cenæum, a promontory of Eubœa, where Jupiter Cenæus had an altar raised by Hercules. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 136.—Thucyd. 3, c. 93.

Cenchreæ, I. now Kenkri, the port or harbour of Corinth, on the Saronic gulf. It stood from nine to ten miles distant from the capital, and the road which led to it is said by Pausanias to have been lined with temples and sepulchres. The bath of Helen near this place, according to the account of Dr. Clarke, is a spring, boiling up with force enough to turn a mill.——II. Another of Argolis, from which the road to Tegea passed by mount Parthenius which formed the limit between Argolis and Arcadia. Paus.—Corinth. 24.—Arcad. 6, 54. —Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 19.—Plin. 4, c. 4.

Cenimagni, a name of the Iceni, according to Cæsar and Tacitus. Camb. Brit.

Cenomani. Vid. Aulerci.

Centrones, a people of Gaul inhabiting the Graian Alps about the sources of the Isara, between the Salassi and the Allobroges, the modern Dauphiné and department of Isere. A small town under the Romans, Forum Claudii, preserves the name of Centron, and was, perhaps, at one time the capital of the Centrones; but Monstier, which formerly was known by the name of Darantasia, and was certainly at one period a capital, imparted its name in that of Tarantois to the country of the Centrones.

Centum Cellæ, a sea-port town of Etruria built by Trajan, who had there a villa. It is now Civita Vecchia.

Centŭrĭpa, (æ, or a, arum,) now Centorbi, a town of Sicily at the foot of mount Ætna. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 23.—Ital. 14, v. 205.—Plin. 3, c. 8.

Ceos, and Cea, a principal island of the Cyclades. It was supposed to have been torn by some convulsion from the southern coast of Eubœa. The inhabitants were Ionians from Attica, and are said to have fought for the liberty of Greece at Artemisium and at Salamis. It stood within five miles of the promontory of Sunium. There were at one time four flourishing towns on this island, Iulis, Carthæa, Coressia, and Pœessa; but before the time of Strabo the population of the two latter had been transferred to the former. The modern name is Zia.—Plin. 4, 12.—Herodot. 8. 1.—Strab.

Cephălas, a lofty promontory of Africa, near the Syrtis Major. Strab.

Cephallēna, and Cephallenia, an island in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Acarnania, about 120 miles in circumference by modern measurement, though Strabo and Ptolemy represent it at much less. The name of Cephallenia, as derived by mythologists from Cephalus, who received it from Amphitryon, was later than that of Teloboæ, or than that of Samos, by which it is designated by Homer, Od. 4, 671, and 2,634; though the same poet refers to the inhabitants by the name of Cephallenians. Il. 2, 631, and 4, 329. It was sometimes called likewise Tetrapolis from its four principal cities, Palle or Pale, Cranii, Same, and Proni. The modern name of Cephalonia has succeeded, with a slight change, to that which designated the island as a part of the dominions of Ulysses almost 3000 years ago.

Cephaloedis, and Cephaludium, now Cephalu, a town at the north of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 253.—Cic. 2, in Verr. 51.

Cephisia, a part of Attica, through which the Cephisus flows. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Cephisus, and Cephissus, I. a celebrated river of Greece, that rises at Lilæa in Phocis, and, after passing at the north of Delphi, and mount Parnassus, enters Bœotia, where it flows into the lake Copais. The Graces were particularly fond of this river, whence they are called the goddesses of the Cephisus. Strab. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 7.—Paus. 9, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 29.—Lucan. 3, v. 175.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 369, l. 3, v. 19.——II. Another of Attica, which arose not far from Colonos, and passing through the plains to the west of the city, flowed under the Long Walls, and fell into the sea near Phalerum. Though in the Œdipus at Colonos the Cephissus is represented by Sophocles as a perennial stream, it now scarcely reaches the harbour, the water being drawn off by the inhabitants of the city and the plains for domestic purposes, or for the irrigation of the ground.——III. Another, called Eleusinius, to distinguish it from that at Athens called Atticus. Near this was Erineus, which the poets have rendered known by the fable of Pluto's descent through the earth at this spot with Proserpine. Soph. Œd. Col. 685.—Gell's Itiner.—Paus. Att. 38.

Cercina, I. now Kerkeni, a small island of the Mediterranean, near the smaller Syrtis, on the coast of Africa. Tacit. 1, Ann. 53.—Strab. 17.—Liv. 33, c. 48.—Plin. 5, c. 7.——II. A mountain of Thrace, towards Macedonia. Thucyd. 2, c. 98.

Cercinium, a town of Macedonia, near lake Bœbe. Liv. 31, c. 41.

Cetius, I. a river of Mysia.——II. A mountain which separated Noricum from Pannonia.

Chaboras, a river of Mesopotamia, now al-Khabour, which joins the Euphrates at Circesium. The name Araxes, by which it is called in the Anabasis of Xenophon, appears to be an appellative term, as we find it applied to many other rivers in antiquity. D'Anville.

Chæronea, a city of Bœotia, to the north-west of Lebadea, celebrated for a defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, B. C. 447, and for the victory which Philip of Macedonia obtained there over the confederate army of the Thebans and the Athenians, B. C. 338. This town witnessed another bloody engagement, between the Romans under the conduct of Sylla, and the troops of Mithridates commanded by Taxiles and Archelaus, 86 B. C. Chæronea is now called Kaprena, and is still a populous village, with many vestiges of the ancient town. It was the birth-place of Plutarch. Cram.—Paus. 9, c. 40.—Plut. in Pelops. &c.—Strab. 9.

Chalæon, a maritime town of Locris, on the Crissæan gulf. Its harbour apparently stood where the Scala of Salona is now laid down in modern maps. Cram.

Chalcēdon, an ancient city of Bithynia, opposite Byzantium, built by a colony from Megara, headed by Argias, B. C. 685. "Chalcedon was called the city of the blind, in derision of its Greek founders for overlooking the more advantageous situation of Byzantium. A council against the Eutychian heresy, in the middle of the fifth century, has illustrated Chalcedon which has taken under the Turks the name of Kadi-Keni, or the Burgh of the Kadi." D'Anville.—Strab. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Mela. 1, c. 19.

Chalcidice, I. "a country of Macedonia, south and east of Mygdonia, so named from the Chalcidians, an ancient people of Eubœan origin, who appear to have formed settlements in this part of Macedonia at an early period. Thucydides always terms them the Chalcidians of Thrace, to distinguish them apparently from the Chalcidians of Eubœa."—"The whole of Chalcidice may be considered as forming one great peninsula, confined between the gulf of Thessalonica and the Strymonicus Sinus. But it also comprises within itself three smaller peninsulas, separated from each other by inlets of the sea." Cram.——II. A district of Syria. Vid. Chalcis.

Chalcis, I. the principal city of Eubœa, situate on the Euripus, nearly opposite Aulis, was founded by a colony of Ionians from Athens, conducted by Cothus. "The Chalcidians having joined the Bœotians in their depredations on the coast of Attica, soon after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ, afforded the Athenians just grounds for reprisals." They therefore passed over into Eubœa in great force, and, after defeating the Chalcidians, "seized upon the lands of the wealthiest inhabitants, and distributed them among 4000 of their own citizens. These, however, were obliged to evacuate the island on the arrival of the Persian fleet under Datis and Artaphernes. The Chalcidians, after the termination of the Persian war, became again dependent on Athens with the rest of Eubœa, and did not regain their liberty till the close of the Peloponnesian war, when they asserted their freedom, and, aided by the Bœotians, fortified the Euripus and established a communication with the continent by throwing a wooden bridge across the channel. Towers were placed at each extremity, and room was left in the middle for one ship to pass. Pausanias informs us, that Chalcis no longer existed in his day. Procopius names it among the towns restored by Justinian." Cram.—Il. B. 537.—Herodot. 5, 77.—Diod. Sic. 13, 355.——II. A town of the district Chalcidice, in Syria, to which it probably communicated its name. This town was situated on the river Chalus, which loses itself in a lake below the city. The Greek name Chalcis "had supplanted the Syriac denomination Kirmesrin, little known at present in the vestiges of a place which the Franks call the Old Alep." D'Anville.

Chaldæa, a country of Asia, between the Euphrates and Tigris. Its capital is Babylon, whose inhabitants are famous for their knowledge of astrology. "The name of Chaldæa, which is more precisely appropriated to the part nearest the Persian gulf, is sometimes employed as a designation of the whole country; and the greater part of it being comprehended between the rivers, has given occasion to extend to it the name of Mesopotamia. It is this country which the Arabs name properly Irak; and it is by the extension that this name has taken in penetrating into ancient Media, that the part contiguous to Babylonia is called Irak Araby. D'Anville.

Chalybes, and Calybes, a people of Asia Minor, near Pontus. They attacked the ten thousand in their retreat, and behaved with much spirit and courage. They were partly conquered by Crœsus, king of Lydia. Some authors imagine that the Calybes are a nation of Spain. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 421.—Strab. 12, &c.—Apollon. 2, v. 375.—Xenoph. Anab. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.—Justin. 44, c. 3.

Chalybon, now supposed to be Aleppo, a town of Syria, which gave the name of Chalibonitis to the neighbouring country.

Chalybonītis, a country of Syria, so famous for its wines that the king of Persia drank no other.

Chalybs, a river in Spain, where Justin. 44, c. 3, places the people called Calybes.

Chaŏnes, a people of Epirus.

Chaŏnia, a mountainous part of Epirus, which receives its name from Chaon, a son of Priam, inadvertently killed by his brother Helenus. There was a wood near, where doves (Chaoniæ aves) were said to deliver oracles. The words Chaonius victus are by ancient authors applied to acorns, the food of the first inhabitants. Lucan. 6, v. 426.—Claudian. de Pros. rapt. 3, v. 47.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 335.—Propert. 1, el. 9.—Ovid. A. A. 1.

CHARONIUM, a cave near Nysa, where the sick were supposed to be delivered from their disorders by certain superstitious solemnities.

CHARYBDIS, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Sicily, opposite another whirlpool called Scylla, on the coast of Italy. It was very dangerous to sailors, and it proved fatal to a part of the fleet of Ulysses. The exact situation of the Charybdis is not discovered by the moderns, as no whirlpool sufficiently tremendous is now found to correspond to the description of the ancients. The words Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdim, became a proverb, to show, that in our eagerness to avoid one evil we often fall into a greater. It is supposed that Charybdis was an avaricious woman, who stole the oxen of Hercules, for which theft she was struck with thunder by Jupiter, and changed into a whirlpool. Lycophr. in Cass.—Homer. Od. 12. —Propert. 3, el. 11.—Ital. 14.—Ovid. in Ibid. de Ponto, 4, el. 10, Amor. 2, el. 16.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 420.

CHAUS, and CHAUCI, a people of Germany, dwelling on the western coast, between the Amisia, (the Ems) and the Albis (the Elbe), that is to say, in a great measure the territory included in the kingdom of Hanover. They were divided by the Visurgis (the Weser) into the Chauci Majores on the east, and the Minores on the west; and are mentioned particularly by Tacitus as among the greatest of the Germanic nations, and remarkable for their virtues.

CHELIDONIÆ INSULÆ, small islands opposite the Sacrum Promontorium, which formed the western extremity of the great Taurus range. The promontory itself was also called Chelidonium, of which the modern name is Cape Kelidoni.

CHELIDŌNIUM. Vid. Chelidoniæ Insulæ.

CHELONATAS, a promontory of Elis, below Cyllene, and forming the northern point of land which lies upon the bay of the same name. The opposite point upon the south was the promontory Pheia. The cape is now called Tornese.

CHEMMIS, an island in a deep lake of Egypt. Herodot. 2, c. 156.

CHERONÆA. Vid. Chæronea.

CHERSONĒSUS, a Greek word, rendered by the Latins Peninsula. There were many of these among the ancients of which five are the most celebrated; the PELOPONNESUS, and the THRACIAN in the south of Thrace, and west of the Hellespont, where Miltiades led a colony of Athenians, and built a wall across the isthmus. From its isthmus to its further shores, it measured 420 stadia, extending between the bay of Melas and the Hellespont. Next to the Peloponnesus, and scarcely less noted, was the CHERSONESUS CIMBRICA, now Holstein and Jutland. It was formed by the waters of the Sinus Codanus, which surrounded it on the east and separated it from Scandinavia; and on the west by the ocean, which lay between it and the British Isles. There is no portion of the ancient world of greater interest than this. All Europe became acquainted with the various people who at different times obtained an establishment in it, and who rarely departed from it, except to carry slaughter and devastation into more civilized regions. In the earliest ages it is thought to have been occupied by the Celts; and towards the close of the Roman republic, in the time of Marius, it sent forth another population, the Cimbri, that seemed to threaten even the pride of the conquerors of Carthage, and, as they boasted themselves, masters of the world. Many centuries afterwards a new race of men, the followers and worshippers of Odin left its narrow bounds to trouble the new countries that arose upon the ruins of the dismembered empire. The Saxons, Jutes, and Angli, were the principal inhabitants of this region, fertile in warriors, before the passage of a great proportion of the first and last of these to establish themselves in the conquered provinces of Britain. The CHERSONESUS TAURICA, now Crim Tartary. It had been, like all the region of the Mæotis Palus, in the possession of the Cimmerians. The name Crim or Crimea, which remains to it, is, however, in the opinion of D'Anville, a Cimmerian derivative; though the Tauri or Tauro-Scythæ, at a very early period dispossessed them of these their first European abodes. From these latter people came the name of Taurica. They in turn were for the greater part reduced by Mithridates before the overthrow of his power; and afterwards the Chersonese became a tributary kingdom, acknowledging the superiority of the emperors. On the second coming of the barbarians, towards the last years of the empire, this region was again the prey of new conquerors and the establishment of Gothic tribes, about the Crimea and the northern part of the Euxine Sea, gave to the Chersonese the name of Gothia. The situation of this singular peninsula is too well known to require more than a brief notice of its form and boundaries. It stands at the northern head of the Euxine Sea, and forms the Sea of Azof, by stretching over towards the eastern shore, and blocking up the passage to the mouth of the Tanais. On the north, the morass of the Palus Mæotis, extending inland, formed the peninsula; and on the opposite side, the Euxine, making there a bay called Carcinites, contracted to an extreme narrowness the isthmus that joined it to the shores of the main land. The principal city was Panticupæum. It was of Grecian origin, and is now perhaps Kerché. The fifth, surnamed AUREA, lies in India, beyond the Ganges. Herodot. 6, c. 33, l. 7, c. 58. —Liv. 31, c. 16.—Cic. ad Br. 2.

CHERUSCI, a German people dwelling upon the Albis above the Chauci, and extending beyond the Visurgis towards the Amisia and country of the Catti. These were all of one common race; and some time after the defeat of Varus, by which the Cherusci and their leader Armunius attained the highest honour and the greatest glory, this people are supposed to have become subject to their neighbours, the Chauci.

Chidōrus, a river of Macedonia, near Thessalonica, not sufficiently large to supply the army of Xerxes with water. Herodot. 7, c. 127.

Chios, now Scio, an island in the Ægean Sea, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor, which receives its name, as some suppose, from Chione, or from χιων, snow, which was very frequent there. It was well inhabited, and could once equip a hundred ships; and its chief town, called Chios, had a beautiful harbour, which could contain eighty ships. The wine of this island, so much celebrated by the ancients, is still in general esteem. Chios was anciently called Æthalia, Macris, and Pityasa. There was no adultery committed there for the space of 700 years. Plut. de Virt. Mul. —Horat. 3, od. 19, v. 5, 1, Sat. 10, v. 24.—Paus. 7, c. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 2.

Choaspes, I. a river of Asia, running from north to south, and falling into the Persian gulf. The water of this river was sacred to the use of the Persian kings, who carried with them a supply of it in all their expeditions. It rose near the mountains Orontes in Media, and crossed the Satrapy of Susiana, passing by the royal city of Susa. The part of this river which belongs to Media was called Eulæus, the Ulai of the prophet Daniel.——II. Another, called also Choes, which Chaussard believes to be the proper name.——III. Another, which rose in the north-west of the Paropamisus mons, and, after joining the Cophes near the town of Nysa, emptied into the Indus on the nearer side. Herod. 1, 188.—Plin. 6, 25.—Arr.

Chorasmi, a Scythian tribe, of the great nation of the Sacæ, dwelling upon the Oxus from the Caspian Sea to the borders of Sogdiana. On the south and south-west they had the Parthians. Their country is now called Khoaresm. Its present inhabitants are the Usbecks, or Chinese Tartars.

Chronus, a river of European Sarmatia (Lithuania), now the Memel, or, as the Poles denominate it, the Niemen. It rises in the same country, in regions remote from the knowledge and civilizations of the Romans, and, after passing in a winding course through the forests which the arms of the conquering Republic had not subdued, and which were little subject to the ambition of the emperors, it falls into the Baltic between the gulf of Dantzig and the gulf of Livonia, scarcely better known to the people of antiquity.

Chrysa, and Chryse, a town of Mysia, in that part which constituted the Troad. It was south of the island of Tenedos, upon the Sinus Adramyttenus, and appears in the time of Homer to have been peculiarly dedicated to Apollo, surnamed Smintheus. Mela.—Hom. 1, 37.

Chrysas, a river of Sicily, falling into the Simæthus, and worshipped as a deity. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 44.

Chrysopŏlis, a promontory and port of Asia, opposite Byzantium, now Scutari.

Chrysorrhoas, I. a river of Syria. It passed by Damascus, and streamed through the city divided into several currents. The modern name of Baradi is derived from another name, Bardine, by which it was also known in antiquity.——II. Another of Argolis, that flowed through the city of Trœzene.

Cibalæ, now Swilei, a town of Pannonia, where Licinius was defeated by Constantine. It was the birth-place of Gratian. Eutrop. 10, c. 4.—Marcell. 30, c. 24.

Cibyra, now Buruz, a town of Phrygia on the Lycus, towards the borders of Lycia. It was called Magna, to distinguish it from Cybra Parva in Pamphylia. The latter of these towns stood near the coast, on the banks of the Melas. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 33.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 13.—Attic. 5, ep. 2.

Cicŏnes, a people of Thrace, near the Hebrus. Ulysses, at his return from Troy, conquered them, and plundered their chief city Ismarus, because they had assisted Priam against the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 83, l. 15, v. 313.—Virg. G. 4, v. 520, &c.—Mela, c. 2.

Cilicia, I. a country of Asia Minor, on the south, said by the poets and mythologists to have been founded by Cilix, the son of Agenor. On the north mount Taurus divided it from Pisidia, Lycaonia in Phrygia, and Cataonia in Cappadocia; Pamphylia bordered on it towards the north-west; on the south-west it had the open Mediterranean; on the east the Amanus mons, which separated it from Comagene; and on the south the Aulon Cilicius lay between it and Cyprus, and formed with the Issicus Sinus its boundary in that direction. The entrance by land into this mountain-bound country was on the side of Cappadocia, through the Ciliciæ or Tauri Pylæ, through which Alexander effected his passage, and the Armanicæ, or Syriæ Pylæ, which gave entrance to the Persian Darius. Cilicia was geographically divided into Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris. The chief towns of the former were, Selinus, afterwards Trajanopolis, and now Selenti, Seleucia, and Tarsus the common capital; in the latter were Anazarbus and Issus, famous for the defeat of the Persian king. In the historians of the eastern empire the name of Isauria extended over the Taurus, and was often applied to the first division of Cilicia. The whole, at a still later period, that is to say, in the ages of the Crusades, was known as the kingdom of Leon. The origin of the Cilices is obscure; but those who possessed the country in the time of the Romans do not seem to have been of a date anterior to the Trojan war, from which they are supposed to have wandered to Syria, and to have received then permission to fix themselves in the country called afterwards Cilicia. They fell successively into the hands of the Persians, of Alexander, and of his successors. In the time of the Seleucidæ the people of Cilicia became greatly addicted to piracy, and were only reduced by the efforts of the Romans, who appointed three leaders against them at different times; Servilius surnamed Isauricus for his victories obtained in these parts, Cicero, and Pompey. The modern name of Cilicia is Itshil, which occupies very nearly the extent of country between the mountains and the sea.——II. A part of the Troad, about the Sinus Adramyttenus, was also called Cilicia from the Cilices, who, together with the Leleges in Homer's time, inhabited that region. From these Cilices the name of Cilicia was given to the country between the Taurus and the Mediterranean, in which, after the Trojan war, they fixed themselves. The same name was given to that part of Cappadocia which lay about the sources of the Halys, and was by the Romans erected into a prefecture. It contained the city of Mazaca, the capital of the province. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Varro. R. R. 2, c. 11.—Sueton. in Vesp. 8.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, 34.—Justin. 11, c. 11.—Curt. 3, c. 4.—Plin. 5, c. 27.

CIMBRI, a people of Germany, who invaded the Roman empire with a large army, and were conquered by Marius. Flor. 3, c. 3. Vid. Celtæ and Chersonesus Cimbrica.

CIMINUS, now Viterbe, a lake and mountain of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697.—Liv. 9, c. 36.

CIMMERII, I. a people near the Palus Mæotis, who invaded Asia Minor, and seized upon the kingdom of Cyaxares. After they had been masters of the country for 28 years, they were driven back by Alyattes, king of Lydia. The history of these people is wrapt in the same obscurity as that which envelopes the accounts of the Celtæ, Cimbri, and Teutones. By some antiquarians they are considered to have been of Cimbric origin, and by others of Celtic; and though it would be unsafe to assert that such was the case, it does not seem improbable that they may have been originally that portion of the Celtæ which continued in the north-eastern regions when the greater part roamed onward towards the west. In this case, and, perhaps, at any rate, they must have greatly differed in the lapse of ages from the other Celts, as well from the mixture which the latter admitted in their migrations, as from similar changes which they must themselves have been subject to on the passage of the numberless Asiatic and more northern tribes that passed on their way to the south, the region of the Tanais and the Palus Mæotis, the gates of Europe towards Asia. Herodot. 1, c. 6, &c. 1. 4, c. 1, &c.——II. Another nation on the western coast of Italy, generally imagined to have lived in caves near the seashore of Campania, and there, in concealing themselves from the light of the sun, to have made their retreat the receptacle of their plunder. In consequence of this manner of living, the country which they inhabited was supposed to be so gloomy, that, to mention a great obscurity, the expression of Cimmerian darkness has proverbially been used. Homer, according to Plutarch, drew his images of hell and Pluto from this gloomy and dismal country, where also Virgil and Ovid have placed the Styx, the Phlegethon, and all the dreadful abodes of the infernal regions. Homer. Od. 13.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 592, &c.—Strab. 5. Vid. Celtæ and Avernus.

CIMMERIUM, now Crim, a town of Taurica Chersonesus, whose inhabitants are called Cimmerii. Of this Chersonese, says D'Anville, "the mountainous part towards the south preserved the name of mons Cimmerius, in which an ancient place is discovered, called Eski Krim, or the Old Krim." Mela, 1, c. 19.

CIMOLUS, now Argentiera, an island in the Cretan Sea, producing chalk and fuller's earth. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.—Plin. 35, c. 16.

CINYPS, and CINYPHUS, a river of Africa, in the country of the Garamantes. It rose in the mons Charitum, and fell into the Sinus Syrticus. On its banks was the town of Cinyps. Herodot. 4, c. 198.—Plin. 5, c. 4.—Lucan. 9, v. 787.

CIRRHA, and CYRRHA, a town of Phocis, at the head of the Crissæan gulf at the mouth of the Pleistus. It was only 10 miles from Delphi, and was used as its port. Cyrrha is famous for the Sacred War excited against it for the violence offered by the Cyrrhæans to a Phocian maid returning from Delphi. The Amphictyons, under whose protection all those were in some measure considered who visited the Delphic oracle, denounced an exterminating war against the inhabitants of the devoted place; and the oracle having seconded the denunciation of this body, the whole Cyrrhæan territory was held accurst, and all the cities of Greece, which belonged to the Amphictyonic league, were called upon to take arms against Cyrrha. For ten years the little state held out against the combined influence of violence and of superstition; but, at last, being overcome, the whole country was laid under an interdict, the walls of the city demolished, the surrounding habitations were razed, and it was forbidden ever after to cultivate the land which they had occupied. These events took place in the time of the seven sages; and Solon, the greatest among them, took part in this extirpating contest. "The Cyrrhæan plain and port, which are now accursed, were formerly inhabited by the Cyrrhæi and Acragallidæ, a nefarious race, who violated the sanctity of the temple of Delphi, and ransacked its treasures." The ruins of this place are said, by Sir W. Gell, to be still discernible near the village of Xeno Pegadia. Paus.—Phoc. 37. —Æsch. in Ctes.

CIRTA, a town of Numidia, the residence of the kings of that country. It stood about midway between the coast and the Aurasius mons, on the river Ampsagas, towards the source. In the time of Cæsar it assumed the name of Sitianorum Colonia, but this was changed into Constantina, which it has retained to modern times.

CISSIA, a country of Susiana, of which Susa was the capital. Herodot. 5, c. 49.

CISSUS, a mountain of Macedonia, near which was a town of the same name.

CITHÆRON, a lofty ridge that lay between the territories Bœotia and Megaris, and united with mount Parnes, which, stretching out to the north-east, separated Bœotia from Attica. No spot in Greece is more famous among the poets; and the scene of the tragical stories of Actæon's fate, of the death of Pentheus, and of the exposure of Œdipus, which, in its result, afforded matter for the two greatest efforts of the genius of Sophocles, was on this celebrated mount. Paus. Bœot. 2.—Soph. Œd. Tyr. 1451. "It is now shrouded by deep gloom and dreary desolation; and covered only with dark stinted shrubs. Towards its summit, however, it is crowned with forests of fir, from which it derives its modern name of Elatea." Dodwell's Travels.

Cithaerista, a promontory of Gaul. La Ciotat, near Ceresle. D'Anville.

Clāros, or Clarus, a town of Ionia, with a fountain, grove, and temple of Apollo, on which account he was surnamed Clarius. It is situated near Colophon, and was founded, according to mythologists, by Manto, the daughter of Tiresias. Nearchus says it received its name from κλῆρος, sors.—(Facciolati.)—Plin. 1, 2, c. 103. —Ovid. 1, Met. v. 515.

Clastidium, a town of Liguria, now Chiasteggio, celebrated as the place where Claudius Marcellus gained the spolia opima by slaying Viridomarus, king of the Gæsata. Clastidium was betrayed to Hannibal after the battle of Ticinus, with considerable magazines which the Romans had laid up there; and it formed the chief depot of the Carthaginian army while encamped on the Trebia. It was afterwards burnt by the Romans in a war with the Ligurians. Cram.—Strab. 5, 27.—Polyb. 2, 34; 3, 69.—Plut. vit. Marc.—Val. Max. 1, 1.—Liv. 21, 48; 32, 29, 31.—*Cic. Tusc. Clazŏmĕnæ, a city of Ionia in Asia Minor, situated on a small peninsula projecting into the Smyrnæus Sinus from a larger one. It was celebrated as being the birth-place of the philosopher Anaxagoras, for its wines, and for a beautiful temple of Apollo in its neighbourhood. The modern Vourla is near the site of the ancient city. Heyl. Cosm.—Plin. 1, 14, c. 7.—Cic. 3, de Orat. 34.

Cleŏnæ, I. a town of Argolis, to the north-east of Nemea and mount Tretus. Strabo places it 120 stadia from Argos on the one side, and 80 from Corinth on the other: he adds that its situation fully justifies the epithet εὐκτιμένας applied to it by Homer. The ruins of Cleonæ are to be seen on the site now called Courtese. Cram. Gr.——Il. B. 570.——II. A town in the peninsula of Chalcidice, said to have been founded by a colony from Chalcis. Herodot. 7, 22. —Plin. 4, 10.—Herac. Pont. Polit. 30, 216.

Clibanus mons, a part of the Appenines south of the river Neathus, now called Monte Visardo. Cram.

Climax, I. a celebrated pass in the neighbourhood of Phaselis, leading from Lycia into Pamphylia. This pass is so much contracted by a brow of mount Taurus, that Alexander, in entering Pamphylia, was forced to lead his troops through the sea. D'Anville.——II. A defile through which the road from Argolis to Mantinea runs. The modern Scala Tou Bey, or the Bey's Causey, probably answers to the ancient pass. Cram.

Climberris. Vid Augusta Ausciorum.

Clitæ, I. a wild and savage people of Cilicia, addicted to plunder. They assembled under Trosobor, a warlike chief, and pitched their camp on a craggy and almost inaccessible mountain in the range of Taurus, whence they sallied against the neighbouring cities, plundered the people and merchants, and utterly ruined navigation and commerce. They laid siege to the city of Anemurium, and routed a body of horse, sent from Cyria, under Curtius Severus, to the relief of the place. They were at length ruined by dissension among themselves, and their leader, Trosobor, was put to death. Tacit. Ann. 12, 55.——II. Livy (44, 2.) notices a spot named Clitæ, in the immediate vicinity of Cassandrea. Cram.

Clitor, I. a town of Arcadia, situated on the Aroanius, said to have been founded by Clitor, the son of Azan. The site is now called Katzanes. There was at Clitor, according to Pliny, a fountain which rendered those who tasted its waters averse to wine. Cram.—Paus. Arcad. 21.—Plin. 4, 19, 3.—Strab. 8, 388.—Ovid. Met. 15, 322.——II. Pausanias likewise mentions a river Clitor, whose fishes were said to sing like thrushes. Cram.

Clitumnus, a small but noted river of Umbria, rising in the neighbourhood of Trebia, which, with several small streams, unites in forming the Tinia, modern Timia. The vicinity of this river is celebrated by many Roman poets, as affording suitable victims to be offered up on the solemn occasions of their country's triumphs. This stream now bears the name of Clitumno. Cram.—Plin. 8, ep. 8.

Cloacæ. Vid. Cloasina, Part III.

Clupea, a maritime town of Africa Propria, called by the Greeks Aspis, by the Romans Clupea, or Clypea, so called from the figure of the hill or eminence on which it was situated. It was built by the Sicilians in the expedition of Agathocles. Vestiges of this town are still known to exist under the name of Aklibia. Liv. 27, 29.

Clusini fontes, baths in Etruria. Horat. 1. ep. 15, v. 9.

Clusium, now Chiusi, one of the principal towns of Etruria, the capital of Porsenna. It is supposed to have borne the name Camera, and to have belonged to the Camertes in ages anterior not only to the founding of Rome, but even to the occupation of Etruria by that race of men, who, under the name of Tyrrheni, possessed it at the era assumed for the mythological account of the Trojan settlement in Italy. The Clanis flowed near it on the north-east, lying between it and the city of Perusia and the Thrasymenian lake. This city was taken by the Gauls under Brennus; and it was here that the Roman ambassadors had an interview with that conquering barbarian, and by their pride impelled him to the sack of Rome. Modern Chiusi is represented as occupying the site of the Clusium, which we have just described; but a more recent city of the same name, called for distinction Novum, was built under the Appenines, north of Arretium, and towards the borders of Cisalpine Gaul. Of the magnificent mausoleum which Porsenna is said to have erected for himself at Clusium, no vestige remains to confirm the improbable account. Liv. 2, 9, and 5, 33, and 10, 25.—Plin. 36, 13.—Cram. At the north of Clusium there was a lake, called Clusina lacus, which extended northward as far as Arretium, and had a communication with the Arnus. Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 167 and 655.

Clusius, a river of Cisalpine Gaul. Polyb. 2.

Cnemis, a mountain connected with the hills of Bœotia, which now belongs to the chain called Talanta. It imparted its name to the Epicnemidian Locri. Cram.—Strab. 9.

Cnidus, and Gnidus, a tower of Doris in Caria, on the Triopian promontory. Venus was the chief deity of the place, and had there a famous statue made by Praxiteles. The place is now a mass of ruins. Horat. 1, od. 30. Plin. 36, c. 15.

Cnossus. Vid. Gnossus.

Coccygius, a mountain, or rather hill, of Argolis, on the road from Halice to Hermione, opposite another called Thornax. The more ancient name of this mount was Pron, which was changed to Coccygius from the fabled metamorphosis of Jupiter into the bird called Coccyx by the Greeks. On its summit was a temple sacred to that god, and another of Apollo at the base. That of Juno was situated on the opposite hill. Cram.—Paus. Cor. 36.

Cocintum, I. a promontory of the Brutii, now Capo di Stilo, which according to Polybius, marked the separation of the Ionian from the Sicilian Sea.——II. "A town probably named Cocintum, but which is written Consilinum Castrum, and Consentia, in Pliny and Mela, accords apparently with Stilo, from which the cape now derives its appellation." Cram.

Cocytus, I, a river of Epirus, which blends its waters with the Acheron. It is one of the fabled rivers of hell. The word is derived from κωκυειν, to lament. Vid. Acheron.——II. A river of Campania, flowing into the Lucrine lake.

Codanus sinus, one of the ancient names of the Baltic, which Tacitus calls Mare Suevicum, from the Suevian nations that bordered upon it. He did not know that it was a gulf, but imagined that it environed Scandinavia, which he supposed to be an island or a collection of islands. D'Anville.

Coela Euboeæ, that part of the coast of Eubœa which lay between Aulis and Geræstus. It was dangerous to navigators in stormy weather. Cram.—Strab. 10.—Liv. 31, 47.—Herod. 8. 13.

Coele, a quarter of Athens. Vid. Athenæ.

Coelius mons, one of the hills of Rome. Vid. Roma.

Cohaion mons, a mountain of Dacia, remarkable as having been the residence of a pontiff, in whose person the Getes believed the deity was incarnate. D'Anville.

Colchis, and Colchos, a country of Asia, at the south of Asiatic Sarmatia, east of the Euxine Sea, north of Armenia, and west of Iberia, now called Mingrelia. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, and the birth-place of Medea. It was fruitful in poisonous herbs, and produced excellent flax. The inhabitants were originally Egyptians, who settled there when Sesostris, king of Egypt, extended his conquests in the north. In the time of the Lower Empire Colchis was called Lazica; and the name of Colchi appears to have been replaced by that of Laza, which was formerly only proper to a particular nation, comprised in the limits of what is now named Guria on the southern bank of the Fax. That which is now known under the name of Mingrelia, on the Black Sea, from the mouth of the Phasis ascending towards the north, is only a part of Colchis, as is that more inland towards the frontier of Georgia, and called Imeriti. D'Anville.—Juv. 6, v. 640.—Flacc. 5, v. 418.—Horat. 2, od. 13, v. 8.—Strab. 11.—Ptol. 5, c. 10.—*Ovid. Colias, a promontory about 20 stadia from Phalerum, whither the wrecks of the Persian fleet were said to have been carried after the battle of Salamis. Here was a temple of Venus Colias. This promontory still retains its ancient name, though it is occasionally designated by that of Tyrispyrgoi. Cram.—Herod. 8. 96; 9, 398.

Collatia, a town of Latium, to the north of Gabii, a colony of Alba, celebrated by the sacrifice of Lucretia. The road which led from Rome to this town was called Via Collatina. Cram.—Strab. 5, 229.——II. Another in Apulia, near mount Garganus, now Collatina. Cram.—Plin. 3, 11.

Collina, the name of one of the four regions into which Rome was divided by Servius. Vid. Roma. Cram.—Varro.——Porta, one of the gates of ancient Rome, more anciently called Agonensis, supposed to answer to the present Porta Salara. It was by this gate that the Gauls entered Rome. Cram.—Liv. 5, 41.

Colonæ, a town in the territory of Lampsacus, a colony of Miletus.

Colonia, I. now Colchester, in the county of Essex. This is not allowed by Cambden, who derives the present name from that of the river Colne. In the geography of the Roman empire, no name will be more frequently found than that of Colonia, if we except Augusta and Castra. This name, when applied to a city, indicated that on its reduction the Romans had sent thither a colony from the capital; and that it had been invested with certain privileges, for the most part municipal, though sometimes also political. Such towns were designated generally by a surname, from some circumstance attending their settlement.——II. Equestris, a colony planted by Cæsar on the Lacus Lemanus, at a place called previously Noviodunum. It is now Nyon, near the corner of the lake at which the Rhone resumes its course.——III. Trajana, called also Ulpia, instead of Colonia. It was a town of Belgica, and is now Kellen in Cleves, about a mile from the Rhine.——IV. Agrippina, a town of Belgica in Germania Secunda, of which it was the capital. The daughter of Germanicus was born in this place, and when at her request the emperor Claudius established in it a colony, the name of its patroness was bestowed on the new settlement. It is now Cologne upon the Rhine. Luc.—Suet.——V. Morinorum, a town of Gaul, now Terrouen in Artois.——VI. Norbensis, a town of Spain, now Alcantara.——VII. Valentia, a town of Spain, which now bears the same name.

Colŏnos, an eminence near Athens. Vid. Athenæ.

Colophŏn, a town of Ionia, at a small distance from the sea, first built by Mopsus the son of Manto, and colonized by the sons of Codrus. It was the native country of Mimnermus, Nicander, and Xenophanes, and one of the cities which disputed for the honour of having given birth to Homer. Apollo had a temple there. Strab. 14.—Plin. 14, c. 20.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 54.—Cic. pro Arch. Poet. 8.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 8.

Colossæ, and Colossis, a large town of Phrygia, near Laodicea, between the Lycus and the Meander. The government of this city was democratical, and the first ruler called archon. One of the first Christian churches was established there, and one of St. Paul's epistles was addressed to it. Plin. 21, c. 9.

Columbaria, now Monte Colubre, a small island at the east of Spain, supposed to be the same as Ophiusa. Plin. 3. c. 5.

Columnæ Hercŭlis. Vid. Abila.——Protei, the boundaries of Egypt, or the extent of the kingdom of Proteus. Alexandria was supposed to be built near them, though Homer places them in the island of Pharus. Odys. 4, v. 351.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

Comagena. A small portion of Syria was distinguished by this name, having Cappadocia and Armenia Minor on the north, on the east and south the Euphrates, which separated it from Mesopotamia, and on the west the narrow district of Cilicia. The capital was Samosata, now Semisat, and the whole region is now called Aladuli. After the fall of the Persian empire, a part of the family called Seleucidæ are thought to have established themselves as sovereigns in this country, and to have maintained themselves there till Vespasian reduced it to a province of his mighty empire. It was afterwards incorporated in the Euphratesian province. Strab. 11 and 17.—D'Anville.

Comăna, (æ, and orum,) I. a town of Pontus towards Armenia Minor, near the source of the Iris. It had a famous temple of Bellona, for an account of which see Comana Cappadocia, where the worship of that goddess was the same as at this place. In this city Iphigenia is said to have made the votive offering of her hair. The modern name of this Comana is thought to be Tubachza, in the district called Amasia.—— II. Another in Cappadocia. According to D'Anville its present name is El Bostan, but others call it Arminacha. It was situate at the head of the Sarus, near, or perhaps upon, the hilly country of the Taurus mons and the borders of Syria. Comana was famous for a temple of Bellona, where there were above 6000 ministers of both sexes. The chief priest among them was very powerful, and knew no superior but the king of the country. This high office was generally conferred upon one of the royal family. Hirt. Alex. 66.—Flacc. 7, v. 636.—Strab. 12.

Commagène. Vid. Comagena.

Compsa, now Consa, a town of the Hirpini in Italy. This town revolted to Hannibal after his victory at Cannæ, and was made the depository of his baggage and munitions when on his march towards Campania. It was before this city that Milo, the assassin of Clodius, was killed, according to Vell. Paterc.; but others read Cossa for Compsa. The territory of Lucania was just south of this place; and on the southeast was the nearest frontier of Campania.

Compsatus, a river of Thrace, falling into the lake Bistonis. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Comum, now Como, on the lake called by the ancients Larius, in the Milanese. It was situate at the north of Insubria, at the bottom of the lake and was one of the most flourishing municipia in the time of the younger Pliny, a native of that highland town. It was afterwards called Novum Comum by Cæsar, who established there a colony. Plin. 3, c. 18. —Liv. 33, c 36 and 37.—Suet. in Jul. 28.—Plin. 1, ep. 3.—Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 35.

Concăni, a people of Spain, who lived chiefly on milk mixed with horse's blood. Their chief town, Concana, is now called Santillana. Virg. G. 3, v. 463.—Sil. 3, v. 361.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 34.

Condăte, a name common to many places in Gaul. D'Anville says it denotes a situation in a corner between two rivers. The principal one is the capital of the Rhedones, still a populous city bearing the name of Rennes.

Condivienum, the chief town of the Namnetes, situated on the river Liger near its mouth; its modern name is Nantes.

Condochates, a river of India, falling into the Ganges. The modern name assigned to this stream is Kandak, which flows into the Ganges on the left side.

Condrūsi, a nation of Gallia Belgica, whose name is retained in the modern canton of Condros, situated, according to Lemaire, on either side of the river l'Ourthe, ancient Ultra.

Conimbriga, a town of Lusitania, the modern Coimbra, is celebrated in Portugul for its university. D'Anville.

Consentia, situated near the source of the river Crathis, is designated by Strabo, (6, 256,) as the capital of the Brutii. It was taken by Hannibal after the surrender of Petilia, but again fell into the hands of the Romans towards the close of the war. The modern Cenza answers to the old town. Cram.—Liv. 23, 30.—Plut. 3, 5.—Ptol. p. 67.

Constantinopŏlis. Vid. Byzantium.

Contadesdus, a river of Thrace, rising in mount Hæmus, and discharging itself into the Agrianes some distance above its confluence with the Hebrus.

Contoporia. This name was given to the route from Mycænæ to Corinth, by way of Tenea. Polyb. 16, 16.

Contra-Acinum, a Roman post in Dacia, on the Danube. It received this name from its situation opposite Aquincum, Buda, on the Pannonian side, and is now Pest.

Copæ, a small but ancient town of Bœotia, on the northern bank of the lake to which it gives its name. Near it was the Athamanian plain, which takes its name from Athamas, so famed in ancient traditions, who is supposed to have dwelt there. North of Acræphia "is a triangular island" in the lake, "on which are the walls of the ancient Copæ; and more distant, on another island, the village of Topolias, which gives its present name to the lake. Paus. Bæot. 23.—Gell's Itiner.

Copais palus, now Limne, a lake in Bœotia, towards the northern borders and the Opuntian bay. Its circuit was, according to Strabo, not less than 47 miles, and it received the waters of almost all the principal streams in that section of country. Although the name of Copais, derived from that of Copæ on the northern shore, was generally given to this lake, it was also frequently designated by the name of some important town upon its bank, or on the rivers that emptied themselves into its bosom. Thus, at Haliartus it was called Haliartus Lacus, and Orchomenian at Orchomenus. Homer and Pindar call it Cephisus. From the mouth of this river to the town of Copæ, the water was navigable for ancient vessels in the time of the geographer Pausanias. As no visible channel carried off the waters of this lake, the surrounding country was frequently threatened with inundation; and it was said that, on the draining of the plains in the time of Crates, the ruins of an ancient city were discovered between the sites of Copæ and Orchomenus. The danger, however, was greatly diminished by the number of subterranean passages that communicated with the Opuntius Sinus and the Euripus. Of these there were fifteen known to the surrounding people; and a modern traveller "observed," says Cramer, "four at the foot of mount Ptoon, near Acræphia, which convey the waters of Copais to lake Halica, a distance of two miles. The other Katabathra are on the north-eastern side of the lake." The Copaic eels, of great celebrity among the Grecian epicures, appear to have been, in ancient times as at present, an article of trade to the surrounding countries; and the Bœotian in the Acharnæ of Aristophanes, presents among the greatest luxuries of the market, his Copaic eel:

Ἰκτῖδας ἐνύδρους ἐγχέλεις Κωπαΐδας.

Copres, a river of Asia, which, rising in the Paropamisus mountains and the eastern parts of Aria, after receiving the waters of the Choes at Nysa, discharges itself into the Indus on the borders of Scythia, which it separates from India. Plin.

Copros, the name of the harbour of Torone in Macedonia; so called because it was said the noise of waves was never heard there; whence the proverb Κωφότερος τοῦ Τυρωναίου λιμένος. Strab.—Mela, 2, 3.

Coprates, a river of Asia, falling into the Tigris. Diod. 19.

Coptus, and Coptos, now Kypt, a town of Egypt, about 100 leagues from Alexandria, on a canal which communicates with the Nile. Plin. 5. c. 9, l. 6, c. 23.—Strab. 16.—Juv. 15, v. 28. From this place to Berenice Epidires, on the Arabian gulf, a road was carried across the desert by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus. It was upwards of 250 miles in length, and rendered the communication between the sea-port and the Nile easy and secure. By means of this road the commodities of India and the east were received at Coptus, which thus became the great inland mart for India and the south. The intermediate towns or ports upon this road have long since been buried beneath the sands of the desert. The communication with Arabia was from this city by Myos-Hormus, at the commencement of the Sinus Heropolites. From the name of this town some etymologists derive the name of the whole country on the Nile. Vid. Ægyptus.

Cora, a town of Latium, on the confines of the Volsci, built by a colony of Dardanians before the foundation of Rome. Lucan. 7, v. 392.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.

Corax, that part of the Caucasus which extended to the Palus Mæotis, and covered the narrow strip of land which belonged to Colchis, north of the Euxine Sea.

Corcyra, I. an island in the Ionian Sea, about 12 miles from Buthrotum, on the coast of Epirus; famous for the shipwreck of Ulysses and the gardens of Alcinous. It has been successively called Drepane, Scheria, and Phæacia, and now bears the name of Corfu. "The principal city of the island was situated precisely where the town of Corfu now stands." Cram.—II. Nigra, an island in the Illyrian gulf, near the islands of Salo and Pharus. Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, 10.

Corduba, now Cordova, a famous city of Hispania Bætica. This was the capital city of the Turduli, and, under the ancient inhabitants, of the whole of Bætica. The first colony, which was led there by one of the Marcelli, was called Colonia Patricia, U. C. 621. Corduba is, however, much more famous as the seat of the Moorish empire in Spain during the middle ages, than for its superiority as a colony of Rome; and the names of Avicenna and Averrois cast little less glory upon this celebrated place than the births of Lucan and Seneca. Martial. 1, ep. 62.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Cæs. Bell. Alex. 57.—Plin. 3, c. 1.

Cordyla, a port of Pontus, supposed to give its name to a peculiar sort of fishes caught there (Cordylæ.) Plin. 9, c. 15.—Martial. 13, ep. 1.

Corfinium, was the chief city of the Peligni. It enjoyed for a short time only the honour of being styled the capital of Italy, under the name of Italica, as it appears to have seceded from the confederacy before the conclusion of the war. In later times we find it still regarded as one of the most important cities of this part of Italy, and one which Cæsar was most anxious to secure in his enterprise against the liberties of his country. It surrendered to him after a short defence, when Cn. Domitius, the governor, was allowed to withdraw with his troops to Brundusium. Cram.

Corinthiacus sinus, a bay of the Ionian Sea, between the Peloponnesus and the main land of Greece. On the east it washed the shores of the isthmus of Corinth, which separated its waters from those of the Saronic gulf and the Ægean; upon its northern side were a small portion of Bœotia, and the whole length of Phocis; and on the south it had Achaia from Corinthia to the promontory of Rhium. This point of land jutting out into the bay, and almost meeting the opposite promontory of Antirrhium on the side of Phocis, terminated the gulf on the west, and left it but a narrow passage for its waters through the Sinus Patræ to the Ionian Sea. It is now the gulf of Lepanto.

Corinthus. "Placed on an isthmus where it commanded the Ionian and Ægean seas, and holding as it were, the keys of Peloponnesus, Corinth, from the pre-eminent advantages of its situation, was already the seat of opulence and the arts, while the rest of Greece was sunk in comparative obscurity and barbarism. Its origin is, of course, lost in the obscurity of time; but we are assured that it already existed, under the name of Ephyre, long before the siege of Troy, when Sisyphus, Bellerophon, and other heroes of Grecian mythology, were its sovereigns." The name of Corinth was assumed by this city before the expiration of the mythological era of Grecian history; and Corinthus, the son of Jove, was, according to the Corinthians, the author of their name. During all these ages the family of Sisyphus continued in possession of the sovereignty, which was only transferred from them when the return of the Heraclidæ established a new population and new masters in the Peloponnesus. After five generations the Bacchiadæ obtained the supreme power, which they kept until the abolition of royalty in the Corinthian state. "The Corinthian district was bounded on the north by the Geranean chain, which separated it from Megaris; on the west it was divided from Sicyonia by the little river Nemea; on the east it bordered on Argolis, the common limit of the two republics, being the chain of mount Arachmeus." A description of Corinth naturally divides itself into that of the city and that of the territory. The isthmus, the harbours on the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, and the Acrocorinthus, are principal objects to be described under the second head. The width of the isthmus in the narrowest part is, perhaps six miles; and at this point was the portage for the transportation of vessels from one sea to the other. Many efforts were made by the Greeks, and afterwards by the Romans, to effect a communication between the waters of the Ægean and the Adriatic, by cutting across the isthmus; and traces still remain of these attempts, and of others to fortify this narrow gate of the Peninsula. The celebration of the Isthmian games, which were founded in honour of Neptune, and continued after all the other gymnastic contests of Greece had fallen into disuse, imparted a sacredness as well as an interest to this peculiar spot; and here, during a celebration of these festivals, the independence of Greece was proclaimed by order of the senate and people of Rome. On this little spot stood also the theatre, the marble stadium, and the temple of Neptune. The ruins of these and other buildings are thus described by Dr. Clarke: "We rode directly towards the port and the mountain, and crossing an artificial causeway over a foss, we arrived in the midst of the ruins. It was evident we had discovered the real site of the Isthmian town, with the ruins of the temple of Neptune, the stadium, and the theatre. These, together with walls and other indications of a town, surround the port, and are, for the most part, situated upon its sides, sloping towards the sea. Pine trees are still growing in a line near the temple as mentioned by Pausanias." On the Corinthian gulf the port of Corinth was Lechæum, from which the trade of the Corinthians was carried on with western Greece; it stood about a mile and a half from the city, and, at a distance of about nine miles, on the Saronic gulf, they had the port of Cenchreæ, from which they communicated with Asia and the east. "The Acrocorinthus," says Strabo, as translated by Cramer, "is a lofty mountain, the perpendicular height of which is three stadia and a half; but by the regular road the ascent is not less than thirty stadia. The side facing the north, in which direction stood the city, is the steepest. It is situated in the plain below, in the form of a trapezus, and was surrounded with walls wherever it was not defended by the mountain. Its circuit was estimated at forty stadia. Walls had been constructed up the ascent as far as it was practicable; and as we advanced, we could easily perceive traces of this species of buildings; so that the whole circuit was more than eighty-five stadia. From the summit are seen to the north the lofty peaks of Helicon and Parnassus covered with snow; below, towards the west, extends the gulf of Crissa; beyond, are the Oneian mountains, stretching from the Scyronian rocks to Cithæron and Bœotia." The whole slope of this ascent was diversified with temples erected in honour of different deities; but the Acrocorinthus was particularly dedicated to the worship of Venus. Accordingly her shrine appeared above those of all the other gods; and 1000 beautiful females, as courtesans, officiated before the altar of the goddess of Love. From these rites, which they freely celebrated for hire in honour of this goddess, a copious revenue was secured to the city; but as foreigners were principally those who furnished it, there arose the proverb οὐ παντὸς ἀνδρὸς εἰς Κόρινθον ἐστὶν ὁ πλοῦς, alluding to the tax there levied on their superstition, their passions, or their vanity. When the sovereign power was wrested from the hands of the Corinthian princes, it was transferred to annual magistrates, called Prytanes, who were still chosen from the family of the Bacchiadæ. The oligarchy thus established by this family was not overthrown till the year B. C. 629, when the supreme authority was usurped by Cypselus, the son of Eetion. Cypselus was succeeded by his son Periander, celebrated for his cruelties and for his patronage of science and literature; the tyrant of Corinth, and one of the seven whom their contemporaries and posterity have rendered illustrious as the sages of Greece. On the death of Periander Corinth submitted to a moderate aristocracy, and living contentedly under a well-regulated government, enjoyed a repose unknown to the other states of Greece. It had, however, the misfortune to engage in a dispute with Corcyra, its principal colony, and must therefore be looked upon as a principal cause of the Peloponnesian war, if, indeed any other cause be sought for than the mutual jealousy of Sparta and Athens. From this time forth Corinth shared all the misfortunes that dissention and faction had entailed upon Athens, Thebes, Argos, &c.; and the Corinthians, from this moment, appear in all the contests between Athens and Sparta, now on one side and now on the other; in separate wars with the Lacedæmonians, and leagued with this same people afterwards against Epaminondas and the Bœotians. At Corinth Philip was declared commander in chief of the forces destined to act against the Persian king; and in that city also his son was elected to fill this office, no less fatal to Grecian liberty than to its Persian foes. On the death of Alexander, when his generals distributed among themselves his uselessly acquired possessions, Corinth came into the power of the Macedonian kings, till we find it united by Aratus to the Achæan league. On the final dispersion of that famous confederacy, the last hope of the Greeks had been placed on the strength of this place; but it was not proof against Roman perseverance, or, perhaps we should say Roman destiny, and was taken by the consul L. Mummius, and given up to the avarice or rage of the Roman soldiery, the privileged marauders of the earth. The riches which the Romans found there were immense. During the conflagration, all the metals which were in the city melted and mixed together, and formed that valuable composition of metals which has since been known by the name of Corinthium Æs. This, however, appears improbable, especially when it is remembered that the artists of Corinth made a mixture of copper with small quantities of gold and silver, and so brillant was the composition, that the appellation of Corinthian brass afterwards stamped an extraordinary value on pieces of inferior worth. For many years Corinth remained as the desolation and fury of war had reduced it; but in the time of Cæsar it was colonized by his order, and soon began to present something of its former magnificence. It was the capital of Achaia when St. Paul introduced there the new religion of which he was so zealous a disciple. On the division of the empire Corinth fell, of course, to the share of the eastern emperors; and on their overthrow by the Turks, this famous city was transferred, after a siege not surpassed by any that it underwent in ancient times, into the hands of those rude conquerors. It still retains its ancient name, but with scarcely the ruins of its ancient splendour. A single temple, itself dismantled, remains to mark the site of one of the most luxurious cities of antiquity, and distinguish it from any modern village of the Turkish empire. *Strab.—Paus. Corone, a city of Messenia, upon or near the site of the present town of Coron. This town, which was first called Epea, was situate upon the Sinus Messeniacus, sometimes called from it Coroneus. When the Messenians were, for a time, restored to their country on the decline of the Spartan authority, the name of Corone was bestowed upon this place.

Coronēa, I. a town of Bœotia, between the Libethrius mons and the Copaic lake. This place boasted an antiquity that mounted to the fabulous era of the first kings of Thebes. It was often the scene of important battles that more than once decided, for a time, the fate of Bœotia. Here, in the first year of the Corinthian war, Agesilaus defeated the allied forces of Athens, Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, B. C. 394. In its vicinity was the temple of Minerva Itonis, the edifice in which "the general council of the Bœotian states assembled till dissolved by the Romans." There are still to be seen the ruins of this ancient town near the village of Korunies. Paus. Bœot. 34.—Thuc. 1, 113.—Xen. Hell. 4, 3, 8.——II. Corsi, a people of Sardinia.

Corsica, an island of the Mare Inferum, on the Ligurian coast, about sixty miles from the harbour of Genoa and seven to the north of the island of Sardinia, in size and note the third of the Italian seas. The children of Thespius are considered by the mythologists to have first peopled this island; and Eustathius refers its discovery to the accident of a woman, named Corsa or Corsica, being led thither in pursuit of a bull that had strayed from her herds. In this obscurity the antiquary Heylyn proposes to refer the origin of the name to the Corsi, who, crossing over from Sardinia at an early period, established themselves in this smaller and less inviting territory. By the Greeks Corsica was called Cyrnos; and the Grecian settlement was effected by the Phoceans, who, about the year 539 B. C. abandoned their homes to avoid the Persian yoke, and to establish themselves and their liberty in this distant spot. The next possessors of the island were the Carthaginians; and from their occupation the inhabitants were sometimes denominated Phœnician Cyrnus. When subdued by the Romans, it formed at first, in connexion with Sardinia, the government of a prætor; but was afterwards joined to the Roman patriarchate, and governed by the prefect of the city. The fall of the Roman empire, which witnessed the settlement of the northern barbarians in all its provinces, left Corsica open to their depredations; and the Vandals of Africa took possession of the island, now a second time subject to its sway. To the Vandal rule succeeded that of the Saracens; and the middle ages are full of the wars which, from this and the neighbouring islands, they carried on against the princes of christendom. The principal Roman colonies established here were those of Mariana and Aleria, the first by Marius and the second by Sylla; but though in these places the Roman population may have preponderated, and though the Asiatic Greeks and the Tyrians of Africa were, no doubt, in the temporary possession of its coasts, "the insular people," says D'Anville, "were Ligurian;" and Heylyn remarks that they "were stubborn, poor, unlearned, and supposed to be more cruel than other nations." Cæs.—Strab.—Diod. Sic.

Corsūra, an island in the bay of Carthage.

Cortōna. "About fourteen miles south of Arretium we find Cortona, a city whose claims to antiquity appear to be equalled by few other towns in Italy, and which to this day retains its name unchanged. Concerning its origin, we learn from Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who quotes from Hellanicus of Lesbos, an author somewhat anterior to Herodotus, that the Pelasgi, who had landed at Spina on the Po, subsequently advanced into the interior of Italy, and occupied Cortona, which they fortified; and from thence formed other settlements in Tyrrhenia. On this account it is that we find Cortona styled the metropolis of that province. Silius Italicus calls it the city of Corithus, in conformity with Virgil, who frequently alludes to the land of Corithus as the country of Dardanus, the founder of Troy.

Corus, a river of Arabia, falling into the Red Sea. Herodot. 3, c. 9.

Corybassa, a city of Mysia.

Corycium Antrum. "About two hours' journey from Delphi is the celebrated Corycian cave, surpassing in extent every other known cavern, and of which it is not possible to advance into the interior without a torch. The roof, from which an abundance of water trickles, is elevated far above the floor; and vestiges of the dripping moisture (i. e. stalactites) are to be seen attached to it along the whole length of the cave. The inhabitants of Parnassus consider it sacred to the Corycian nymphs and the god Pan." Immediately after the entrance, the cave expands into a chamber of about 300 feet long by perhaps 200 wide. In this sacred recess, on the approach of the Persians, the people of Delphi concealed themselves. Cram.—Her. 8, 36.

Corycus, I, now Curco, a place in Cilicia, with a cave, and a grove which produced excellent saffron. Horat. 2, Sat. 4, v. 68.—Lucan. 9, v. 809.—Plin. 5, c. 27.—Cic. ad Fam. 12, ep. 13. —Strab. 14.——II. A spot called by Strabo Cimarus, now cape Carabusa, a point of land in the island of Crete, from which it was usual to compute the distances to the several ports of Peloponnesus. Plin. 4, 12.—Strab. 17.

Corythasium, a promontory of Messenia, on which the Athenians under Demosthenes erected the fortress that, after the destruction of the ancient city of Pylus, assumed that name. Paus. 4, c. 36.

Cos, now Stanco, and by corruption Lanjo, an island of Asia Minor, in the entrance of the Ceramic gulf. It was one of the cluster called Sporades. Before the name of Cos was assigned to this island it had been called Merope, Caria, and Nymphea. The silks that were manufactured there became a great article of luxury at Rome, and the wine of Cos was a favourite beverage with the richer citizens. Hippocrates, the father of medicine, and Apelles, the matchless master of his art, were natives of Cos.

Cosa, and Cossa, or Cōsæ, a maritime town of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 168.—Liv. 22, c. 11.—Cic. 9, Att. 6.—Cæs. B. C. 1, c. 34.

Cossæi, a people of Asia, inhabiting the northern parts of the mountains which limit Susiana towards the west, and on the southern boundary of Media. The conquest of this people by Alexander was the work of 40 days.

Cossæa, a part of Persia. Diod. 17.

Cosȳra, a barren island in the African sea, near Melita. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 567.

Cotes, and Cottes, a promontory of Mauritania.

Cothon, a small island, near the citadel of Carthage, with a convenient bay, which served for a dock-yard. Servius in Virg. Æn. 1, v. 431.—Diod. 3.

Cottiæ Alpes. Vid. Alpes.

Cragus, a woody mountain of Cilicia, part of mount Taurus, sacred to Apollo. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 645.—Horat. 1, od. 21.

Crambūsa, a town of Lycia.

Cranæ, a small island in the Sinus Laconicus. In this spot the Trojan Paris first stopped with Helen to enjoy the fruits of his violated faith. It is now called Marathonisi, and is situate but about 100 yards from the shore. Hom. Il. 3, 442.

Cranii, one of the four principal towns of the island of Cephallenia. Its ruins manifest its great antiquity, as they are all of that kind called Cyclopian. When the Messenians were expelled from their country in the Peloponnesus on the restoration of Pylos to their Spartan oppressors, the city of Cranii was chosen by the Athenians as a proper place for the establishment of those unfortunate exiles.

Cranon, and Crānnon, a town of Thessaly, on the borders of Macedonia, where Antipater and Craterus defeated the Athenians after Alexander's death. Liv. 26, c. 10, l. 42, c. 64.

Crater. The bay between the Misenum and Surentum promontories, on the coast of Campania, now the Gulf of Naples, was called, in antiquity, Crater, Campanus, and Puteolanus Sinus. In the time of the geographer Strabo, the coast was so thickly lined between the promontories, with cities, villas, and villages, as to present the appearance of an uninterrupted settlement, or rather of a continued city.

Crathis, I. a river which, rising in Arcadia, ran across the whole width of Achaia, and emptied into the Corinthia Sinus, at the town of Ægæ, nearly opposite the Crisssean bay.—— II. Another, now Crati, in Lucania and the country of the Brutii. The town of Thurii stood upon its banks; and according to Swineburne, it now empties into the Sybaris, though supposed to have discharged itself formerly south of that river into the Tarentine gulf. Its waters were believed to whiten the hair of those who bathed in them. This river derived its name from the Crathis in Greece. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 315.—Paus. 7, c. 25.—Plin. 31, c. 2.

Crĕmĕra, now the Valca, a small river of Tuscany, falling into the Tiber, famous for the death of the 300 Fabii, who were killed there in a battle against the Veientes, A. U. C. 277. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 205.—Juv. 2, v. 155.

Cremmyon, and Crommyōn, a town near Cornth, where Theseus killed a sow of uncommon bigness. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 435.

Cremni, and Cremna, I. a place at which the Romans established a colony in Pisidia.—The fortifications in part remain, upon an elevated point, now Kebrinaz.——II. A commercial place on the Palus Mæotis. Herodot. 4, c. 2.

Cremona, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, below the mouth of the Addua upon the Po. In this place, and at Placentia, the Romans first established themselves beyond the limits of what was then called Italy proper, on the north; and from these cities they expected to hold in check the unmanageable inhabitants of these northern regions. The native Gauls were only succeeded in this important post by the Romans one year before the descent of Hannibal upon Italy. In the civil wars Cremona espoused the cause of the republicans; and the rapacity of the soldiers of Cæsar Augustus was satisfied out of the spoils of the city. After a period, the advantages of its situation restored to Cremona its importance and opulence; but the wars of Vitellius and Vespasian again reduced it, and, as Tacitus observes, "destroyed a colony, which, for 200 years, had flourished and prospered.—Unimjured by foreign attacks, it fell a victim to domestic war." In the middle ages Cremona shared the fortunes of the republics that first asserted their liberty against the pretensions of the German emperors. Liv. 21, c. 56.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 4 and 19.

Crestonia, a district of Mygdonia in Thrace, in which the Pelasgi are said to have remained after their gradual disappearance from Greece and the bordering countries. This region alone was reported to produce lions in Europe; and here the camels of Xerxes are said to have been attacked by those animals. The name of the principal city was Creston or Crestone. Some authors write for Crestonia, Græstonia. It is now Caradach. Herodot. 5, c. 5.

Creta, an island of the Mediterranean Sea south of the Ægean. It "forms an irregular parallelogram, of which the western side faces Sicily, while the eastern faces towards Egypt; on the north it is washed by the Mare Creticum; and on the south by the Libyan Sea, which intervenes between the island and the opposite coast of Cyrene." Various estimates have been made of the circumference of this celebrated island; Pliny reports it at 270 miles in length from east to west; while in breadth it nowhere exceeds 50. He gives a circumference of about 539 miles. It is impossible to fix the etymology of its name, but most authors concur in assigning it to Cres, the son of Jupiter, in the accounts of mythology. Many, however, derive it "by a syncope or abbreviation from the Curetes, the first inhabitants thereof, who, together with the Telchines, were priests of Cybele, the principal goddess of this land." Till the era of Minos, Crete was supposed by the Greeks to have been occupied by a barbarous race, called by Homer, Eteocretes; confounded by many theorists with the Curetes, the Dactyli, and Telchines, concering whose origin and character even poetry and mythology have not invented a continuous account. The age of Minos, or rather, perhaps, the ages of the two monarchs who ruled in Crete under that name, is most probably to be considered as the epoch of the first dawn of civilization in the island, where it seems to have anticipated the improvement of Greece in all the arts of life and government. The Dorians early established themselves in Crete; and it is quite possible, that when Lycurgus is said to have introduced the laws of Minos into Laconia, it was only meant at first that he introduced from Crete, and from other settlements, the institutions of the Dorians. After the Trojan war, the principal cities of Crete constituted themselves republics, and were generally governed according to the principles which they had proved under the more ancient state of things. "The chief magistrates, called Cosmi, were ten in number, and elected annually. The Gerontes constituted the council of the nation, and were selected from those who were thought worthy of holding the office of Cosmus." But though the Cretan are supposed to have answered as a model for the Spartan laws, there was this material difference in their constitution, that while every regulation of the Lacedæmonian lawgiver had in view the preservation and dignity of an aristocracy, the character of the institutions, called those of Minos, was essentially democratic. The island of Crete underwent fewer political vicissitudes than the other states of Greece. It did not, indeed, fall under the Roman dominion till after the Mithridatic war, and formed, when conquered, a part of the government of the proconsul of Cyrenaica. The name of Hecatompolis, which Homer bestows on it, was derived, as the word imports, from a hundred cities contained in it, of which forty were still remaining in the time of Ptolemy. Gnossus was the capital, and the early court of the kings. Scarcely any part of Greece was more the subject of poetry than this island, "the mistress of the sea;" and the name of mount Ida, which rose to a great elevation in the centre of the island, recalls the whole history of the genealogy of the gods. The natives of Crete, however, enjoyed but a bad reputation with the other Greeks; and the Κρητα κρητίσει was made as often to include with the Cilicians and Cappadocians, the people of Crete as the citizens of the voluptuous Corinth. Candia is now the name of this island. Horat. 1, od. 36, v. 10, epod. 9.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 444. Epist. 10, v. 106.—Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Strab. 10.—Lucan. 3, v. 184.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 104.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Cram.

Creticum mare, that part of the Mediterranean which intervened between the island of Crete and the south-eastern part of the Peloponnesus. Cram.

Creusa, or Creusis, a port of Bœotia, the harbour of Thespiæ, on the confines of the Megarean territory. Its position seems to correspond with that of Livadostro. Cram.

Crimisa, a promontory, river, and town, on the eastern coast of the Brutian territory, now called respectively Capo dell' Alice, Fiumenica, now Cirò. The city of Crimisa was said to have been founded by Philoctetes, after the siege of Troy. At a much later period Crimisa is supposed to have changed its name to Paternum. Cram.—Strab. 6, 254.

Crissa, a town of Phocis, near Parnassus, above Cirrha. It was especially famous for the celebration of the Pythian games in its plain. The malpractices of the Crissæans induced the Amphictyons to destroy their town in the Crissæan or Sacred war. Sir W. Gell points out the ruins of Crissa near an old church, situated on the spot still called Crisso. Cram.—Strab. 9, 418.—Paus.—Phoc. 37.

Crisæus sinus, a part of the Corinthiacus Sinus, which took its name from the town of Crissa. The western shore of this bay belonged to the Locrians, the eastern to the Phocians. Strabo sometimes appears to have applied the name of this particular bay to the whole Corinthiacus Sinus. It is now the Gulf of Salona. Cram.—Strab. 8.—Thuc. 1, 107.

Criu-Metŏpon promontorium, now Cape Crio, the south-western extremity of Crete, 125 miles distant from Phycus, a promontory of Cyrenaica. Cram.——Or the Ram's Forehead, a promontory running far into the Euxine, which terminates the Tauric Chersonese. It is now called by the Turks Karadjé-bourun, or the Black Nose. D'Anville.

Crocius Campus, an extensive plain in Thessaly, watered by the Amphrysus; doubtless the tract to which Apollonius gives the appellation of Athamantius. Cram.—Argon. 2, 513.

Crocodilopŏlis, a name of Arsinoe, near lake Mœris. Vid. Arsinoe.

Crommyon, a place in the Saronic gulf in Corinthia, from whose capital it was 120 stadia distant. It was near the Megarean frontier, and was celebrated as the haunt of a wild boar destroyed by Theseus. Cram.—Plut.

Cromni, and Cromi, a town of Arcadia, which gave name to the district Cromites. A place of strength, according to Xenophon. Now probably Crano. Cram.—Hell. 7, 4, 21.

Cronius mons, or the hill of Saturn, a mount of Elis, on the summit of which, priests, called Basilæ, offered sacrifices to the god every year at the vernal equinox. Cram.

Croto, "now Crotone, on the little river Æsarus, was one of the most celebrated and powerful states of Magna Græcia. Its foundation is ascribed to Myscellus, an Achæan leader soon after Sybaris had been colonized by a party of the same nation, which was about 715 A. C. According to some traditions, however, the origin of Croto was much more ancient, and it was said to derive its name from the hero Croton. The residence of Pythagoras and his most distinguished followers in this city together with the overthrow of Sybaris which it accomplished, the exploits of Milo and several other Crotoniat victors in the Olympic games, contributed in a high degree to raise its fame. Its climate also was proverbially excellent. This town was also celebrated for its school of medicine, and was the birth-place of Democedes, who long enjoyed the reputation of being the first physician in Greece." From the time of the triumph over Sybaris, Croto began to languish, in consequence of the increased love of luxury exhibited by its inhabitants. "As a proof of the remarkable change which took place in the warlike spirit of this people, it is said that, on their being subsequently engaged in hostilities with the Locrians, an army of 130,000 Crotoniatæwere routed by 10,000 of the enemy on the banks of the Sagras. Dionysius the Elder gained possession of the town, which he did not long retain. When Pyrrhus invaded Italy, Croto was still a considerable city, extending on both sides of the river, and its walls embracing a circumference of 12 miles. But the consequences of its war with that king proved so ruinous to its prosperity, that above one half its extent became deserted." After the battle of Cannæ it surrendered to the Carthaginians, and its inhabitants were allowed to withdraw to Locri. Cramer.—Strab. 6.—Diod. Sic. 4, 24.

Crustumerium, or Crustumium, a colony of Alba, situated near the Tiber above Fidenæ. Its antiquity is attested by Virgil and Silius Italicus. From this city, the ridge of which mons Sacer formed a part, appears to have been called Crustumini Colles; since Varro, speaking of the secession of the Roman people to that hill, terms it Secessio Crustumina. The tribe called Crustumina evidently owed its name to this city. Its site is now probably occupied by Marcigliano Vecchio. Cram.—Dion. Hal. 2, 53.—Liv. 1, 38; 42, 34.

Crustumius, a river of Umbria, flowing from the Appenines into the Adriatic, between Ariminium and Pisaurum. It is now Conca.

Crypta, a passage through mount Pansilypus. Vid. Pansilypus.

Ctemene, or Ctimene, a town of Thessaly belonging to the ancient Dolopians. It is said to have been ceded by Peleus, the father of Achilles, to Phœnix, probably the Cymine of Livy. The name of Ctemene is still attached to the site. Cram.—Apoll. Argon. 1, 67.

Ctenos, a port on the south side of the Chersonesus Taurica.

Ctesiphon, a city on the Tigris, not far from Seleucis, built by the Parthian monarchs with the view of depopulating Babylon. It was nearly opposite the ancient site of Coche. It was first built by Vardanes, and afterwards beautified and walled by Pacorus, who made it a royal residence. It was several times assaulted by the Roman emperors, generally without success; and, amongst others, by Julian the apostate, who perished there. There is no doubt that Ctesiphon was erected upon the ruins of a still more ancient city, Calneh, in the land of Shinar, (Gen. 10, 10.) The sites of Coche and Ctesiphon are now called al-Modain, or the Two Cities; and in this last the ruins of an ancient edifice are called Takt-Kesra, or the throne of Khosroës. D'Anville.—Heyl. Cosm.—Rosenmüller.

Cucusus, a town of Cappadocia, in the south-eastern part of the province, now Cocson. It was situated in one of the gorges of mount Taurus, and is celebrated as the gloomy place of exile of St. John Chrysostom. D'Anville.

Cularo, a town of the Allobroges in Gaul, called afterwards Gratianopolis, and now Grenoble. Cic. ep.

Cuma, Cumæ, and Cyme, I. the most powerful of the Æolic colonies in Asia Minor. It was situated on a bay called Cumæus Sinus, and is now Nemourt. This city was the birth-place of Ephorus, and the residence of the Sibylla Cumana, to be distinguished from the Sibylla Cumæa of Cumæ in Italy. D'Anville.—Heyl. Cosm.——II. Another city of the same name, in Campania, situated on a rocky hill washed by the sea, near the peninsula which terminates in the Misenum Promontorium, and not far from the Avernian and Lucrine lakes. "It is generally agreed that Cumæ was founded at a very early period by some Greeks of Eubœa, under the conduct of Hippocles of Cumæ and Megasthenes of Chalcis. The Latin poets, with Virgil at their head, all distinguish Cumæ by the title of the Euboic city. The period at which Cumæ was founded is stated in the Chronology of Eusebius to have been about 1050 A. C. that is, a few years before the great migration of the Ionians into Asia Minor." In the 228th year of Rome the Cumæans compelled the Etruscans, who sought to establish themselves in the south, to abandon the siege of their city; and twenty years later, Aristodemus, the Cumæan leader, defeated and slew Aruns, the son of the Etruscan Porcenna. Shortly after, Aristodemus usurped the chief command in his native city, and held it 15 years, till deposed and slain. Tarquinius Superbus died at Cumæ A. U. C. 259. "Here was the cavern of the Sibyl, or the temple of Apollo: it consisted of one vast chamber, hewn out of the solid rock; but was almost entirely destroyed in a siege which the fortress of Cumæ, then in the possession of the Goths, maintained against Narses; that general, by undermining the cavern, caused the citadel to sink into the hollow, and thus involved the whole in one common ruin. The ruins of Cumæ still bear the ancient name, and are at the foot of the hill on which the city was built." Cram.—Strab. 5, 243.—Virg. Æn. 6, 2, 42.—Liv. 2, 21, 34; 4, 44; 8, 14; 23, 31, 37.

Cumānus sinus, a name of the Bay of Naples, otherwise called Crater and Puteolanus Sinus.

Cunaxa, a place of Assyria, 500 stadia from Babylon, famous for a battle fought there between Artaxerxes and his brother Cyrus the younger, B. C. 401. Mnemon probably occupies the site of the ancient place, "immediately preceding a canal of communication between the Euphrates and Tigris. This canal is what, in the march of Julian, is called Macepracta, after the Syriac Maïfarckin, denoting a derivation by the means of a canal." D'Anville.—Plut. in Artax.—Ctesias.

Cuneus, "the wedge," a name given to the south-western extremity of Lusitania. It is now Algarve, from Garb, the Arabic for "west." D'Anville.

Cupra Maritima, I. a town of Picenum on the coast; according to Strabo, an establishment of the Etruscans, who worshipped Juno under the name of Cupra.——II. Montana, another town of Picenum, on the left bank of the Æsis, called Montana from its situation on the mountains. Cram.

Cures, a city of the Sabines, on the Via Salaria, "celebrated as having communicated the name of Quirites to the Romans, and distinguished also as having given birth to Numa Pompilius. Antiquaries are divided as to the site occupied by the ancient Cures.—Cluverius places it at Vescovio di Sabina, about 25 miles from Rome. The opinion of Holstenius ought, however, to be preferred; he fixes it at Correse, a little town with a river of the same name." Cram.—Strab. 5, 228.—Varr.—Æn. 6, 811; 8, 637.

Curētes. Vid. Ætolia, and Part III.

Curētis, a name given to Crete, as being the residence of the Curetes. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 136.

Curia. Vid. Part II.

Curias, a promontory which divides the southern shore of Cyprus into two parts. It is now called Gavata, or della Gatte. D'Anville.

Curiosolitæ, a people of Armorica, bounded on the east by the territory of the Ambibari and Rhedones; on the south by that of the Veneti; on the west by that of the Osismii and Lemovices; on the north by the ocean. Their district is now the Département-des-Cotes-du-Nord. Lem.—Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 34, l. 3, c. 11.

Curium, a town of Cyprus, probably now Piscopia. D'Anville.

Cutiliæ, an aboriginal town in the Sabine territory, to the east of Reate, on the right bank of the Velinus. "It was celebrated for its lake, now Pozzo Ralignano, and the floating island on its surface. This lake was farther distinguished by the appellation of Umbilicus, or centre of Italy. Cutiliæ is noticed by Strabo for its mineral waters, which were accounted salutary for many disorders: they failed, however, in their effect upon Vespasian, who died here." Cram.—Dion. Hal. 1, 14; 2, 49.—Plin. 2, 95. —Varr. ap Plin. 3, 12.

Cyaneæ, now the Pavonare, two rugged islands at the entrance of the Euxine Sea, about 20 stadia from the mouth of the Thracian Bosphorus. One of them is on the side of Asia, and the other on the European coast; and, according to Strabo, there is only a space of 20 furlongs between them. The waves of the sea, which continually break against them with a violent noise, fill the air with a darkening foam, and render the passage extremely dangerous. The ancients supposed that the these islands floated, and even sometimes united to crush vessels into pieces when they passed through the straits. This tradition arose from their appearing, like all other objects, to draw nearer when navigators approached them. They were sometimes called Symplegades and Planetæ. Their true situation and form was first explored and ascertained by the Argonauts. Plin. 6, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.—Apollon. 2, v. 317 and 600.—Lycoph. 1285.—Strab. 1 and 3.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 34.

Cyclădes, a name given to certain islands of the Ægean Sea that surrounded Delos as with a circle; whence the name (κυκλος, circulus.) "Strabo writes that the Cyclades were at first only twelve in number, but were afterwards increased to fifteen. These, as we learn from Artemidorus, where Ceos, Cythnos, Seriphos, Melos, Siphnos, Cimolos, Prepesinthos Olearos, Paros, Naxos, Syros, Myconos, Tenos, Andros, and Gyaros; which last, however, Strabo himself was desirous of excluding, from its being a mere rock, as also Prepesinthos and Olearos." Thera, Anaphe, and Astypalæa are by some assigned to the Cyclades, by others to the Sporades. "It appears from the Greek historians, that the Cyclades were first inhabited by the Phœnicians, Carians, and Leleges, whose piratical habits rendered them formidable to the cities on the continent, till they were conquered and finally extirpated by Minos. These islands were subsequently occupied for a short time by Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, and the Persians; but after the battle of Mycale they became dependent on Athens." Cram.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 4, 12.—Thucyd. 1, 4, and 94.—Herodot. 1, 171; 5, 28.

Cydnus, a river of Cilicia near Tarsus, where

Alexander bathed when covered with sweat. The consequences proved almost fatal to the monarch. The Cydnus rose in mount Taurus, and emptied itself into the sea below Tarsus, forming by its expansion the port of that city. According to Paul Lucas, the Cydnus is now called Meribafa or Sinduos; at least he thus styles the river on the banks of which he fixes the ruins of Tarsus. Facciolati gives the modern name as Carasu. D'Anville.—Chaussard.—Curt. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 11, c. 8.

Cydonia, "one of the most ancient and important cities of Crete, probably founded by the Cydones of Homer, whom Strabo considered as indigenous. But Herodotus ascribes its origin to a party of Samians, who, having been exiled by Polycrates, settled in Crete when they had expelled the Zacynthians. Six years afterwards, the Samians were conquered in a naval engagement by the Æginetæ and Cretans, and reduced to captivity; the town then probably reverted to its ancient possessors, the Cydonians. In the Peloponnesian war we find it engaged in hostilities with the Gortynians, who were assisted by an Athenian squadron. At a later period it formed an alliance with the Gnossians. Diodorus reports that Phalæcus, the Phocian general, after the termination of the Sacred War, attacked Cydonia, and was killed, with most of his troops, during the siege. The ruins of this ancient city are to be seen on the site of Jerami." Cram.—Herodot. 3, 59.—Thucyd. 2, 85.—Liv. 37, 60.

Cyllene, I. "the loftiest and most celebrated mountain of Arcadia, which rises between Stymphalus and Pheneus, on the borders of Achaia. It was said to take its name from Cyllen, the son of Elatus, and was, according to the poets, the birth-place of Mercury, to whom a temple was dedicated on the summit. The perpendicular height of this mountain was estimated by some ancient geographers at 20 stadia, by others at 15. The modern name is Zyria. A neighbouring mountain was called Chelydonea, from the circumstance of Mercury having found there the tortoise shell from which he constructed the lyre." Cram.—Paus.—Strab. 8.——II. The haven of Elis, was situated 120 stadia from that town, and to the west of Cape Araxus. Pausanias, who agrees with Strabo in regard to the above distance, is not, however, correct in affirming that Cyllene looked towards Sicily; for in that case it must have stood on the western, instead of the northern, coast of Elis: whereas all accounts concur in fixing its site between the two promontories of Aruxas and Chelonatas, on the shore facing the north. Pausanias, perhaps, only meant that this was the usual place of embarkation for those who sailed from Peloponnesus to Sicily and Italy. He also informs us, that at an early period Cyllene was the emporium to which the Arcadians conveyed the goods which they disposed of to the merchants of Ægina; and elsewhere states that its name was derived from an Arcadian chief. Dionysius Perigetes indeed affirms that it was the port from which the Pelasgi sailed on their expeditions into Italy. The ruins of Cyllene have generally been looked upon as corresponding with some slight remains of antiquity visible at Chiarenza, once a flourishing town under the domination of the Venetians, to the south-east of cape Tornese. But the distance between this place and Palaiopoli or Elis, does not agree with that assigned by Strabo and Pausanias, being considerably more than 120 stadia according to the best modern maps. Cram.—Strab. 8.—Paus. El. 2, 26. Arc. 5.—Dion. Per. 347.

Cyma, or Cyme. Vid Cumæ.

Cynætha, a town of Arcadia, situated among the mountains. It had been united to the Achæan league, but was betrayed to the Ætolians in the Social War, and the inhabitants massacred without distinction. "Polybius observes that the calamity which thus overwhelmed the Cynæthians, was considered as a just punishment for their depraved and immoral conduct, their city forming a striking exception to the estimable character of the Arcadians in general, who were esteemed a pious, humane, and sociable people. Polybius accounts for this moral phenomenon from the neglect into which music had fallen among the Cynæthians. The historian adds, that such was the abhorrence produced in Arcadia by the conduct of the Cynæthians, that, after a great massacre which took place among them, many of the towns refused to admit their deputies, and the Mantineans, who allowed them a passage through their city, thought it necessary to perform lustral rites and expiatory sacrifices in every part of their territory. Near the town was a fountain named Alyssus, from the nature of its waters, which were said to cure hydrophobia. Cynætha is supposed to have stood near the modern town of Calabryta."

Cynesii, and Cynetæ, a nation of the remotest shores of Europe, towards the ocean. Herodot. 2, c. 33.

Cynosarges, a place in the suburbs of Athens. Vid. Athenæ.

Cynoscephalæ, I. hills of Thessaly, forming part of the range that separated the plains of Pharsalia from that of Larissa. These hills were the memorable scene of two celebrated conflicts. Alexander, the tyrant of Pheræ, was defeated here by Pelopidas, the Theban general, who lost his life in the engagement. And here Philip of Macedon was defeated by T. Quinctius Flaminius. Gillies.—Cram.—Strab. 9, 441.—Liv. 33, 6.——II. A town of Bœotia, in the neighbourhood of Thespiæ, taken by the Spartans previous to the battle of Leuctra. Cram.

Cynoscephali, a people in India, who have the heads of dogs according to certain traditions. Plin. 7, 2.

Cynthus, a mountain of Delos, now Cinthia. Apollo was surnamed Cynthius, and Diana Cynthia, as they were born on the mountain, which was sacred to them. Virg. G. 3, v. 36.—Ovid. 6, Met. v. 304. Fast. 3, v. 346.

Cynuria, a district lying between Argolis and Laconia, on the Argolicus Sinus. "Its inhabitants were an ancient race, accounted indigenous by Herodotus, but belonging probably to the Leleges or the Pelasgi." The possession of this district caused continual hostilities between the Spartans and Argives. Thyrea was the principal town of Cynuria. Vid. Thyrea. Cram.—Herodot. 8, 73.

Cynus, "At a distance of ninety stadia from Daphnus, and opposite to Œdepsus, a town of Eubœa, was Cynus, the principal maritime city of the Opuntian Locri. According to ancient traditions, it had long been the residence of Deucalion and Pyrrha; that princess was even said to have been interred there." The city was taken by Attalus, king of Pergamus, in the Macedonian war. Cram.—Strab. 9, 425.—Liv. 28, 6.

Cyprus, an island in the eastern corner of the Mediterranean Sea, south of Cilicia, from which it was separated by the Aulon Cilicius, and west of Syria, from which, according to Pliny, it was severed by the action of the sea. No place in antiquity was known by a greater number of names than this island, many of them of a less disputed origin than that by which it was most generally known, and which prevailed over all the rest. The opinion adopted by D'Anville is generally received, and leaves the etymology as open to useless discussion as before. "It is thought that its mines of copper caused it to be called Kupros, or rather that this metal owes the name which distinguishes it to that of the island. Its other names are thus recorded and accounted for by the old antiquary and chorographer, Heylin. Cyprus, "called at first Cethinia, from Ketim, the son of Javan, who first planted it; 2. Cerastis, from the abundance of promontories, thrusting like horns into the sea; 3. Amathusia; 4. Paphia; 5. Salamina, from its principal towns; 6. Macaria, from its fruitfulness and felicities; 7. Asperia, from the roughness of the soil; 8. Collinia, from the frequency of hills and mountains; 9. Ærosa, from the mines of brass which abound therein; and, finally, all those forgotten or laid by, it settled at last in the name of Cyprus. Nor is it more strange that Cyprus should be so called by the Grecians from its abundance of cypress trees, anciently and originally peculiar to this island, than that the same Greeks should give unto the neighbouring island the name of Rhodes, from its great plenty of roses." The Phœnicians early established themselves in Cyprus, the Greek settlement being effected later, and not before the termination of the Trojan war. A separate government was generally established in each of the populous cities, but the larger eastern empires early exercised the power of ultimate sovereignty over the whole. The Persians organized nine principalities. From their hands it passed into those of Alexander, and the contest of his successors settled it on Ptolemy, and united it to the Alexandrian kingdom of Egypt. In the time of Ptolemy Auletes the Romans possessed themselves of this island, and in their power it remained till the dissolution of the unwieldy empire. During the crusades, the king of England, Richard Cœur de Lion, reduced it, first to the obedience of the knights templars, and afterwards to that of Lusignan, the titular monarch of Jerusalem. This event occurred about the year 1191, and, until 1570, it remained an independent state with some interval of subjection to Venice. About that year, however, it was reduced by the Turks, and has continued in their possession to the present day. The ancient towns of note were Salamis, the principal; Citium, the birth-place of Zeno; Amathus, sacred to Venus; Paphos, Ledra, now Nicosia, the present capital, in the centre of the isle; Idalium, the groves of which are celebrated in poetry:

——'solum gremio dea tollit in altos
Idaliæ lucos: ubi mollis amaracus illum
Floribus et dulci adspirans complectitur umbra.'

"The ancients," says Malte-Brun, "extol the fertility of this island; the moderns entertain nearly the same opinion of it. The most valuable production at present is cotton; we also send thither for turpentine, building timber, oranges, and most of all, Cyprus wine. The inhabitants of Cyprus are a fine race of men; the women, by the vivacity of their large eyes, seem to declare how faithful they are still to the worship of Venus. This island anciently had perhaps a million of inhabitants; it has now only 83,000." The rivers of Cyprus were all inconsiderable streams, frequently dry during the warmer months. The principal, however, were the Lycus and the Lapithus, running from Mount Olympus, now Santa Croce, the highest mountain of the island of which it occupies almost the centre. It has been celebrated for giving birth to Venus, surnamed Cypris, who was the chief deity of the place, and to whose service many places and temples were consecrated. Its length, according to Strabo, is 1400 stadia. There were three celebrated temples there, two sacred to Venus and the other to Jupiter. Strab. 15.—Ptol. 5, c. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 9.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Plin. 12, c. 24, l. 33, c. 5, l. 36, c. 26.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Cyrenaica, a part of Africa, north of Libya Inferior, bounded on the east by Marmarica, and on the west by Africa Propria, the Carthaginian territory. The name of Cyrenaica is derived from its principal city Cyrene; though Pliny and some others call it Pentapolis, from its five cities of Cyrene, Ptolemais, Barce, Darnis, and Berenice. Gillies, in his history of Greece, has given a brief outline of the first Greek settlement in this part of Africa, till their arrival the habitation of a savage race, if inhabited at all. "The African Greeks were a colony of Thera, the most southern island of the Ægean, and itself a colony of the Lacedæmonians. During the heroic ages, but it is uncertain at what precise era, the adventurous islanders settled in that part of the Sinus Syrticus which derived its name from the principal city Cyrene, and which is now lost in the desert of Barca. Descended from the Lacedæmonians, the Cyreneans naturally preserved the regal form of government. Under Battus, the third prince of that name, their territory was well cultivated, and their cities populous and flourishing. Six centuries before the Christian era they received a considerable accession of population from the mother country. Emboldened by this reinforcement, they attacked the neighbouring Libyans and seized on their possessions. The injured craved assistance from Apries, king of Egypt. a confederacy was thus formed, in order to repress the incursions and to chastise the audacity of the European invaders. But the valour and discipline of the Greeks always triumphed over the numbers and ferocity of Africa; nor did Cyrene become tributary to Egypt till Egypt itself had been subdued by a Grecian king, and the sceptre of the Pharaohs and of Sesostris had passed into the hands of the Ptolemies." In the time of Augustus, the Cyrenaica was incorporated, together with the island of Crete, into one province, but they were afterwards separated, and Cyrenaica constituted a province apart. A fit conclusion to this brief review of its ancient state will be found in the sketch of its present condition by Malte-Brun. "The country of Barca is the first that comes in our way on leaving Egypt. Some call it a desert, and the interior country merits that name; others call it a kingdom, an appellation founded on the existence of this country as the independent kingdom of Cyrene, governed by a branch of the Ptolemies. The coast of Barca, once famed for its threefold crops, is now very ill cultivated; the wandering tribes of the desert allow no rest to the inhabitants, or security to their labours. The sovereignty is divided between two Beys, one of whom resides at Derne, a town surrounded with gardens and watered by refreshing rivulets; his subjects may amount to 30,000 tents or families. The other lives at Bengazi, a town of 10,000 houses, with a tolerable harbour in a fertile territory. The Bey of Tripoli, appoints these governors. Among the magnificent ruins of Cyrene, the limpid spring still flows from which the city had its name. A tribe of Arabs pitches its tents amidst its sadly mutilated statues and falling colonnades. Tolometa, or the ancient Ptolemais, the port of Barca, preserves its ancient walls. This coast seems to hold out an invitation to European colonies. It seems to be the property of no government or people. A colony established here would rediscover those beautiful places which the ancients surnamed the hills of the Graces and the garden of the Hesperides." D'Anville, corroborated by modern travellers, informs us that the cities from which the Cyrenaica received the name Pentapolis are still extant in Tolometa, Barca, Derne, and Bernie, or Bengazi; while Teuchira, which under the Ptolemies was Arsinoe, "is found in its primitive denomination on the same shore." Mela, 1, 8.—Herod. 4, 19.

Cyrene, the capital of Cyrenaica. Ptolemy places it eleven miles from the sea, and ten from Apollonia, which served as its port, on the borders of Marmarica. The Cyreneans became "so expert," says Heylin, "in the management of the chariot, that they could drive it in a round or circle, and always keep their wheels in the self-same track." Cyrene was the birthplace of Eratosthenes, of Callimachus, "and of that Joseph whom the Jews compelled to carry our Saviour's cross." Vid. Part III. Herodot. 3 and 4.—Paus. 10, c. 13.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 8.—Plin. 5, c. 5.—*Tacit. Cyropolis, a city built by Cyrus, was situated on the river Iaxartes in Sogdiana. D'Anville calls it Cyreschata. It was, according to Strabo, the last city in the north of the Persian empire. Chaussard.

Cyrrhestica, a district of Syria, so termed from Cyrrhus, its chief town, which was situated at the foot of the mountains north of Beria, and which still exists under the name of Corus. D'Anville.

Cyrrhus. Thucydides (2, 100,) calls this a town of Macedonia, situate near Pella, mentioned in Ptolemy's list of Emathian towns under the name of Cyrius. Palao Castro, about sixteen miles north-west of Pella, is very likely the site of ancient Cyrrhus. This city probably gave name to the Syrian city. Cram.

Cyrus, a large river of Iberia, which, rising in the mountains on the frontier of Armenia, pursues, for some time, a north-easterly course. At length, after traversing nearly the whole extent of Iberia, and forming part of the boundary between that country and Albania, it discharges itself into the Caspian Sea, by two mouths. The modern name of this river is Kur. D'Anville.

Cyta, a town of Colchis, situated on the river Rheon, celebrated as being the birth-place of Medea; hence the term Cytæis applied to her by Propertius, and Cytæa Terra for Colchis. Val. Flac.

Cythera, now Cerigo, an island of the Mediterranean, lying off the southern coast of Laconia, about 5 miles from the promontory of Malea.—It was once called Porphyris, either from the purple fish found on its shores, or the marble in which it abounded. Cythera, however, is as old as the time of Homer. This island was governed by an annual magistrate, called Cytherodices, appointed by the Spartans, on whom it was dependant. Great importance was attached to the possession of this island, as it afforded to the Lacedæmonians safe harbours for their fleets, and to an enemy great facilities in prosecuting a war against Laconia; so much so, that Chilon, the Lacedæmonian sage, declared it would be well for Sparta if that island were sunk in the deep. After circumstances proved these apprehensions not unfounded; Nicias, with an Athenian force, seized upon this place in the Peloponnesian war, and greatly annoyed the Spartans, "by landing on the coast, ravaging the country, and cutting off detachments." The island was restored to the Lacedæmonians after the battle of Amphipolis, but was again taken by Conon after the defeat of the Spartan fleet off Cnidus. Hither Venus is said to have been wafted in a sea-shell, after her fabled birth from the ocean; whence her surname Cytherea. There was a temple sacred to Venus Urania in this place, the most ancient dedicated to her by the Greeks. In this temple the goddess was represented in complete armour. Its principal town was Cythera, situated opposite Malea, about ten stadia from the sea, which had a harbour called Scandea. Pausan.—Lacon. 23. Phœnicus is another harbour of this island, probably the modern Antemono or San Nicholo. Platanistus its chief promontory, is now Cape Spati.—Cram.—Heyl. Cosm.—Odyss. 1, 80.—Herod. 7, 235.—Thuc. 4, 53 and 55; 5, 18.—Diod. Sic. 15, 442.

Cythnus, one of the Cyclades, lying between Ceos and Seriphos, now called Thermia. Here the pretender Nero is said first to have made his appearance. It was colonized by the Dryopes; hence the name Dryopis applied to the island Cram.—Herod. 8, 46.

Cytineum, one of the four cities which gave the name Tetrapolis to Doris. Strab. 9.—Thuc. 1, 107.

Cytorus, a town and mountain of Paphlagonia, situated west of the promontory of Carambis. Strabo says it was a colony of the Milesians and the port of Sinope. It was built by Cytorus, son of Phryxus. The mountain abounded in boxwood of a peculiar quality. The modern name is Kudros or Kitros. Mela, 1, 19.—Strab. 11.—Virg. Geor. 2, 247.

Cyzicus, a town of Mysia, situated on an island of the same name in the Propontis, connected to the main land by two bridges built by Alexander. This city was founded by a colony of Milesians, and soon rose to such splendour as to be styled by Florus the "Rome of Asia." It was adorned with many splendid edifices, among which was a magnificent temple, "the pillars whereof being 4 cubits thick and 50 cubits high, were each of one entire stone only; the whole fabric all of polished marble, every stone joined unto the other with a line of gold." Heyl. Cosm. The whole Peloponnesian fleet was captured off this place by Alcibiades, A. C. 411. Mithridates laid siege to this city, and though he "lost before it, by sword, pestilence, and famine, no fewer than 30,000 men, did not succeed in his attempt." In later times this city was the metropolis of the province of Hellespont. The channel between the island and the main land has become blocked up with the rubbish, and the city itself was finally destroyed by an earthquake. Cyzicus is the name still applied to the ruins, which, in the words of Heylin, are daily made more ruinous by the stones and marbles being transported to Constantinople. The inhabitants of this city gave rise to two proverbs of different characters: from their effeminacy and timidity arose Tinctura Cyzenica; and from the beauty of their coins, κυζικηνοι στατηρες. Heyl. Cosm.—D'Anville. It has two excellent harbours, called Panormus and Chytus. Flor. 3, 5.—Plin. 5, 32.—Diod. 18.

Dæ, and Dahæ, a Scythian people, dwelling south of the Ochus in Hyrcania. Nomadic in their character, the Dahæ, under various names, encroached upon the territories of the neighbouring nations, and sometimes spread themselves to a great distance from their proper settlements. The principal branches were the Xanti, the Pissuri, and the Parni or Aparni. The best authorities confine this people within the left bank of the Ochus, though Arrian places them on the Iaxartes, which he took for the Tanais. Their country is now the Dahestan.

Dacia, the extensive country reaching from the Euxine Sea, on the north of that part of the Danube which was called Ister, to the Tibiscus, and having on its northern line Sarmatia (Poland) and the unexplored regions of the barbarians, was inhabited by a people called Getæ and Daci, of Scythian origin. The former name prevailed, for the most part, among the Greeks, and the latter among the Romans. During the years of the republic, and for some time after the establishment of the empire, their territory, separated by the Danube from that which had acknowledged the Roman supremacy, offered little attraction to the imperial or consular leaders; and the Danube, while it bounded the Roman ambition on the north, seemed to offer a barrier beyond which this formidable name should inspire no terror. In the reign of Trajan their barbarism, and the ignorance of their country which prevailed among the civilized people of Italy, no longer availed them, and attempts were made upon their territory by the arms of the empire. This reign includes the history, therefore, of the principal war with the Dacians; of the obstinate resistance offered by their king Decebalus to the attacks of the emperor; of his subjugation; and of the reduction of Dacia to the condition of a province. In these wars was erected that famous bridge over the Danube, near the town of Zernes, which the jealousy or the fear of the successor of Trajan destroyed, and the ruins of which have excited the admiration of the moderns. After this conquest the term of Dacia assumed its greatest latitude; and the vanity of the conqueror was pleased to fix his name to a province that carried the limits of his empire beyond the researches of authentic geography. The colonies then planted by order of this aspiring prince, are supposed, by mingling with the former inhabitants, to have generated that peculiar dialect called Daco-Latin, of which some traces remain in the idiom of the Wallachians. If the conquest of this country added splendour to the Roman name, the maintenance of its borders against the barbarians, who, in these days began to encroach on the limits of the empire, was found to be, on the contrary, at the same time useless and impossible, the moderation of Aurelian consequently induced him to forego the empty advantage of a nominal extent of territory, over which he could not exercise an actual government; and removing the population of Dacia, in a great measure, to the right bank of the Danube, he gave his own name to that part of Mœsia which lay eastward from the Margus, and towards the borders of Scythia Minor, calling it Dacia Aureliani. Of this province, the part that bordered on the river was called Dacia Ripensis, while that which confined upon Macedonia received the name of Dardania. In its greatest extent Dacia comprehended the modern countries of Hungary east of the Teiss, Transylvania, with the Bannat, Wallachia, and Moldavia: its capital being Sarmizegethusa, the residence of king Decebalus. On the reduction of the province by Trajan, this city assumed his name in that of Ulpia Trajana. The western part of Dacia was inhabited by a different race of men, who, coming from Sarmatia, fixed themselves between the Roman province of Dacia on one side of the Danube, and Pannonia on the other. These were the Jazyges Metanastæ. Aurelian's Dacia included chiefly a part of Bulgaria and Servia. The people inhabiting this region were called Getæ and Daci, generally considered, having been different only in their geographical situation, in the country which they both inhabited, and having one language and similar customs, &c. But it does not seem improbable that the Getæ were the earlier possessors of the land, and that the Daci subsequently established themselves in it, and obtained there greatly the ascendancy. They were, most probably, of Scythian origin, differing in the settlement and migration in regard to time, and both in a great measure superseded by the Goths, a still later people from the common Scythian hive. The names Geta and Davus, supposed to be the same as Dacus, conferred in all the Greek and Latin comedies upon the servants and slaves, may serve to show how early the Daci and Getæ were known in Greece and Rome, and in what estimation the character of these barbarians was held.

Dædala, a mountain and city of Lycia, where Dædalus was buried, according to Pliny, 5, 27.

Dalmătia, one of the provinces into which Illyria was subdivided. On the west it was separated from Liburnia by the Titius; the Scardus range of mountains confined it on the east; on the north were the Bebii montes; and on the south the waters of the Adriatic Sea. "The country, in the time of the Romans, was full of woods, and those woods of robbers, who from thence issued out to make spoil and booty. Dalmatæ sub sylvis agunt, inde ad latrocinia promptissimi. By the advantage of these woods they intercepted and discomfited Gabinius, one of Cæsar's captains, marching through the country with 1000 horse and 15 companies of foot. But these woods being destroyed, they began to exercise themselves at sea, in which their large sea-coasts and commodious havens served exceedingly." In this new occupation the inhabitants retained the natural ferocity of their character, and their maritime transactions were for the most part piracies, for which they were soon engaged in a war with the Romans. In the reign of Tiberius the Roman power was extended over all the country of Dalmatia. The principal towns of this province were Salona, the birth-place of Diocletian, and the place of his retirement after he had laid down the purple, Narona, Epidaurus, Lissus, and Scodra. This country has retained its ancient name, though sometimes it is written Delmatia, and very little alteration has been made in its boundaries. Strab. 7.—Ptol. 2.—*Cæs. Bell. Damascēna, a part of Syria near mount Libanus, so called from Damascus, its principal city.

Damascus, a city of Syria in Phœnicia of Libanus, to the east of Sidon, "situate in a plain environed with hills and watered by the river Chrysorrhoas." The first historical accounts of this place are found in the Sacred Writings, where its princes are mentioned as having formed an alliance with Hadadezer king of Zobah, against the Jewish conqueror David. The supreme authority in Damascus was some time afterwards usurped by a soldier of Hadadezer's army, from which time this city became the capital and royal seat of Syria. When Syria was reduced to the state of a dependency on the Assyrian empire, it lost, of course, its great pre-eminence, and passed successively into the power of the Persians, of Alexander, and of the successors of that unrestrained libertine of ambition. Under the Roman government the city of Antioch attained the supremacy, and Damascus ceased to be the principal among the capitals of Syria. The following account is from Heylin, the old corographer and antiquarian, whose work, though written almost 200 years ago, and quite before the rise of the modern art of criticism, is replete with the most accurate information in regard to the ancients and the countries of antiquity. "Damascus, a place so surfeiting of delights, so girt about with odoriferous gardens, that Mahomet would never be persuaded (as himself was used to say) to come unto it, lest, being ravished with its inestimable pleasures, he should forget the business he was sent about, and make there his paradise. But one of his successors, having no such scruples, removed the regal seat unto it, where it continued till the building of Bagdat, a hundred years afterwards. The chief building in it, in later times, till destroyed by the Tartars, was a strong castle, deemed impregnable, and not without difficulty forced by Tamerlane, whom nothing was able to resist; and as majestical a church, with forty sumptuous porches, and no fewer than 9000 lanterns of gold and silver; which, with 30,000 people in it, who fled thither for sanctuary, was by the said Tamerlane most cruelly and unmercifully burnt and pulled down unto the ground. Repaired by the mamelukes of Egypt, when lords of Syria, it hath since flourished in trade, the people being industrious, and celebrated as artisans." In the New Testament Damascus is famous for the first preaching of St. Paul on his miraculous conversion. It is now Demesk, as named by the inhabitants of the country, according to D'Anville; who adds, that the valley in which it stands is also called Goutah Demesk, the Orchard of Damascus. This is not the only name by which it is known, and the moderns generally call it Sham. It is inhabited by about 80,000 souls. Heyl.—2d Sam. 8, 5, 6.—Jos. 7, 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 215.—Justin. 36, c. 2.—Mela, 1, c. 11.

Damasia, a town called also Augusta, now Augsburg, in Swabia, on the Leck.

Damnii, a people "dwelling in Clydesdale, Lenox, Stirling, and Monteith, whose chief city was Vanduara, now Renfrew." Heyl.—Cambd. Brit.

Damnonii, a people of the west of Britain, in Cornwall and Devonshire. Cambden supposes that the name is more correctly written Danmonii.

Dana, a town of Cappadocia, which D'Anville thinks may have been the same as Tyana. He does not, however, insist on this opinion. It was near the Cilician Gates, and is mentioned as one of the places at which Cyrus halted on his march against Artaxerxes. Xen. Anab. 1, 2.

Danai, a name given to the people of Argos, and promiscuously to all the Greeks, from Danaus their king. Virg. and Ovid. passim.

Danaster, a name given in the middle ages to the Tyras, whence the modern Dniester. Vid. Tyras.

Dandări, and Dandărīdæ, the inhabitants of an elevated district on the Caucasus, about the part called Corax. According to D'Anville this region still preserves the name of Dandars.

Danŭbius, the first and greatest river of Europe after the Volga. It rises in the mountains called by the ancients Abnoba, Schwartzen-Wald, about the borders of Bavaria, and Wirtemburg, in a little village called Eschingen, only two miles from the shores of the Rhine, and, after flowing through the greater part of the northern countries, a distance of more than 1,600 miles, discharges itself by two channels into the Black Sea. This river was fortified nearly the whole length by the Romans, who considered it the northern limit of their empire, though they did not pretend to have explored very accurately the country through which it flowed, and which they claimed as their territory.

In the beginning of its course the Danube runs almost directly east, dividing Vindilicia, the southern part of Bavaria, from Germania Antiqua on the north, in that part which is now the kingdom of Wirtemburg and the northern portion of Bavaria. Continuing in this direction, after collecting the waters of many smaller streams, among which are the Licus (Lech) and the Isarcus (Iser), it receives the Œnus (Inn) on the borders of Noricum. From this point it constituted the dividing line between the last-named country, now Saltzburg, Stiria, and the southern part of Austria, upon the south, and Germania, the northern portion of Austria upon the other side as far as Vindobona, now the capital of the Austrian empire, below the Cetius mons. Dividing still the modern Austria, it had the country of the Quadi, Moravia, some distance father on the north, to the mouth of the Marus (March), where it entered Dacia, the modern Hungary. In all its course, from the mons Cetius, Pannonia was upon the southern shore. In this part of its course the Danube received the Arrabona, a Pannonian river, now the Raab in Hungary, besides innumerable other smaller streams. "The Danube," says Malte-Brun, "passes into Hungary at the burgh of Deven, immediately after it is joined by the March or Morave; it is covered with islands below Presburg, and divides itself into three branches, of which the greatest flows in an east-south-east direction; the second and third form two large islands; and the second, having received from the south the waters of the Laita and the Raab, unites with the first; the third, increased by the streams of the Waag, falls into the main channel at Komorn. More than a hundred eddies have been counted on the Vag or Waag within the distance of 36 miles. The Danube flows eastwards from the town of Raab, receives on the left the waters of the Ipoly and the Gran, and becomes narrower as it approaches the mountains, between which it passes beyond Esztergom; it makes several sinuations round the rocks, reaches the burgh of Vartz, whence it turns abruptly towards the south, and waters the base of the hills of St. Andrew and Buda. Its declivity from Ingolstadt to Buda is not more than eight feet; the sudden change in its direction is determined by the position of the hills connected with mount Czarath, and by the level of the great plain. The river expands anew in its course through the Hungarian plains, forms large islands, and passes through a country of which the inclination is not more than twenty inches in the league. Its banks are covered with marshes in the southern part of Pest towards its confluence with the Drave. It extends in a southern direction to the frontiers of Sclavonia, where the first hills in Fruska Gora retard its junction with the Save; it then resumes its eastern course, winds round the heights, turns to the south-east, receives first the Theiss," the ancient Tibisus, "then the Save (Savus) at Belgrade (Singidunum), and flows with greater rapidity to the base of the Servian mountains. Its bed is again contracted, its impetuous billows crowd on each other, and escape by a narrow and steep channel, which they appear to have formed between the heights in Servia and the Bannat." In all the windings thus described, the Danube traversed only, in antiquity, the countries of Pannonia on the one hand, and Dacia, or rather that part of the country which the Jazyges Metanastæ had taken from Dacia, on the other. From the mouth of the Save, however, it formed a new boundary, having Dacia on the north and Mœsia on the south, for nearly the whole length of that extensive country. "It issues," continues Malte-Brun, "from the Hungarian states at New Orsova; and having crossed the barriers that oppose its passage, waters the immense plains of Wallachia and Moldavia" (country of the Dacian Getæ), where its streams unite with the Black Sea." Below the confluence of the Save and Danube it is that the latter receives the greater part of its tributaries. On the side of Mœsia, the Margus (Morava), Æscus (Esker), and Iatrus; on the side of Dacia, the Aluta (Olt), the Ardeiscus (Argis), the Naparis (Proava), and the Ararus (Sirel). From Belgrade to the Argis, and for some distance below, the course of the river is generally east; but between the Argis and the Proava it turns abruptly north as far as the Sirat, where, with no less suddenness, it bends towards the east, enclosing thus within its own shores and those of the Euxine a narrow peninsula once called Scythia, now the north-eastern corner of Bulgaria. This river, for the most part called Ister by the Greeks, did not take that name among the Latins till it had passed the cataracts near the mouth of the Save and the city of Belgrade. In the whole course thus described by this noble stream, 60 rivers of magnitude discharge their waters collected from the Carpathian mountains and the Alps, beside a number, much more than double, of less important streams. It empties, by a number of mouths, into the Euxine Sea. The ancients generally reckoned seven; Gibbon states them at six, and most other modern writers find but two. It is hence to be inferred, that as the country upon the shores of the sea are flat and soft, the alluvial depositions have choked up the ancient channels referred to by ancient authorities. The waters of the Danube are particularly remarked by Malte-Brun for their turbid appearance compared with the clear blue current of the Inn, which has been mentioned as its principal branch. The Danube was worshipped as a deity by the Scythians. Malte-Brun.—D'Anville.—Dionys. Perieg.—Herodot. 2, c. 33. l. 4, c. 48, &c.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ammian. 23.

Daphne, a grove in Syria, about five miles from the city of Antioch. The establishment of a Greek empire in Syria on the death of Alexander the Great, involved the introduction of Grecian fable and mythology. Of all the fictions that poetry had rendered sacred and beautiful among the people of Greece, there was none that experienced a readier or more enthusiastic reception in the east than that which had consecrated the fate of Daphne and the story of Apollo's love. The god and the nymph were both adopted by the lively imaginations of their new votaries, and seemed fitter for the scene of such a tale than the cold clime of Greece, and even Tempe's Peneus. Here summer was tempered in its heat by hundreds of fountains; and an impenetrable laurel shade, that extended for miles, excluded the fiercer blaze of that sun whose worship imparted its sacred character to the place, and made it religious. Here the oracular voice of Apollo spoke with truth as certain as in his early Delphic sanctuary; and the games which constituted so large a portion of the sacred rites in Greece were here performed with enthusiasm and devotion. But here, too, the fate of Daphne was received as a warning, and all who professed to worship in this grove were the votaries of gentleness and love. No spot in all the Pagan world was more revered than this; and when the establishment of a Christian church had superseded the rites of the old and cherished faith, the pilgrims of Daphne could hardly bear to see its recesses and its shades converted to the uses of a cold religion that forbade them the enjoyment to which a voluptuous climate and the soft allurements of the spot invited them. The grove and temple of Daphne were burned by the Christians of Antioch in the time of Julian.

> "that sweet grove
> Of Daphne by Orontes, and the inspired > Castalian spring—"

Daphnus, a river of Opuntian Locris, into which the body of Hesiod was thrown after his murder. Plut. de Symp. At the mouth of this river stood the town of Daphnus, once included in the limits of Phocis. In the time of Strabo this town no longer existed. Cram.—Strab. 9, 424.—Plin. 4, 7.

Dara, a town of Mesopotamia, situated near Nisibin, fortified by the emperor Anastasius, and from him called Anastasiopolis. Its modern name is Dara-Kardin. D'Anville.

Darantasia, a town of Belgic Gaul, called also Forum Claudii, and now Molier.

Dardania, I. anciently a large tract of country forming part of Dacia and Mœsia, and included in the modern Servia. This country was situated north of Macedonia, near to mount Hæmus. It was inhabited by a fierce and barbarous race of men, whose perpetual hostility to Macedonia was, from their frequent inroads, very annoying to that country. Philip, the father of Perseus, in order to rid himself of his troublesome neighbours, invited the Bastarnæ to come and settle in this country, promising to assist them in expelling the Dardani. But Philip dying while they were on their march, and Perseus not wishing to accomplish his father's purpose, they returned home, except 3000, who settled in Dardania and became gradually mingled with the people of that country. This nation was vanquished by C. Scribonius Curio, and reduced to a Roman province, which was, however, much smaller in its extent than the ancient country. Its capital, Scupi, modern Uskup, was situated near the sources of the Axius, at the foot of mount Scardus. Heyl. Cosm.—D'Anville.——II. A small district of Troas, lying along the Hellespont, which receives its name from the town Dardanus, situated upon a promontory called Dardanium by Pliny, and Dardanis by Strabo, about 70 stadia distant from Abydos. From the name of this town is derived the modern Dardanelles.——A name applied anciently to Samothrace.

Dargomanes, a river of Bactriana, which, rising in the mountains of Taurus, unites with the Ochus, and both together fall into the Oxus. Heyl.—D'Anville.

Dariorigum, a town of Gallia Lugdunensis, the capital of the Veneti, now Vennes, in Brittany.

Dascylium, a town in the north-western part of Bithynia, placed by D'Anville "on a lake of the same name, formed by the diffusion of a river that descends from mount Olympus." Pomponius Mela places it beyond the Rhyndacus, and calls it Dascylos. Freinshemius, in his supplement to Quintus Curtius, (2, 6.) calls it Dascyleum, and says that Alexander sent Parmenio to take possession of this place, which was occupied by a guard of Persians. Its modern name is Liaskillo.

Daseæ, a town of Arcadia, situated on the left bank of the Alpheus, 29 stadia from Megalopolis.

Dassarĕtii, a people of Illyria, whose territory was adjacent to that of the Albani and Parthini. This nation occupied the borders of the Palus Lychnitis, the modern lake of Ochrida. From their situation on the borders, between Illyria and Macedonia, their country was frequently "the scene of hostilities between the contending armies." Their chief town was Lychnidus, situated on the great lake Lichnitis. Vid. Lychnidus. Livy (30, 33.) says that this country was fruitful in corn, and well calculated to support an army. We learn from Polybius that it was populous, and contained many towns and fortresses. Cram.—Polyb. 5, 108.—Strab. 7, 316.

Dătos, or Datum, a town of the Edones, in Thrace, situate near Neapolis. Near this place an engagement was fought between the natives and the Athenian colonists who attempted to settle here, in which the latter were defeated. "Its territory was highly fertile; it possessed excellent docks for the construction of ships, and the most valuable gold mines; hence arose the proverb Δατος αγαθων. i. e. an abundance of good things." Scylax calls this a Greek colony, but Zenobius mentions it as founded by the Thasians. It was originally called Crenides, on account of its springs; subsequently Datos, and lastly Philippi, near which Brutus and Cassius were defeated. Cram.—Herod. 9, 75.—Scyl. Peripl. p. 27.—Xenob. loc. cit.

Daulis, a city of great antiquity in Phocis, south of the Cephissus. (Vid. Daulis, Part III.) It was destroyed by the Persians, and rebuilt, after which it was taken by T. Flaminius in the Macedonian war. It was, according to Livy, (32, 18.) situated on a lofty hill, difficult to be scaled. The Daulians are reported by Pausanias (Phoc. 4.) as superior in strength and stature to the other inhabitants of Phocis. The modern Daulia occupies the site of the ancient city. Polyb. 4, 25, 2.—Plin. 4, 4.

Daunia, a district of Apulia, on the Adriatic, so called from Daunus, the father-in-law of Diomede and king of this country. Still more ancient accounts make Daunus an Illyrian chief, who was expelled from his country by an adverse faction, and settled in this part of Italy. The river Frento and the Appenines bounded it on the north and west, and it extended south as far as the Aufidus. The modern Puglia Piana nearly answers to the ancient Daunia.

Decapŏlis, a confederation of ten Gentile cities in Palestine, entered into by the inhabitants for their common protection against the Jews. Their names are given by D'Anville in the following order: Scythopolis, Gadara, Hippos, Gerasa, Canatha, Pella, Dium, Philadelphia, Abila, and Capitolias. Dr. Heylin, in his cosmography, says that this was another name for the two Galilees, (Mark. 7, 31, and Matth. 4, 25.) so called from their ten chief cities. "It stretched from the Mediterranean to the head of Jordan, east and west, and from Libanus to the hills of Gilboa, north and south; which might make up a square of 40 miles."

Decelia, now Biala Castro, a town on the frontier of Attica, situated on the road from Athens to Eubœa, and equidistant between Thebes and Athens, from each of which it was fifteen miles. Agis, the Spartan king, during the Peloponnesian war seized upon this fortress by the advice of Alcibiades, and placed in it a Lacedæmonian garrison, which proved a serious annoyance to the Athenians. Herodotus says that the Peloponnesian army always respected the territories of the Deceleans, because they had pointed out to the Tyndaridæ the place where Helen was secreted by Theseus. Gillies.—Cram.—Herod. 9, 73.

Decetia, a town of the Ædui, situated on an island formed by the Liger; it still exists under the name of Decize, in the province of le Nivernais, the present department of la Nièvre. Lemaire.

Decumates agri, certain lands of Germany, situated at the foot of mount Abnoba, Black Mountain, which, upon their evacuation by the Marcomanni, were occupied by a body of Gauls, who paid annually to the Romans a tenth part of their produce, from whence the name.

Delium, a town of Bœotia, opposite Chalcis, about four miles from Aulis, towards the mouth of the river Asopus. In the battle fought at this place between the Athenians and Bœotians, Socrates is said to have preserved the life of Xenophon, or, as some accounts represent, of Alcibiades. Paus. Bœot. 20.—Strab.—Diog. Laert.—Liv. 31, c. 45, l. 35, c. 51.

Delminium, a town of Dalmatia. According to D'Anville it was in the centre of the country: the site, however, of this town has not been ascertained, though, as giving its name to all the country, it must have been of some importance. It seems, nevertheless, that it may yet fairly be questioned whether the name of Dalmatia were really a derivative from that of this town. Flor. 4, c. 12.

Delos, the principal island of the Cyclades, of which it was the centre. It was known by other names besides that of Delos, as Asteria, Ortygia, Cynthia, &c., for which a variety of curious etymologies have been imagined. This island was early celebrated for the meetings of the Ionic people of Greece, who there celebrated national games, &c. The principal deity of the place was Apollo, whose fabled birth upon one of its mountains invested it with a peculiar sanctity in the eyes even of the Barbarians. When the Athenians obtained possession of the island, they ordered that neither deaths nor births, that could be prevented, should occur there; enacting a law that all sick persons and women enceinte should be removed to the neighbouring island of Rhenea. They instituted also the festival called Delia, in which offerings were brought from the distant Hyperboreans who worshipped the peculiar deity of this place with zealous devotion. (Vid. Lelia, Part II.) Even the Persians refrained from violating this sacred spot, and consented to offer sacrifice to the deity whose attributes, under other forms and with other rites, was the object of their own adoration. The peculiar veneration in which all nations seemed to hold this island, indicated it to the Athenians as a proper depository for the treasures of the Greeks, which accordingly were lodged here after the Persian war. On the destruction of Corinth all the commercial interests of the Corinthians were transferred to Delos, on account of its advantageous situation between the countries of Europe and Asia. With prospects of increased prosperity the islanders began to assume an important aspect among larger nations, when the soldiers of Mithridates, having landed on their coasts, and committed the most unrelenting devastations, reduced the whole island to a condition of poverty and misery from which it never recovered. The principal town, called also Delos, was situated in a plain through which ran the little river Inopus, near the lake Trochoeides. Above this plain the barren heights of mount Cynthus raised themselves. The mountain is now Cintio, and the island has taken the name of Delo, or Sdille. Delos remains a heap of rubbish and ruins, as in former days, overrun with hares and scarcely inhabited. Vid. Rhenea. One of the altars of Apollo in the island was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world. It had been erected by Apollo, when only four years old, and made with the horns of goats killed by Diana on mount Cynthus. It was unlawful to sacrifice any living creature upon the altar, which was religiously kept pure from blood and every pollution. Apollo, whose image was in the shape of a dragon, delivered there oracles during the summer, in a plain manner, without any ambiguity or obscure meaning. No dogs, as Thucydides mentions, were permitted to enter the island; and when the Athenians were ordered to purify the place, they dug up all the dead bodies that had been interred there, and transported them to the neighbouring islands. Mythologists suppose that Asteria, who changed herself into a quail to avoid the importuning addresses of Jupiter, was metamorphosed into this island, originally called Ortygia, ab ορτυξ, a quail. The people of Delos are described by Cicero, Arcad. 2, c. 16 and 18, l. 4, c. 18, as famous for rearing hens. Strab. 8 and 10.—*Ovid. Delphi, more anciently Pytho, now Castri, the largest town in Phocis, and in some respects the most remarkable in Greece. This town was built at the foot of mount Parnassus, in the form of an amphitheatre, and so defended by the precipices which surrounded it, that it was not necessary to fortify it with a wall. The great celebrity of this place arose from the oracle of Apollo, who there declared the fates, and from the council of the Amphictyons which held there its alternate session. No oracle in Greece enjoyed a reputation equal to that of the Delphic, though the venerable Dodona boasted a greater antiquity. The first temple erected at this place to the deity, whose worship invested it with so much dignity, was of brass, according to the opinion of Pausanias; but no record remains of the era at which it was built, and the second more sumptuous one, containing the presents of the splendid Midas and the magnificent Crœsus was consumed by fire B. C. 548. To the erection of a third all the cities of Greece contributed, and even the king of Egypt lent his aid. The Athenian Alcmæonidæ contracted, under the superintendence of the Amphictyons, to finish it, and for the sum of 300 talents a beautiful building of Parian marble and Porine stone was erected for the oracle and temple of the prophetic god. It cannot be matter of wonder, that, enriched as this most celebrated shrine perpetually was by presents from the wealthiest individuals and the most opulent states, there should be those who, disregardful of its sacred rights, should endeavour to appropriate a portion of its incalculable treasures. The distant cities of Greece, and of nations in habits of intercourse with her states, long cherished for this spot those feelings of religious awe which superstition had generated, and which distance kept undisturbed in their sacred mystery; but the neighbouring Crissa became early acquainted with the Delphic city, proximity begat familiarity, and familiarity dissipated reverence. The Crissæans soon began to look upon the sacred temple as an object of plunder, and its votive treasures excited the same cupidity as any others that might not have been hallowed as offerings to the god. For many years afterwards the Crissæan plains were declared accursed by the Amphictyons, as a fit punishment of the sacrilegious attempt which they had made on the shrine and the temple confided to the charge of the venerable assembly. The avarice of Xerxes, who meditated a similar outrage, was disappointed, as the Delphians asserted, by the manifest interposition of the deity who presided over this holy place. In the time of king Philip this long venerated abode of Apollo was violated again; but no desire of plunder then animated the assailants, and the political objects avowed by the Phocians in seizing the temple, and of those who abetted and aided them, made it apparent that the deep religious feeling that the name of Delphi and its god could once excite, had passed from the minds of men. Religion had ceased to be a feeling in Greece, and existed but as a moral or political instrument. From this time forward the treasures of the temple were viewed with no feeling but that of desire by the foreign cities to which the report of their value had reached. The Gauls, under Brennus, stripped it of its most valuable ornaments; and, on the conquest of the Gallic city of Tolosa by the Romans, a long time afterwards, the Delphic plunder was found there by the Roman conquerors. Sylla also, regardless of its masterpieces of art, plundered the temple of its silver and gold; and Nero, long after the reputation of the oracle had expired, removed from it 500 statues of bronze, the wonders of art. Paus. Phoc. 34.—Strab.—Herod. The origin of the oracle, though fabulous, is described as something wonderful. A number of goats that were feeding on mount Parnassus, came near a place which had a deep and long perforation. The steam which issued from the hole seemed to inspire the goats, and they played and frisked about in such an uncommon manner, that the goatherd was tempted to lean on the hole and see what mysteries the place contained. He was immediately seized with a fit of enthusiasm, his expressions were wild and extravagant, and passed for prophecies. This circumstance was soon known about the country, and many experienced the same enthusiastic inspiration. The place was revered, and the temple was soon after erected in honour of Apollo, and a city built. According to some accounts, Apollo was not the first who gave oracles there; but Terra, Neptune, Themis, and Phœbe, were in possession of the place before the son of Latona. The oracles were generally given in verse; but when it had been sarcastically observed that the god and patron of poetry was the most imperfect poet in the world, the priestess delivered her answers in prose. The oracles were always delivered by a priestess called Pythia. (Vid. Pythia.) It was universally believed and supported by the ancients, that Delphi was in the middle of the earth; and on that account it was called Terræ umbilicus. This, according to mythology, was first found out by two doves, which Jupiter had let loose from the two extremities of the earth, and which met at the place where the temple of Delphi was built. Apollon. 2, v. 706.—Diod. 16.—Plut. de Defect. Orac. &c.—Paus. 10, c. 6, &c.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 168.—Strab. 9. If the oracle and temple of Apollo gave to the town of Delphi a religious character, the meetings of the Amphictyonic council gave it no less political importance; so much so, indeed, that from the influence of the two combined, it might be said that all the interests and all the glory of Greece were organized and planned in this renowned and cherished spot of earth. Etymologists dispute concerning the derivation of the name, though they generally refer it to the word Δελφος. Mythology, however, more generally followed, assigns to Delphus, the son of Apollo, the glory of having given name to this place so peculiarly the object of his father's care. To those who are curious in reconciling the religion of the Hebrews and the Pagan superstitions, the remarks of one who has laboured with unwearied industry to that end may not prove uninteresting. "The Greeks had a notion of Delphi being the navel of the world. The idea originated in a misconception of the sacred term Om-phi-al., the oracle of the solar god, which the Greeks corrupted into Omphalus, and the Latins into Umbilicus. Delphi is a word of the very same import, being compounded of Tel-phi, the oracle of the sun." To this is added in a note, "the connexion of Delphi with the diluvian as well as with the solar worship, appears from a tradition preserved by Tzetzes, that this oracular city derived its name from Delphus, who was supposed to have been the son of Neptune, by Melantho, the daughter of Deucalion. Deucalion is said to have first landed upon the summit of mount Parnassus, at the foot of which Delphi was built." Fab. Cab.

Delphinium, a port of Bœotia at the mouth of the Asopus, opposite the Eubœan Eretria. It was sometimes denominated the sacred port.

Delta, a part of Egypt, which received that name from its resemblance to the form of the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. It lies between the Canopian and Pelusian mouths of the Nile and begins to be formed where the river divides itself into several streams. It has been formed totally by the mud and sand which are washed down from the upper parts of Egypt by the Nile, according to ancient tradition. Vid. Ægyptus. Cæs. Alex. c. 27.—Strab. 15 and 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 13, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

Demetrias, a town of Thessaly, founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes B. C. 290. The population of this place was collected from a great number of neighbouring towns included in the territory over which it soon assumed the dominion. It was placed in such a manner as to defend the passes into the northern parts of Greece, which gave it great importance in a military point of view; while its situation in the Pagaseticus Sinus afforded it great advantages of communication with Eubœa, southern Greece, the Cyclades, and the Asiatic coasts. It became the capital of a small state, called the Magnesian Republic, after the battle of Cynoscephalæ. Soon after it yielded to Macedonia, and fell with that kingdom into the hands of the Romans. The name was common to other places. Plut.—Polyb.—Liv. 36, 33.

Derbe, a town of Lycaonia, at the north of mount Taurus in Asia Minor, now Alab-Dag. Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 73.

Derbices, a people of Asia, dwelling north of the Dahæ and the countries of Parthia and Margiana. The greater part of the country between the Ochus and the Oxus was occupied by this people. Quintus Curtius (2, 7,) enumerates them among the people who formed the cavalry of Darius.

Dercon, a town of Thrace on the Euxine Sea. From this place, directly across the peninsula to Heraclea on the Propontis, the emperor Anastasius constructed a wall, called Macron-Tichos, of which some vestiges are said to remain. The object of building this wall was to defend Constantinople on this side, on which alone it could be approached by land.

Dertona, a town of Liguria. As a Roman colony, it was surnamed Julia. The modern name is Tortona, to the west of Asti.

Dertosa, now Tortosa, a town of Spain on the Iberus.

Deva, according to some authorities, Devana, the town of Chester on the Dee. This river was also called by the ancients Deva, except at its mouth, where it assumed the name of Seteia. The surrounding country was peopled by the Cornabii; and in the town, during the Roman occupation of the island, was stationed a legion. From this circumstance the Britons gave the town the name of Caerlegion and Caerleon Vaur.—The Scottish Dee was also called Deva, and gave its name to Aberdeen, which stood upon its banks towards the mouth. Cambd. Brit.—Horsl. Brit. Rom.

Dia, I. an island in the Ægean Sea. Vid. Naxos.——II. Another on the coast of Crete, now Stan Dia.——III. A city of Thrace.——IV. Eubœa.

Dianium, now Denia, a town of Tarraconensis on the Mediterranean. The Massilians founded this town, to which the name of Dianium (in Greek, Artemisium), was given, from the peculiar reverence which was there paid to her divinity. The cape on which it was built bore the same name in antiquity, and is now Cape Martin.

Dicæa, and Dicæarchea, a town of Italy. Vid. Puteoli.

Dictæ and Dictæus mons, a mountain of Crete, in the eastern part of the island. On this mountain was born the father of the Grecian gods, and in its recesses, the Dictæan cave, he lay concealed and was miraculously nourished by bees. It was not agreed, however, by all the writers of antiquity that the mountain thus branching from Ida was the celebrated Dicte; and Callimachus refers it to the country adjacent to Cydonia. Near this mountain, in the time of Diodorus, were the ruins of a town said to have borne the name of Dicte, and to have been founded by Jupiter. Jupiter was called Dictæus, because worshipped here; and the same epithet was applied to Minos. Virg. G. 2, v. 536.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 43.—Ptol. 3, c. 17.—Strab. 10.

Dictidienses, certain inhabitants of mount Athos. Thucyd. 5, c. 82.

Digentia, a small river which watered Horace's farm in the country of the Sabines, now la Licenza. Horat. 1. ep. 18, v. 104.

Dindymus, or a, (orum,) a mountain on the borders of Galatia and Phrygia Major, overlooking the city of Pessinus. "Strabo has two mountains of this name: one in Mysia, near Cyzicus; the other in Gallo-Græcia, near Pessinus; and none in Phrygia. Ptolemy extends this ridge from the borders of Troas, through Phrygia to Gallo-Græcia. Though, therefore, there were two mountains called Dindymus in particular, both sacred to the mother of the gods, and none of them in Phrygia Major; yet there might be several hills and eminences in it on which this goddess was worshipped, and therefore called Dindyma in general." Cram. It was from this place that Cybele was called *Dindymene. Dinia, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, now Digne.

Diomedeæ insulæ, islands situated off the Apulian coast, opposite to the bay of Rodi or the Sinus Urias, "celebrated in mythology as the scene of the metamorphosis of Diomed's companions, who were changed into birds, and of the disappearance of that hero himself. Ancient writers differ as to their number. Strabo recognizes two, whereof one was inhabited, the other deserted. This is also the account of Pliny, who states that one was called Diomedia, the other Teutria. Ptolemy, however, reckons five, which is said to be the correct number, if we include in the group three barren rocks, which scarce deserve the name of islands. The island to which Pliny gives the name of Diomedea, appears to have also borne the appellation of Tremitus, as we learn from Tacitus, who informs us it was the spot to which Augustus removed his abandoned grand-daughter Julia, and where she terminated a life of infamy. Of these islands, the largest is now called Isola San Domino, the other San Nicolo." Cram.—Aristot. de Mirab.—Ovid. Metam. 14.—Strab. 6, 284.—Tac. Ann. 4, 71.

Diomedis campi, the plains between Cannæ and the Aufidus, the scene of the famous victory of Hannibal over the Romans. Cram.

Diŏnȳsiădes, two small islands of Crete, now Yanidzares, to the north-east of the gulf of Sitia.

Dioscŏridis insula, an island situated at the south of the entrance of the Arabic gulf, and now called Socotara. Its aloes are more esteemed than those of Hadramaüt. If we believe the Arabian writers, Alexander settled here a colony of Iouanion, that is to say, of Greeks. Become christians, they remained such, according to Marco Polo, at the close of the thirteenth century." D'Anville.

Dioscurias, a town of Colchis, on the shore of the Euxine, at the mouth of the Charus. It was also named Sebastopolis, and " in the earliest age was the port most frequented in Colchis, by distant as well as neighbouring nations, speaking different languages; a circumstance that still distinguishes Iskuriah, whose name is only a depravation of the ancient denomination." D'Anville.

Diospŏlis, or Thebæ. Vid. Thebæ.——Parva, the capital of the Nomos Diospolites in Ægyptus Superior, situated " at the summit of a sudden flexure in the course of the Nile, in a place now called Hora." D'Anville.——Another in Samaria, the same with Lydda.

Dipæa, a place of Arcadia, belonging to Megalopolis, near which the Spartans gained a victory over the Arcadians. Cram.

Dipŏlis, a name given to Lemnos, as having two cities, Hephæstia and Myrinia.

Dipsas, (antis,) a river of Cilicia, flowing from mount Taurus. Lucan. 8, v. 255.

Dipylon, a gate of Athens. Vid. Athenæ.

Diræ, or Dira, the strait by which the Arabic gulf communicates with the Erythrean Sea. In Greek it " expresses a passage, straightened in the manner of a throat. Its modern name of Bab-el-Mandel signifies in the Arabic language, the Port of Mourning or Affliction, from apprehension of the risk of venturing beyond, in the expanse of a vast ocean." D'Anville.

Dium, I. " one of the principal cities of Macedonia, and not unfrequently the residence of its monarchs. Livy describes it as placed at the foot of mount Olympus, which leaves but the space of one mile from the sea; and half of this is occupied by marshes formed by the mouth of the river Baphyrus. The town, though not extensive, was abundantly adorned with public buildings, among which was a celebrated temple of Jupiter and numerous statues. It suffered considerably during the Social War, from an incursion of the Ætolians under their prætor Scopas. It is evident, however, from Livy's account, that this damage had been repaired when the Romans occupied the town in the reign of Perseus. Dium, at a later period, became a Roman colony; Pliny terms it Colonia Diensis. Some similarity in the name of this once flourishing city is apparent in that of a spot called Standia, which answers to Livy's description." Cram.—Liv. 44, 6 and 7—33, 3.—Polyb. 4, 62. —Plin. 4, 10.——II. Another in Chalcidice. ——III. A promontory in Crete, now Cape Sassoso. Cram.

Divodurum, a town of Gaul, now Metz, in Lorrain.

Dōdōna, next to Delphi the most famous oracle of Greece, and more ancient even than that. Yet, famous as this oracle of Jupiter became, the very site was, at a comparatively early period, a matter of dispute. All authorities refer it to Epirus, but many contend for that part which belonged to the Molossi; while others, with better reason, decide for Thesprotia. It seems, indeed, that without fear of misleading, we may place this noted spot on the borders of the territories occupied by these people; and as their respective boundaries were unsettled, it may have been at one time in the country of the Thesproti, and afterwards have been found in that of the Molossi, who are known to have extended their limits on the borders of Thesprotia. The town of Dodona, together with the oracle, was built upon the hill or mountain Tomarus; but as so much of Epirus was covered with high land and hills, it is not possible, without peculiar guides, and such as have not yet been found, to settle the disputed question of locality by these inconclusive data. Tomarus, however, is represented as being singularly abundant in fountains and torrents, from which it supplied innumerable streams. The fable of Herodotus concerning the origin of this oracle is of some avail in showing at least the connexion between the superstitions of Greece and Egypt; and more particularly in lending some clue to the history of the Pelasgic people, and their affinity with other nations; as we know that the real origin of the Dodonean shrine is attributed to the Pelasgi. Its antiquity is carried to a period long before the Trojan war, and seems coeval with the fabulous, and perhaps allegorical, ages of Deucalion and Inachus. We know less of the vicissitudes of Dodona than of those to which the oracle of Apollo at Delphi was subject; but it is probable that the fatal blow, from which it never revived, was struck in the Social war by the Ætolians under their leader Dorimachus.——There was another town of this name in Thessaly, in the vicinity of mount Ossa. It is doubtful whether Homer, in alluding to the " wintry Dodona," refers to this place, or to that more famous one of Epirus; but the opinion was extensively received among the later Greeks, that the oracle had been removed from the western to the eastern side of Greece, and that Jupiter delivered his oracles in Thessaly, having abandoned his sacred grove by Tomarus. To this opinion inclined the geographer Pausanias. The remarks which follow, however, apply to the Thesprotian town and oracle. The town and temple were first built by Deucalion, after the universal deluge. It was supposed to be the most ancient oracle of all Greece, and according to the traditions of the Egyptians, mentioned by Herodotus, it was founded by a dove. Two black doves, as he relates, took their flight from the city of Thebes, in Egypt, one of which flew to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and the other to Dodona, where with a human voice they acquainted the inhabitants of the country that Jupiter had consecrated the ground which in future would give oracles. The extensive grove which surrounded Jupiter's temple was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and oracles were frequently delivered by the sacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. This fabulous tradition of the oracular power of the doves is explained by Herodotus, who observes that some Phœnicians carried away two priestesses from Egypt, one of which went to fix her residence at Dodona, where the oracle was established. It may further be observed, that the fable might have been founded upon the double meaning of the word πελειαι, which signifies doves in the most parts of Greece, while in the dialect of the Epirots it implies old women. In ancient times the oracles were delivered by the murmuring of a neighbouring fountain, but the custom was afterwards changed. Large kettles were suspended in the air near a brazen statue, which held a lash in its hand. When the wind blew strong, the statue was agitated, and struck against one of the kettles, which communicated the motion to all the rest, and raised that clattering and discordant din which continued for a while, and from which the artifice of the priests drew their predictions. Some suppose that the noise was occasioned by the shaking of the leaves and boughs of an old oak, which the superstition of the people frequently consulted, and from which they pretended to receive oracles. It may be observed, with more probability, that the oracles were delivered by the priests, who by artfully concealing themselves behind the oaks, gave occasion to the superstitious multitude to believe that the trees were endowed with the power of prophecy. As the ship Argo was built with some of the oaks of the forest of Dodona, there were some beams which gave oracles to the Argonauts, and warned them against the approach of calamity. Within the forests of Dodona there were a stream and a fountain of cool water, which had the power of lighting a torch as soon as it touched it. This fountain was totally dry at noon day, and was restored to its full course at midnight, from which time till the following noon it began to decrease, and at the usual hour was again deprived of its waters. The oracles of Dodona were originally delivered by men, but afterwards by women. (Vid. Dodonides.) Plin. 2, c. 103.—Herodot, 2 c. 57.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—*Homer. Dolīche, I, a town of Thessaly, towards the borders of Macedonia. Here the historian Polybius, at the head of the embassy of the Achæan league, received an audience of the Roman general Quintus Marcius Philippus. It was a town of Livy's Tripolis.——II. a town of Comagene, south of the capital Samosata, upon the mountains. "The name of Doliche is preserved, in that of Doluc, to a castle on a chain of mountains which, detached from Amanus, is prolonged towards the Euphrates." D'Anville.

Dōlonci, a people of Thrace, inhabiting the Chersonese. It was over these people that Miltiades the Athenian was called to rule. Herodot. 6, c. 34.

Dōlōpia. The country of the Dolopes, or Dolopia, was that district of Thessaly which touched upon Epirus, Acarnania, and Ætolia; and was separated from the Ænianes, another Thessalian people on the south, bordering to the east upon the region Phthiotis. The Dolopians are mentioned by Homer as being subject to Pelius, the king of Phthiotis, who placed them in the Trojan war under the conduct and care of the aged Phœnix. The Dolopes were entitled to a representative in the council of the Amphictyons, but on the invasion of Xerxes they were found among the enemies of Greece. Their territory was a continual source and scene of contest between the Ætolians and the Macedonians, and was only fully subdued by the latter in the reign of their last monarch, whose empire was transferred to the Romans.

Dōnȳsa, one of the Cyclades, in the Ægean.

Dorides sinus, an arm of the Ægean Sea, between Doris and the narrow peninsula which terminated on the promontory Cynosema.

Dōres, the inhabitants of Doris. Vid. Doris.

Dorion, a town of Thessaly, where Thamyras the musician challenged the Muses to a trial of skill. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 182.—Propert. 2, el. 22, v. 19.—Lucan. 6, v. 352.

Dōris, a small part of Greece, lying between Thessaly on the north, Ætolia on the west, the country of the Locri Epicnemidii on the east, and the mountain Parnassus on the south. Mythology assigns their origin to Dorus, the son of Deucalion; but criticism derives the names of Dorus, and of many other of the early heroes and colonists of Greece, from the name of the country which they are pretended to have settled. Before the occupation of the narrow territory here described, by the people who were the undoubted progenitors of the later Dorians, it was called Dryopis, from the primitive inhabitants. Long afterwards, from the confederacy of the cities Erineus, Boium, Pindus, and Cytinium, the country was designated the Tetrapolis. The inconsiderable district of Doris offers little matter of interest to the inquirer, but the accounts of the Dorians are full of matter important in the investigation of ancient nations and manners. The dispossessors of the Dryopes were, doubtless, from the Histiæotis in Thessaly, and the Dorians of the Peloponnesus were as certainly the descendants of those who had crossed the Pindus and occupied the mountainous regions of Œta and Parnassus; but their previous migration, and the origin of their peculiar institutions, which were only known to later Greece in their full developement, as the laws of Lycurgus, constitute the difficult, important, and interesting part in the search concerning this singular people. In the time of Hercules, a favour conferred by that hero upon Ægimius or Œpatius, a king of Doris, secured to his descendants an asylum in that kingdom, whence the better fortune of the Pelopidæ obtained the Peloponnesus; and on the return of the Heraclidæ 80 years after the destruction of Troy, a Doric population poured into the southern peninsula, to establish or restore the peculiar habits and institutions of that race. From this period the Peloponnesus, and perhaps, more particularly the territory of Laconia, may be considered the country of the Dorians in Greece. Besides these, the Dorians sent out a great many colonies. The most famous was Doris in Asia Minor, of which Halicarnassus was once the capital; this part of Asia Minor was called Hexapolis, from the confederation of the six principal cities; but on the exclusion of Halicarnassus, it received the name of Pentapolis. That peninsula and cape which extended from the shores of Caria far into the sea between the islands of Cos upon the north and Rhodes on the south, was the country of the Asiatic Dorians. Strab. 9, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 27.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Apollod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 144. l. 8, c. 31.

Doriscus, a place of Thrace near the sea, where Xerxes numbered his forces. Herodot. 7, c. 59.

Dŏrÿlæum, and Dorylæus, a city of Phrygia, now Eski Shehr. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Cic. Flacc. 17.

Drangiana, a port of the Persian empire, in the province of Aria in the largest extent of that district. It had upon the south the Betii montes, on the east Arachoisa, on the north the Paropamisus mons, and the desert of Carmania on the west.

Dravus, a river of Rhætia, that, running almost parallel with the Danube, united with that river at that point at which, after its southward inclination, it resumes an easterly course on the southern border of the country belonging to the Jazyges Metanastæ. In its course it flowed through Noricum and Pannonia, between the Claudius mons and the mons Pannonius. In modern geography it is the Drave, and, after flowing through Stiria, it passes by the southwestern boundary of Hungary, which it separates from Croatia and Sclavonia, and falls into the Danube below Essek.

Drĕpăna, and Drĕpănum, now Trapani, a town of Sicily near mount Eryx. Anchises died there in his voyage to Italy with his son Æneas. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 707.—Cic. Verr. 2, c. 56.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 474.——The same name was given, according to D'Anville, to a promontory in the Sinus Arabicus, north of Myos-Hormus. In both cases the name was derived from the form of the coast, which presented the figure of a scythe.

Drilo, a river which separated the Roman Illyricum from that part of Macedon which, before it formed a part of the Macedonian kingdom, was occupied by an Illyrian people. It emptied into the Adriatic near the town of Lissus, on the side of Macedon. Two principal branches, the one north, from the Bertiscus mountains in Illyricum, and the other south, from the Palus Lychnites and the Candavii montes, contributed to form this largest of the Illyrian streams. The modern name of this river is Drino, the northern branch being called the White, and the southern, the Black, Drino. The confluence of these branches was on the boundary line mentioned above, and towards the province of Dacia Mediterranea, and Dardania. To this point the river was considered navigable. The whole course of this stream, together with both its branches, belongs now to Albania. Strab.—Diod. Sic.

Drinus, a river, now the Drin, which separated the province of Mœsia from Illyricum, and flowing almost directly north, discharged itself into the Savus west of Sirmium. This river now bounds upon the west the province of Servia, which it separates from Bosnia.

Dromos Achillei. "Between the mouth of the Borysthenes and the gulf of Carcine, the long and narrow beaches uniting and terminating in a point, and thereby forming inlets or creeks, were called Dromos Achillei, or the Course of Achilles, from a tradition that this hero there celebrated games." D'Anville.

Druentius, and Druentia, now Durance, a rapid river of Gaul, which falls into the Rhone, between Arles and Avignon. Sil. Ital. 3, v. 468.—Strab. 4.

Druna, the Drome, a river of Gaul, falling into the Rhone.

Dryŏpes, a people of Greece, near mount Œta. They afterwards passed into the Peloponnesus, where they inhabited the towns of Asine and Hermione in Argolis. When they were driven from Asine by the people of Argos, they settled among the Messenians, and called a town by the name of their ancient habitation Asine. Some of their descendants went to make a settlement in Asia Minor together with the Ionians. Herodot. 1, c. 146, l. 8, c. 31.—Paus. 4, c. 34.—Strab. 7, 8, 13.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—*Virg. Dubis, or Alduadubis, a river of Gaul in the Maxima Sequanorum. It rose in the Jura chain of mountains, and emptied in the Arar, on the borders of the Celtic province of Lugdunensis. The modern name is Le Doubs.

Dulichium, an island of the Ionian Sea, opposite the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the group called Echinades. The exact position of this island cannot be determined; some have confounded it with Cephallenia; but Strabo contradicts this, and makes it a separate island, styled, in his time, Dolicha, "situated at the mouth of the Achelous, opposite to Œniadæ, and 100 stadia from cape Araxus." Others have supposed this to be another name for Ithaca, from the epithet Dulichius applied to Ulysses; but it is more probable that this was an adjacent island, forming part of the kingdom of that chief. To assign a modern name to an island whose position was a matter of uncertainty as far back as the time of Strabo, is assuredly assuming a great deal; but if conjecture may be hazarded, that of Mr. Dodwell, who thinks Dulichium may have been swallowed up by an earthquake seems to be the safest. Odyss. A. 246, Π. 247.—Strab. 10, 456 and 458.—Cram.—*Heylin. Durius, a large river of ancient Spain, now called Duero, which, rising in Carpetania near the Pyrenees, runs through the plains of Spain, and then dividing Gallicia from Lusitania, and receiving very many rivers, falls into the ocean after a course of about 300 miles. Near the sources of this river stands Numantia. Vid. Numantia. Voss. in Pomp. Mela.

Durocasses, the chief residence of the Druids in Gaul, now Dreux. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 13.

Durocortŏrum, the chief town of the Remi, from whom it receives its modern name of Rheims. Strabo says the Roman prefects of Belgic Gaul resided here; whence we infer it was the metropolis of that province. Strab. 4, 194.—Cæs. 6, 44.

Dymæ, or Dyme, a city of Achaia, situated on the Ionian Sea about 40 stadia west of the mouth of the Pierus. According to Pausanias it was more anciently called Palea. Strabo, (8, 387,) thinks that the name Dyme referred to its western situation, and declares that it was formerly called Stratos. Dyme, after its inhabitants had expelled the tyrant Alexander, became one of the principal cities in Achaia. Its territory was frequently laid waste, in the Social War, by the Eleans and Ætolians, who were united against the Achæans. In the suburbs of this city was the tomb of Sostratus, a companion of Hercules, much venerated by the inhabitants; within the city were temples sacred to Minerva, Cybele, and Attes. Dyme was given up to plunder by Olympicus, a Roman general, for having refused to take part with that people against Philip of Macedon. There is no modern town on the exact site of the ancient Dyme; but Palæo Achaia is within a short distance. Strab. 8, 387.—Diod. Sic. 18, 707.—Polyb. 4, 59.—*Paus. Dyras, a river of Trachinia, twenty stadia south of the Sperchius, said to have sprung from the ground to assist Hercules when burning on the funeral pile. It rises at the foot of mount Œta, and falls into the Sinus Maleacus. Herod. 7, 199.—Strab. 9, 428.—Cram.

Dyrrachium, a town of Illyria, situated on the Hadriatic, nearly opposite Brundusium in Italy. This city was founded by a colony of Corcyreans, B. C. 623, who, in compliment to their mother city, invited Phaleus, a citizen of Corinth, to lead them. According to some writers, and among these Pomponius Mela, Epidamnus was the more ancient name, applied to it by the Greeks, which the Romans changed on account of its evil import. Scaliger thinks that Epidamnus was a city, and Darrachium its harbour; in this supposition, however, he is supported by no other writer. Strabo, Eratosthenes, and other authors, apply the name Dyrrachium to the Chersonese, on which the town was situated; from this fact, and the circumstance of Δυρραχιον being a Greek term denoting ruggedness, we infer that the Greeks gave the name of Dyrrachium to the peninsula on which Epidamnus was situated, and this, in the course of time, may have been confounded with the town. Possessed of every advantage for the promotion of commerce, in its situation at the entrance of the Hadriatic, and its relations with Corinth and Corcyra, notwithstanding the envious hostility of the neighbouring barbarians, it soon rose to such opulence and power as to vie with the most ancient cities of Greece. The difference between this city and Corcyra, arising from the introduction of Corinthian colonists, is intimately connected with the origin of the Peloponnesian war. Pompey encamped on the heights of Petra, in the neighbourhood of this city, after having been forced to retire from Italy; and here Cæsar made an attempt to blockade him, which he frustrated by carrying the war into Thessaly. The possession of this place was of the highest importance to the Romans, as a connecting link between the capital and all the eastern provinces; from this place was the passage to Brundusium, the commencement of the Appia Via; and here began the Via Egnatia (Vid. Egnat. Via), which "may be considered as the main artery of the Roman empire." The site of this city, once so important, is now occupied by what is scarcely more than a village, under the name of Durazzo. *Pomp. E.

Ebelina, the name which Ptolemy gives for the modern Dublin, the capital of Ireland. The Latins called it Dublinium; the Cambro-Britons Dinas Dulin; the Saxons Duplin; and the Irish Balacleigh, i. e. "a town built upon piles." According to tradition, the vicinity of the city being marshy, it received an artificial elevation; whence the name given it by the natives. It was situated on the Auen-Liff, Ammis Lifnius, now the Liffey. Camden.

Eboracum, now York, the chief city of the Brigantes, in the province of Maxima Cæsariensis. It was situated on the river Urus, now the Ouse; and Camden traces the name of the town to that of the river, Eb-oracum or Eb-uracum, as if "the city on the Urus." Nennius calls it Caer Ebrauc; the Britons styled it Caer Effroc. At Eboracum the sixth legion was stationed, and it was a Roman colony. It was the residence of Severus and Constantius Chlorus, both of whom terminated their lives there. Camden.

Ebudæ, the Greek name for the Hebrides, as Pliny calls them, now the Western Isles. The principal were Ricina, otherwise called Ricnea, or Riduna, Epidium, Maleos, Ebuda Occidentalior, now Skie, and Ebuda Orientalior, now Lewes. Ptolemy enumerated but five; Pliny states the number to have been 30. Camden.

Eburones, a people of Belgic Gaul, whom Cæsar describes as chiefly dwelling between the Meuse and the Rhine. To the north they had the Menapii; to the east, the Germans, who dwelt this side the Rhine; to the south, the Condrusi; and to the west, the Aduatici and the Ambivariti; their territory accordingly corresponds with the modern pays de Liége. Cæsar, to avenge the defeat of Sabinus and Cotta, exterminated this people; afterwards the Tungri, who are not mentioned by Cæsar, a branch of the Aduatici, took possession of the vacant region; whence the names of the Tungri and Eburones are frequently confounded. Lem.

Ebusus, now Ivica, one of the Pityusæ, or Pine Islands, lying between the main land of Hispania and the Baleares Insulæ, and opposite the promontory of Ferraria in Valentia. This island abounded in corn and all kind of fruits. Its chief town was Ebusus, now Yvica, whose inhabitants made a large quantity of salt annually, which they exported to Spain and Italy. Heyl. Cosm.

Ecbatana, (orum,) I. the chief city of Media Major, and the capital of the whole kingdom, situated, according to Diodorus, at a distance of 12 stadia from mount Orontes. According to D'Anville, Hamadan occupies the site of the ancient city. "It is of as great antiquity as Babylon; for we find that Semiramis, the wife of Ninus, in a war made against the Medes who had then rebelled, taking an affection to the place, caused water-courses to the made to it from the further side of the mountain Orontes, digging a passage through the hills with great charge and labour. Destroyed by the injury of time, it was re-edified by Dejoces, the sixth king of the Medes; and afterwards much beautified and enlarged by Seleucus Nicanor, successor unto Alexander in his Asian conquests. For beauty and magnificence little inferior to Babylon or Nineveh. In compass 180 or 200 furlongs, which make about 24 Italian miles. The walls thereof affirmed, in the book of Judith, to be 70 cubits high, 50 cubits broad, and the towers upon the gates 100 cubits higher; all built of hewn and polished stone, each stone being six cubits in length and three in breadth. But this is to be understood only of the innermost wall, there being seven in all about it; each of them higher than the other, and each distinguished by the colour of the several pinnacles; which gave unto the eyes a most gallant prospect. From which variety of colours it is thought to have the name of Agbatha, or Agbathana. In former times the ordinary residence of the monarchs of the Medes and Persians in the heats of the summer; as Susa, the chief city of Susiana, in the cold of winter. The royal palace, being about a mile in compass, was built with all the cost and cunning that a stately mansion did require; some of the beams thereof of silver, and the rest of cedar; but those of cedar, strengthened with plates of gold. Said by Josephus to be built by the prophet Daniel; which must be understood no otherwise than that he oversaw the workmen or contrived the model; appointed to that office by Darius Medus, to whom the building of the same is ascribed by others. Neglected by the kings of the Parthian race, it became a ruin." Heyl. Cosm.—Chaussard.——II. A town of Syria, where Cambyses gave himself a mortal wound when mounting on horseback. Herodot. 3.—Ptol. 6, c. 2.—Curt. 5, c. 8.

Echinădes, or Echinæ, islands near Acarnania, at the mouth of the river Achelous. They have been formed by the inundations of that river, and by the sand and mud which its waters carry down. "These rocks, as they should rather be termed, were known to Homer, who mentions them as being inhabited, and as having sent a force to Troy under the command of Meges, a distinguished warrior of the Iliad. Herodotus informs us, that in his time half of these islands had been already joined by the Achelous to the main land. Strabo reports that the Echinades were very numerous, being all rugged and barren; Scylax, indeed, says they were deserted; but this was not always the case according to Homer's account, and Stephanus names Apollonia as a town belonging to one of those islands, on the coast of Acarnania. Ovid reckons five; but Pliny enumerates nine. 'The Echinades,' says Mr. Dodwell, 'at present belong to the inhabitants of Ithaca, and produce corn, oil, and a scanty pasture for sheep and goats. The names of some of the largest are Oxiai, Natoliko, Bromma, &c. There are a great many other smaller rocks scattered about, which are entirely deserted.'" Cram.—Plin. 2, c. 85.—Herodot. 2, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 588.—Strab. 2.

Echinussa, an island near Eubœa, called afterwards Cimolus. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Edessa, I. a town in Osroene, a district of Mesopotamia, which received its name from the Macedonian conquerors of the country. "An abundant fountain which the city enclosed, called in Greek Calir-rhoe, communicated this name to the city itself. In posterior times it is called Roha, or, with the article of the Arabs, Orrhoa, and by abbreviation Orha. This name may be derived from the Greek term signifying a fountain; or, according to another opinion, it may refer to the founder of this city, whose name is said to have been Orrhoi; but, however this be, it is by corruption that it is commonly called Orfa. A little river, which, by its sudden inundations, annoys this town, was called Scirtus, or the Vaulter; and the Syrians preserve this signification in the name of Daisar." D'Anville.——II. A city of Macedonia. Vid. Ædessa.

Edon, a mountain of Thrace, called also Edonus. From this mountain that part of Thrace is often called Edonia which lies between the Strymon and the Nessus, and the epithet is generally applied not only to Thrace, but to a cold northern climate. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 325.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Lucan. 1, v. 674.

Edoni, or Edones, a people of Thrace, on the left bank of the Strymon. "It appears from Thucydides, that this Thracian clan once held possession of the right bank of the Strymon as far as Mygdonia, but that they were ejected by the Macedonians." Cram.—Thuc. 2, 99.

Egeria Vallis, "a small valley, now called la Caffarella, and which, according to the popular opinion, answers to the valley of Egeria, while the source of the Almo is thought to correspond with the fountain sacred to that nymph, according to Juv. Sat. 3, v. 10.

Substitit ad veteres arcus madidamque Capenam;
Hic, ubi nocturnæ Numa constituebat amicæ."

Egesta, a town of Sicily. Vid. Ægesta.

Egnātia, a town of Apulia, "which communicated its name to the consular way that followed the coast from Canusium to Brundusium. Its ruins are still apparent near the Torre d'Agnazzo and the town of Monopoli. Pliny states that a certain stone was shown at Egnatia which was said to possess the property of setting fire to wood that was placed upon it. It was this prodigy, seemingly, which afforded so much amusement to Horace." Cram.—Horat. Sat. 1, 5.——Via. Vid. Via.

Eion, a commercial place at the mouth of the Strymon, distant 25 stadia from Amphipolis, of which it was the port, according to Thucydides, who makes it more ancient than that city. "It was from hence that Xerxes sailed to Asia on his return from Greece, after the battle of Salamis. In the middle ages a Byzantine town was built on the site of Eion, which now bears the name of Contessa. Cram.—Thuc. 4, 102.—Herod. 8, 118.—Paus. 8, c. 8.

Elæa, a town of Æolia, in Asia Minor, at the mouth of the Caicus. It was the port of Pergamus, and is now Ialea. D'Anville.

Elæus, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus, a colony of Teos, in Ionia, according to Scymnus. Liv, 31, c. 16, l. 32, c. 9.

Elatēa, I. "the most considerable and important of the Phocian cities after Delphi, was situated, according to Pausanias, 180 stadia from Amphicæa, on a gently rising slope, above the plain watered by the Cephissus. It was captured and burnt by the army of Xerxes; but being afterwards restored, an attack made on it by Taxilus, general of Mithridates, was successfully repulsed by the inhabitants; in consequence of which exploit they were declared free by the Roman senate. Strabo remarks on its advantageous situation, which commanded the entrance into Phocis and Bœotia. Its ruins are to be seen on the site called Elephta, on the left bank of the Cephissus, and at the foot of some hills which unite with the chain of Cnemis and Œta."—Cram.—Paus. Phoc. 34.—Herod. 8, 33.—Liv. 32, 18.—Strab. 9.——II. A town of Thessaly, situated on the Peneus above Gonnus. It is, doubtless, the Iletia of Pliny and the Iletium of Ptolemy.

ELAVER, a river in Gaul falling into the Loire, now the Allier.

ELEA. Vid. Velia.

ELECTRIDES, islands in the Adriatic Sea, which received their name from the quantity of amber (electrum) which they produced. They were at the mouth of the Po, according to Apollonius of Rhodes, but some historians doubt of their existence. D'Anville places the Electrides Insulæ in the Baltic, near the Sarmatian coast, and identifies them with the long and narrow sands that separate the gulfs named Frisch-haf and Curisch-haf. Tacitus tells us that the amber was gathered here by the natives, who called it Glass or Gles, which in Latin is Succinum and in Greek Electron. D'Anville.—Tacit. German.—Plin. 2, c. 26, l. 37, c. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

ELEI, a people of Elis in Peloponnesus. They were formerly called Epei. Vid. Elis.

ELEONTUM, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus.

ELEPHANTINE, an island of the Nile, with a town of the same name, distant but half a stadium from Syene and seven stadia below the lesser cataract. According to Russell, this island is much richer in architectural remains than Syene. "Romans and Saracens, it is true," observes that able writer, "have done all in their power to deface or to conceal them; but, as Denon remarks, the Egyptian monuments continue devoted to posterity, and have resisted equally the ravages of man and of time. In the midst of a vast field of bricks and other pieces of baked earth, a very ancient temple is still left standing, surrounded with a pilastered gallery and two columns in the portico. Nothing is wanting but two pilasters on the left angle of this ruin. Other edifices had been attached to it at a later period, but only some fragments were remaining which could give an idea of their form when perfect; proving only that these accessory parts were much larger than the original sanctuary. Could this be the temple of Cneph, the good genius, that one of all the Egyptian gods who approaches the nearest to our ideas of the Supreme Being? Or is it the temple of this deity which is placed 600 paces further to the north, having the same form and size, though more in ruins; all the ornaments of which are accompanied by the serpent, the emblem of wisdom and eternity, and peculiarly that of the god now named?" Russell's Egypt.

ELEUSINIUM, an Athenian temple of Ceres and Proserpine. Vid. Athenæ.

ELEUSIS, a town of Attica, on the way between Megara and Athens, about 13 miles distant from the former and 15 from the latter. "It derived its name from a hero, whom some affirmed to be the son of Mercury, but others, of Ogyges." Its origin is certainly of the highest antiquity, as we find it contending with Athens for the supremacy under Eumolpus, in the reign of Erechtheus. The war was amicably concluded, Athens and Eleusis being united as one government under Erechtheus and his descendants, whilst the priesthood was confined to the Eumolpidæ, and the worship of Ceres adopted by the Athenians. "The temple of Eleusis was burnt by the Persian army in the invasion of Attica, but was rebuilt under the administration of Pericles, by Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon. Strabo states that the mystic cell of this celebrated edifice was capable of containing as many persons as a theatre. A portico was afterwards added by Demetrius Phalereus, who employed for that purpose the architect Philo. Within the temple was a colossal statue of Ceres, the bust of which was removed in 1802 by Dr. Clarke, and brought to England. This magnificent structure was entirely destroyed by Alaric, A. D. 396, and has ever since remained in ruins. Eleusis, though so considerable and important a place, was classed among the Attic demi. It belonged to the tribe Hippothoontis. Eleusis, now called Lesina, is an inconsiderable village, inhabited by a few Albanian Christians. The Thriasian plain formed part of the Eleusinian district; another portion was designated by the name of Rarius Campus. It was in this plain that Ceres was first said to have sown corn." Cram. Dr. Clarke describes as follows the most prominent objects that present themselves to the traveller on approaching Eleusis: "Arriving upon the site of the city of Eleusis, we found the plain to be covered with ruins. The first thing we noticed was an aqueduct, part of which is entire. Six complete arches are yet to be seen. It conducted toward the Acropolis, by the temple of Ceres. The remains of this temple are more conspicuous than those of any other structure except the aqueduct. The paved road which led to it is also visible, and the pavement of the temple yet remains. But, to heighten the interest with which we regarded the relics of the Eleusinian fane, and to fulfil the sanguine expectations we had formed, the fragment of a colossal statue, mentioned by many authors as that of the goddess herself, appeared in colossal majesty among the mouldering vestiges of her once splendid sanctuary." In relation to the name of this place, Faber, who discovers in the mysteries of Ceres the arkite worship, thus writes: "As for the city Eleusis, the principal seat of the mysteries of Ceres, it is said to have derived its name from the hero Eleusis. This fabulous personage was by some esteemed the offspring of Mercury and Daïra, daughter of Oceanus; while by others he was believed to have been the son of Ogyges. Both these genealogies manifestly refer to the diluvian idolatry, which was inseparably interwoven with the orgies of the Eleusinian Ceres." Faber's Cabiri.— Cram.— Clarke's Travels.—Paus.—Strab.

ELEUTHERÆ, a town situated "on the road from Eleusis to Platæa, which appears to have once belonged to Bœotia, but finally became included within the limits of Attica. Pausanias reports that the Eleutherians were not conquered by the Athenians, but voluntarily united themselves to that people, from their constant enmity to the Thebans. Bacchus is said to have been born in this town. Eleutheræ was already in ruins when Pausanius visited Attica. This ancient site probably corresponds with that now called Gypto Castro, where modern travellers have noticed the ruins of a considerable fortress, situated on a steep rock, and apparently designed to protect the pass of Cithæron." Cram.—Strab. 9.—*Paus. Eleuthĕros, a river of Syria, falling into the Mediterranean on the northern confines of Phœnicia. Plin. 9, c. 10.

Elimea, or Elymiotis, a district of Macedonia, east of Stymphalia. This rugged country, important in a political view, notwithstanding its sterility, from its affording a passage either into Epirus or Thessaly, was divided from the latter by the Cambunii montes; while the chain of Pindus, extending north with the name of Canalovii, confined it on the west. The Haliacmon flowed through this obscure, and, perhaps, not yet well defined region. Liv. 42, c. 53, l. 45, c. 30.

Elis, a principal division of the Peloponnesus, consisting of the three smaller parts of Elis proper, Pisatis, and Triphylia. This important country of southern Greece, lying west of Arcadia, had on the north the Larissus, which separated it from Achaia; and on the south the Neda, on the boundary of Messenia; the whole of its western border lying upon the Ægean. In the earliest ages to which the historical accounts may be traced, and even to a period much later, the people of this district were separated into various little republics, of which, for a long time, it would not be easy to name one as the principal. The Caucones were, however, the most ancient; and there are authorities which would lead us to believe that at an early period the whole of Elis bore the name of Cauconia. The Epei were also an early race, regarded by Pausanias as indigenous. This part of the peninsula, including the city of Elis itself, was called the country of the Epii for a long time after the Trojan war and the establishment of the Dorians in the Peloponnesus. The Ætolian Oxylus, at the latter epoch, fixed himself with many of his countrymen in Elis, not yet known as a whole province by that name. In the time of Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonian Elis, properly so called, was governed by Iphitus, a descendant of Oxylus; and by this prince, after they had been neglected for many years, were revived the Olympic games. The right to Olympia, in which these games were celebrated, was long contested by the Eleans and the Pisatæ; but in the end, as the former gradually extended their authority over the whole country from the Neda to the Larissus, their right to all power and authority in this favoured city, and to the pre-eminence in these national games, remained undisputed and undisturbed. In the Persian and in the Peloponnesian wars, Elis was found in the same cause as Sparta, against the enemies of Greece and of the Peloponnesus, but it could not be induced to join in the Achæan league. It was not till the time of the Persian invasion that the city of Elis became the capital of the province which then bore the same name. About that time a great number of scattered but neighbouring villages uniting, formed the city, which thenceforth increased with astonishing rapidity. As the whole territory was deemed sacred, it was not thought necessary to defend the city by walls; and all who crossed this privileged territory were obliged to yield up their arms, which on the frontiers were restored to them. The city of Elis stood towards the northern part of the country, on the river Peneus; its ruins are now called Palæopoli. In the country comprised within the boundaries of Elis in its greatest extent, were, at very early periods, the kingdom of Pelops, including the territories of Pisa and Olympia, and the later, though still ancient dominions of Nestor, the district of Triphylia. The whole of Elis constituted one of the most fertile districts of the Peloponnesus; and the people were addicted to such pursuits and such a mode of life as the cultivation of such a soil would naturally superinduce; they were, perhaps, the most agricultural people of Greece. *Strab.—Paus. Ellopia, a town of Eubœa.——An ancient name of that island.

Elymais, a district in the Persian empire, deriving its name from that of its inhabitants, the Elymai. This name extended over a large part of Susiana, though belonging properly to the mountain region in the north on the confines of Media. On the formation of new empires, after the destruction of that which had existed as the united dominion of the Persian kings, Elymais appears to have erected itself into an independent state, subject to its own kings. It is comprehended in the modern Kurdistan. Strabo.

Emăthia, an ancient name of a large portion of Macedonia, including at one time Pæonia, though in Homer's age the name was confined to the region south of that district, about the Erigon and on the Thermaic gulf. In this part, however, was founded the empire of the Macedonian kings on the arrival of the Temenidæ, who established themselves on the Erygon and founded Ægæ or Edessa, their capital, and the first capital of Macedonia. The name Emathia was long used as a poetical designation of the whole country, not only after it had come to form a narrow portion of it alone, but even after the subversion of the Macedonian throne.—Polyb.—Hom.—Lucan.

Emerĭta. Vid. Augusta.

Emessa, and Emisa, a large town of Syria, now Hems, near the Orontes on the right, and towards the source. It was famous for a temple of the sun, worshipped in those regions under the name of Heliogabalus. An emperor of Rome assumed the name of Heliogabalus from having officiated as priest in this famous temple of that god. Vid. Heliogabalus, Part. II.

Emodi montes, the eastern extremity of the Paropamisus range, extending over the north of India, and between that country and Scythia. All these mountains belong to the Taurus in the greatest extent allowed to that comprehensive range. Vid. Aornos.

Empŏria Punĭca, another name for Byzacium. Its capital at one period was Adrumetum, and near to its northern limits was fought the battle between Scipio and Hannibal, which put an end to the second Punic war, and, in fact, to the Carthaginian empire. Vid. Byzacium.

Emporiæ, a town of Spain in Catalonia, now Ampurias. Liv. 34, c. 9 and 16, l. 26, c. 19.

Eordæa, a district of Macedonia, deriving its name from that of its inhabitants, the Eordi or Eordæi. These people were early dispossessed of their country, which, nevertheless, retained their name ever afterwards. The Lyncestæ bounded on the north the territory of the Eordæi, which had upon the opposite side Elymais or Elymiotis. Xerxes was reinforced by the people of this country, who resorted to his standard on his invasion of southern Greece. Liv. 31, c. 39, l. 33, c. 8, l. 42, c. 53.

Epēi, and Elēi, a people of Peloponnesus. Plin. 4, c. 5. Vid. Elis.

Ephesus, a city of Ionia, built, as Justin mentions, by the Amazons, or by Androchus, son of Codrus, according to Strabo; or by Ephesus, a son of the river Cayster. It is famous for a temple of Diana, which was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. This temple was 425 feet long, and 200 feet broad. The roof was supported by 127 columns, sixty feet high, which had been placed there by so many kings. Of these columns, 36 were carved in the most beautiful manner, one of which was the work of the famous Scopas. This celebrated building was not totally completed till 220 years after its foundation. Ctesiphon was the chief architect. It was burnt on the night that Alexander was born (Vid. Erostratus), and soon after it rose from its ruins with more splendour and magnificence. Alexander offered to rebuild it at his own expense, if the Ephesians would place upon it an inscription which denoted the name of the benefactor. This generous offer was refused by the Ephesians, who observed, in the language of adulation, that it was improper that one deity should raise temples to the other. Lysimachus ordered the town of Ephesus to be called Arsinoe, in honour of his wife; but after his death the new appellation was lost, and the town was again known by its ancient name. Though modern authors are not agreed about the ancient ruins of this once famed city, some have given the barbarous name of Ajasaluc to what they conjecture to be the remains of Ephesus. The words literæ Ephesiæ are applied to letters containing magical powers. Plin. 36, c. 14.—Strab. 12 and 14.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 2, c. 4.—Callim. in Dian.—Ptol. 5.—*Cic. de Nat. Ephyre. It is not easy to ascertain in all cases the particular city referred to when ancient authors speak of Ephyre. In Epirus the town of Cichyrus was more anciently called by this name, being then, perhaps, the capital of the kings of Thesprotia. The place was famous in Homer's age for producing poisonous drugs. Its ruins are supposed to be still discernible about the Acherusian pool, and manifest an antiquity the most remote in the rudeness of their architectural remains. Indeed, Ephyre could not be other than one of the most ancient towns of Greece, as, according to mythological traditions, referring to the obscurest periods, in this city was made the bold attempt of Theseus and Pirithous to carry off Proserpina, the wife of Aidoneus; in other words, the wife of the king. Hom. 1, 259.——Paus. 1, 17.——Cranon, in Thessaly, is believed to have been intended by Homer in his account of the wars of the Ephyri and Phlegyæ. Il. N. 301. It was also a not uncommon name of Corinth.——A town in Elis, the later name of which is not with accuracy known, is also mentioned by Homer. According to Cramer, when this name is mentioned in connexion with that of the Selleis, on which it stood, the Elean town is referred to by Homer; at other times the Ephyre of Thesprotia is to be understood. There were many other places of this name, but all too inconsiderable to require particular notice.

Epidamnus. Vid. Dyrrachium.

Epidaphne, a town of Syria called also Antioch.

Epidaurus, I. a city of Argolis, on the Saronic gulf, the more ancient name of which was Epicarus. But though in the Argian division of the Peloponnesus, Epidaurus was by no means subject to the dominion of Argos, and was always found, on the contrary, in alliance with the Lacedæmonians, the government of this city, with its little state, extending in the environs perhaps about two miles, was decidedly aristocratical; and the administration was confided principally to the care of a select council, consisting of a limited number of persons denominated Artyni. Epidaurus was famous for its breed of horses and its vines, but most of all for its worship of Æsculapius, and the magnificent temple erected to that god in its vicinity. The modern name of the site, and of the few ruins that remain, is Epilhauro.——II. Another town of the same name, and dedicated to the same deity, was in the country of Laconia. This place, which stood exposed to the naval power of Athens upon the coast of the Myrtoan sea, was much and frequently ravaged by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. It was surnamed Limera, and stood at no great distance north of Epidelium. Thuc.—Strab. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 44.—Paus. 3, c. 21.—Mela, 2, c. 3.

Epidium, one of the western isles of Scotland, or the Mull of Cantyre according to Cambden, who describes it as an extensive tract of land, intersected by marshes and swamps in every direction. The name he derives from the Epidii, who inhabited it. Ptolem.

Epiphanea, I. a town of Cilicia, near Issus, now Surpendkar. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Cic. ad Fam. 15, ep. 4.——II. Another of Syria, on the Orontes, between Arethusa and Larissa on the same river. The endeavour to change the name of this town from Hamoth, derived, it was pretended, from Hamoth, the son of Canaan, into Epiphania, in honour of the king of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, was only partially successful; and though the Europeans, and perhaps the Asiatic subjects of that king, were willing to lose the former name in that of their conqueror, the natives and citizens continued to call it Amatha. Hence the modern appellation of Hamal. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Epipŏlæ, a district of Syracuse, on the north side, surrounded by a wall by Dionysius, who, to complete the work expeditiously, employed 60,000 men upon it, so that in 30 days he finished a wall four miles and a quarter long, and of great height and thickness.

Epirus, a large division of Greece, forming the north-western section of that country. The river Æas on the north divided it from Illyria, and the lofty Pindus range intervened to form its boundary on the Thessalian side, including Athamania, however, in the territory of Epirus, as well as Ambracia, which confined upon Acarnania on the south. Considered apart from these smaller districts, the western boundary of Epirus was formed by the river Arachthus. The origin of the Epirotic people is involved in an obscurity more profound than that which envelopes the accounts of southern Greece; and all that can be said of them, is, that, according to Strabo, their early manners, customs, and habits, indicated a common origin for them and their neighbours the Macedonians. The name of Epirus, which signified Mainland, and appears to have been given to this country in contradistinction to the many islands on its coast, included in the boundaries assigned to it above, a great number of others, each of which at the earliest dates represented a separate and independent nation or tribe. Very early, however, the Molossian princes extended their authority over all, and the history of Epirus is, therefore, almost restricted to that of the Molossi. The traditionary account of the rise and advancement of this people refers its origin to a period comparatively late, and assigns to the Molossi, as their first founder, Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus and Andromache. The people of this distant part of Greece make little show in her annals; and when, in the time of the Persian war, we are enabled to form some notion of its state and government, we find them both unequal to the danger of contending with even the smaller Grecian states for power or rank. The first who assumed the title of king of Epirus, having annexed the larger districts of Chaonia, Thesprotia, and perhaps also others, to the crown of Molossia, was Alexander, the brother-in-law of Philip of Macedon and the father-in-law of the still more renowned successor of that prince. Not content with enlarging his dominions at home, Alexander carried his arms into Italy, where, after giving signal proofs of conduct and valour, he was slain before the walls of Pandosia. In the reign of his successors Æacides and Alcetas, Cassander obtained possession of the throne of Epirus; but by the aid of the Illyrian king it was soon after restored to the heir of the last-mentioned sovereign, who proved the greatest of the Epirot princes, and, in the estimation of many, second to none of the most illustrious names of antiquity. This was Pyrrhus (Vid. Pyrrhus), the great enemy of the Romans. In his reign the name of Epirus and her arms became terrible to all the surrounding nations. Italy, Sicily, Macedon, and the Peloponnesus, were successively the objects of his ambition and the witnesses of his prowess and abilities. But though he inspired among the other princes, and among the people of Greece, a new and unusual respect for the name of Epirus, he added little to her territory; and when he was slain in his attempt to reduce the citadel of Argos with a handful of men, he had added almost nothing to the boundaries of his realm. After the reighs of three successors to this prince, the line of his family became extinct, and the Epirots adopted the republican form of government, which they enjoyed until the destruction of the Macedonian kingdom, in which was involved the subversion of their liberties. The Epirots had favoured, in some measure, the views of the Persians in the Macedonian war; and the barbarous policy of the Romans compelled them to exact the bitterest atonement for this ill-judged opposition to the hopes of the usurping republic. The whole of Epirus is included in the modern Albania. Pind. Nem. od. 7, 56.—Thuc.—Liv. 8, 24.—Plut. Pyrrh.—Just.—Polyb.

Equotuticum, now Castel Franco, a little town of Apulia, to which, vs some suppose, Horace alludes in this verse, 1 Sat. 5, v. 87:

Erĕsus, a town of Lesbos, in which Theophrastus was born.

Eretria, a principal town of Eubœa, north of Chalcis, on the Euripus. Various accounts are given of its origin; but as its inhabitants were certainly of Ionic blood, it seems most probable that the writers who deduce them from the Attic demus, which also bore the name of Eretria, were best informed on this particular subject. The Eretrians early became a flourishing people, engaged in many wars of ambition with their rival of Chalcis. They took part in the revolt of the Ionians, who, in the time of Darius, at the instigation of Aristagoras, attempted to throw off the yoke of the Persians. Their city was therefore, like Athens, a particular object of dislike to the eastern monarch; and his orders and preparations were directed with peculiar animosity against the inhabitants. After a six days' siege the city was betrayed into the hands of the enemy, and the citizens were carried away to populate the Asiatic colony of Cissia. On its recovery from this disaster, Eretria deserted or abandoned its alliance with Athens, and was found in league with Sparta against the Athenians. The people being governed by tyrants, according to the ancient use of that term, and consequently entertaining, as was natural, a very small portion of that love of their own institutions which generally distinguished the inhabitants of republican Greece, passed, with very little resistance or care, into the power of Antigonus, and with just as little afterwards into the hands of the Romans. This last event occurred during the Macedonian war. Strab.—Herod.—Diod. Sic.—Liv.—Polyb.

Ericūsa, one of the Lipari isles, now Alicudi.

Eridanus, the name of the Po among the Greeks. It is well known that in the historical ages of Italy and Greece, the Eridanus and the Padus were certainly the same; but it is almost equally certain that the fables of the early poets belonging to the latter country, either did not at all refer to the Po, or were founded upon very indefinite notions of its rise and course. Cluverius, indeed, expresses his opinion that the Po, beside which Phaëton was buried, so far from being the river of Italy, was a northern stream called Rhodaune, and emptying into the Vistula. This would give, perhaps, a northern origin to the fable of his death, and serve to mark the connexion of some at least among the classic fictions with those of the people called Barbarians. The name of the Italian Eridanus, among the early inhabitants of Gaul, was Bodencus. It rose in the mons Vesulus, and running nearly east, was the boundary line between Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul, as far as its confluence with the Ticinus. Here, continuing its course, it left Liguria on the south, and traversing Cisalpine Gaul, divided that part which now constitutes the duchies of Parma and Modena and the Bolognese upon the south, from Lombardy upon the north. On the east, however, as it approached the coast, this noble river, having run a navigable course of almost 250 miles, became again a boundary line, separating Cisalpine Gaul from Venetia. All the waters of the north of Italy, formed from the springs and snows and torrents of the Alps, unite to swell the current of this famous stream. The whole length of this river was computed to be 288 miles, and the number of rivers which paid tribute, through it to the Adriatic, were by Pliny computed at about thirty. The mouths of the Eridanus or Po are thus described by D'Anville; "The nearest to Ravenna derives the name of Spineticum Ostium from a very ancient city founded by the Greeks, called Spina. They applied to it specially the name of Eridanus. This channel was also named Padusa; and at the place where the city of Ferrara is situated, there separates from it a channel named Volena, which preserves this name and communicates it to its mouth. The principal arm of the Po only arrives at the sea by dividing itself into many channels, whose issue was called septim maria, the seven seas." Cic. in Orat. 145.—*Claudian. de Cons. ERĬGŎNUS, a river of Thrace.

ERINDES, a river of Asia, near Parthia. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 16.

ERŸMANTHUS, I. a ridge of mountains in Arcadia, now the Olonos, considered one of the most elevated in Greece. It was one of that range, which, under the name of Scollis, Erymanthus, Aroanii, Colossa, &c. stretched across the Peloponnesus, south of Achaia, Sicyonia, and Corinthia, from the Ionian to the Myrtoan sea. In poetry this mountain is famed for the ferocious boar which haunted its wilds; and whose death was one of the exploits of Hercules.——II. A river of the same name, now the Dagana, flowed from this mountain, passed near the town of Psophis at the confluence of the Arvanius, and emptied into the Alpheus below the mouth of the Ladon on the borders of Elis. *Hom. ERYTHEA. Though this place, the scene of Hercules' victory over Geryon, is universally allowed to have been an island, it is by no means easy to ascertain precisely what one is intended when Erythea is named. According to Vossius it was a small island at the mouth of the Anas. Here he thinks the first Phœnician colony to have settled itself before the founding of Gades; and ancient vestiges remaining in the place make manifest that it was once inhabited, although so insignificant in modern times as not to be distinguished by a name. Mela, 3, 6.—*Voss. ad Pomp. ERŸTHRÆ, I. a town of Ionia, opposite Chios, once the residence of a Sybil. It was built by Neleus, the son of Codrus. Paus. 10, c. 12.—Liv. 44, c. 28, l. 38, c. 39.——II. A town of Bœotia. Id. 6, c. 21.——III. One in Libya.——IV. Another in Locris.

ERŸTHREUM MARE. The Red Sea of the ancients did not correspond to the sea which the moderns have designated by that name. In antiquity, from having entertained a very vague and indefinite notion of this sea, to which they ascribed a vast extent, the Greek and Latin geographers came to signify, at last, by Erythreum Mare, the Arabian sea, which washes the coasts of Arabia and of Persia, and into which the modern Red sea, with them the Sinus Arabicus, discharges itself. The Sinus Persicus, or Persian gulf, on the eastern side of Arabia, was also included by the ancients in the Mare Erythreum. The etymology of the word is so uncertain, that it cannot be yet established whether this sea received its name from the colour of its waters, or from the name of an individual or from that of a country. Curt. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 6, c. 23.—Herodot. 1, c. 180 and 189, l. 3, c. 93, l. 4, c. 37.—Mela, 3, c. 8.

ERYX, a mountain in the island of Sicily, on which was a city of the same name, and a temple dedicated to Venus Erycina. The mountain arose in the north-eastern corner of the island, over the promontory of Drepanum.

ESQUILIÆ, and ESQUILĪNUS MONS, one of the seven hills of Rome, which was joined to the city by king Tullus. Birds of prey generally came to devour the dead bodies of criminals who had been executed there, and thence they were called Esquilinæ alites. EUBŒA, the largest island in the Ægean Sea, extending from the Malaic gulf on the south of Thessaly, as far as the latitude of Athens, along the coasts of Locris, Bœotia, and Attica. The following is a description of the island in outline from Pliny, according to the translation of Cramer. "Torn from the coast of Bœotia, it is separated by the Euripus, the breadth of which is so insignificant as to allow a bridge to be thrown across. Of its two southern promontories, Geræstus looks towards Attica, Caphareus to the Hellespont; Cenæum fronts the north.

In breadth this island never exceeds twenty miles; but it is nowhere less than two. Reaching from Attica to Thessaly, it extends for 120 miles in length. Its circuit is 365 miles. On the side of Caphareus it is 225 miles from the Hellespont." The earliest name by which the Greeks designated this important tract of country was Macris, referring to its disproportionate length; and Oche, Ellopia, Asopis, and Abantia, were also names by which it was frequently denominated. Its inhabitants are always called, in Homer, Abantes, though, from their early skill and boldness on the seas, they were considered by some to have been of Phœnician origin. The traditional account of the later name of Eubœa derives it from the passage of Io, who is said to have given birth to Epaphus in this island. The Abantes established colonies in Illyria, Sicily, Italy, and Asia Minor. As every city either of note or magnitude in Eubœa pretended to an entire independence it is impossible to sketch a general history of the changes which took place in the political geography of the island; the Chalcidians and Eretrians inhabiting the principal towns, however, by their jealousies and their wars gave a pretext to the people of the main land and the peninsula for interfering in the affairs of the island, and uniting all, if not in a common slavery, yet in a common subjection to a foreign influence. Accordingly, in the time that intervened between the Persian and the Peloponnesian wars, we find the Athenian authority and supremacy acknowledged over the whole of Eubœa, which only recovered its independence in the 21st year of the latter celebrated war. Its vicissitudes became from this moment frequent; and we find the Eubœans returning almost to the rule of the Athenians, attaching themselves to the Macedonian interest, or swallowed up in its empire, and finally restored by a decree of the senate and people of Rome to a nominal liberty. When Eubœa arose to great opulence and commercial prosperity, we may infer that she must have held no inconsiderable place among the trading nations of antiquity, from the value and universal currency of the Eubœan talent, known in every country as the Euboicum. The soil of this island has been compared for its fertility to that of the fruitful Cyprus; but, at least in ancient times, this enviable advantage was greatly diminished by the frequency of earthquakes, to which it was subject. The modern name of Negropont is supposed to be the result of many corruptions by gradual transition from the Euripus. Hom. B. 536.—Paus.—Strab. The lapse of ages and the oppression of the Turks have not been able to contend with the natural fertility and productiveness of the island. Corn and wine are still produced there in abundance, and numerous flocks are dispersed over its wide-spreading pastures. Its valleys, which centuries ago were covered by the trees of the forest, are still enclosed by their branches and shaded by their luxuriant foliage. The Euripus is now crossed by a bridge, that joins the island to the eastern shores of Greece.

Evēnus, a river of Ætolia, which, rising in the country of the Bomienses in the north-eastern part of Ætolia, flows through the country of the ancient Calydon, after which it takes a westerly course towards the plains of ancient Pleuron, and then turning to the south, falls into the Ionian Sea near the entrance to the Corinthiacus Sinus. The more ancient name of this river was Lycormas; its modern name is Fidara. On the banks of this stream Hercules is said to have slain the centaur Nessus, for attempting to offer violence to Dejanira. It receives its name from Evenus, son of Mars and Sterope, who, being unable to overcome Idas, who had promised him his daughter Marpessa in marriage if he surpassed him in running, grew so desperate that he threw himself into the river, which afterwards bore his name. Strab. 10, 451.—Cram.—*Ovid. Euergētæ, a nation of Drangiana, called also Ariaspæ, from their chief city Ariaspe, situated at the foot of mount Becius. The name Euergetæ is a Greek translation of the Persian term applied to this nation by Cyrus for the assistance they rendered him in his Scythian expedition.

Eugānei, one of the most ancient nations of Italy, as their name denotes, inhabiting that district subsequently called Venetia, from the Veneti, who expelled the original possessors, the Euganei. After being driven from their ancient abodes, they settled on the borders of the lakes Benacus and Sebinus, and in the neighbouring valleys. Cram.—Liv. 1, 1.

Eupatoria, a town of Pontus, on the Iris, "at its confluence with the Lycus; begun by Mithridates under the name of Eupatoria, it received from Pompey, who finished it, the name of Magnopolis. It appears to be that now called Tcheniketh." D'Anville.

Euphrates, a river of Asia, which rises in Armenia, and, forming in its course the western boundary of Mesopotamia, empties into the Persian gulf. "The Euphrates takes its rise from several sources; two branches in particular dispute the honour of being the principal; one, not far distant from the town of Bayazid," the ancient Ligua, "in the mountains named Ala-Dag, anciently the mountain Abus of which Ararat makes a part. This river, which bears the name of Murad, disappears under ground at a distance of four hours' travelling from Bayazid. It re-appears, and receives near Melaskerd," the ancient Mauro-Castrum, "another river of this name, and traverses all the district of Turuberan, the southern part of Armenia proper." In its passage through this country it receives the Telaboas, which the ten thousand met with between the sources of the Tigris and their passage of the Euphrates. Continuing its course towards the west, the Euphrates meets its other branch, which forms the eastern boundary of Armenia Minor, a little below Arabrace, Arabkir. The stream is formed by the junction of a small river, which rises near Arze, Erzroom, with the Lycus, whose sources are called in the country Bing-gheul, or the Thousand Fountains. These two rivers united do not equal the Murad, which Xenophon considers the real Euphrates. The Frat and Murad enclose the district Acilisene, whose apex is the point of junction. The river, now very considerable, descends towards the south, receiving the Arsanias, now Arsen, a stream which flows through the district of Sophene; although the name of Arsanias is not unfrequently applied to the Murad, which is doubtless the Euphrates crossed by the ten thousand, and "the same that Corbulo, charged with the conduct of the war in Armenia under Nero, makes issue from a district called Caranites, according to the report of Pliny. A little below" its junction with the Arsen, "and at a place of the same name, with the Elegia, or Ilija, near Erzroom, the Euphrates pierces the chain of mount Taurus; and this place is now called the Pass of Nushar." (D'Anville.) Having passed this, it winds along an elevated plain, but soon meeting with a fresh inequality of ground, forms a double cataract twenty-two miles above Samosata, or Semisat, the capital of Comagene, which is situated at the apex of a great parabola, by which this river, which hitherto appears to direct its course to the Mediterranean, turns suddenly towards the east and south. "In proportion as the Tigris and Euphrates approach one another, the intermediate land loses its elevation, and it is occupied by meadows and morasses. Several artificial communications, perhaps two or three that are natural, form a prelude to the approaching junction of the rivers, which finally takes place near Korna. The river formed by their junction is called Shat-al-Arab, or the river of Arabia. It has three principal mouths, besides a small outlet; these occupy a space of 36 miles. The southernmost is the deepest and freest in its current: Bars of sand formed by the river, and which change in their form and situation, render the approach dangerous to the mariner. The tide, which rises above Bassora, and even beyond Korna, meeting with violence the downward course of the stream, raises its waters in the form of frothy billows. Some of the ancients described the Euphrates as losing itself in the lakes and marshes to the south of Babylon; others consider the river formed by the union of the two as entitled to a continuation of the name of Euphrates. According to some, the Euphrates originally entered the sea as a separate river, the course of which the Arabs stopped up by a mound. This last opinion has been in some measure revived by a modern traveller (Niebuhr), who supposes that the canal of Naar-Sares, proceeding from the Euphrates on the north of Babylon, is continued without interruption to the sea. The bay called Khore-Abdallah would, according to this hypothesis, represent the ancient mouth of the river; but this bay existed in the time of Ptolemy under the name of the Sinus Mesanites. With regard to the canal Nahr-Sares, it appears for certain to rejoin the river near Semawé. The dry bed corresponding to the gulf of Khore-Abdallah, and on which we find the remains of the old city of Bassora, terminates in the Euphrates a little to the west of Korna. The Pallocopas, or the canal of Koufa, seems to extend no farther than the lakes on the south of Babylon. The continual changes to which this flat and movable ground is subject, the inundations of the rivers, and the works of human labour, concur to render the solution of these points impossible. There is also some uncertainty respecting the relative size of the Tigris and Euphrates. This last, certainly, has the largest course, but weakened by drains; it presents at Hilleh a width not exceeding 420 feet; while the Tigris at Bagdat is more than 600. The inhabitants of the country, in order to irrigate their lands, dam up both the one and the other with dykes, which the historians of Alexander have, in their simplicity, mistaken for military bulwarks intended to check the progress of the Arabian pirates up the river. The Euphrates and the Tigris deposit no slime like the Nile; yet these natural irrigations are sufficient to make the fields of Bagdat the garden of Asia." (Malte-Brun.) The Euphrates is the Perah of the Old Testament. Arrian. 7, 7.—Mela, 3, 8.—Plin. 5, 26; 6, 27.—Strab. 2, 2, 130; 15, 1060.—D'Anville.

EUPHRATESIA, or EUPHRATENSIS, a name given to Comagene when a Roman province.

EURIPUS, a narrow strait which separates the island of Eubœa from the coast of Bœotia. Its flux and reflux, which continued regular during 18 or 19 days, and were uncommonly unsettled the rest of the month, was a matter of deep inquiry among the ancients; and it is said that Aristotle threw himself into it because he was unable to find out the causes of that phenomenon. Liv. 28, c. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Strab. 9. The frequency of the currents, or rather of eddies, in this narrow channel, induced many among the ancients to believe that the tide ebbed and flowed through it more frequently than upon the open coast; and some of them maintained that this occurred no less than seven times during the day, and as many during the night. The effect of the wind upon this confined channel was sometimes such as to give it the appearance of a wild mountain torrent.

EURŌPA, one of the three grand divisions of the earth known among the ancients. It is bounded on the east by the Ægean Sea, Hellespont, Euxine, Palus Mæotis, and Tanais in a northern direction. The Mediterranean divides it from Africa on the south, and on the west and north it is washed by the Atlantic and Northern oceans. It is supposed to receive its name from Europa, who was carried there by Jupiter. Mela, 2, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 3, v. 275.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 222. Malte-Brun gives the following table of distances from various points or extremities of this continent, containing an area of 500,000 square miles, and a population of 200,000,000. Length from Cape St. Vincent to the Ural mountains near Ekaterineburg, 1215 leagues; from Brest to Astracan, 860. Breadth across the Spanish peninsula, from Cadiz to Cape Ortegal, 210 leagues; from Port Verdre to Bayonne, (the narrowest part) along the line of the Pyrenees, 95 leagues; from the Black Sea to the Baltic, 268; from the Caspian to the White Sea, 485: and from Cape Malapan, the ancient Tænarum, in Greece, to Cape North, the greatest breadth of Europe, 870 leagues. Not all, nor even the greatest part, of the country lying within these several points was accurately known to the people of antiquity, though the boundaries given above demonstrate, that, except upon the north, they must have had a generally correct notion of its extent and limits.

The strict and accurate acquaintance of the Greeks and Romans extended hardly beyond the limits of the Dnieper and Dwina on the east, and the southern borders of the Baltic on the north. The rest was vague conjecture and surmise, concerning vast islands extending in the northern ocean, and to which they gave the name of Scandinavia; and of impenetrable forests on the east and north-east, to which they gave the indefinite, and, as applied by them, unmeaning titles of Scythia and Sarmatia. Some intercourse they had, moreover, with the coasts of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the Straits of Caffa, and the Palus Mæotis. The rivers, and even the mountains, of this continent, notwithstanding the Alpine chain and the elevation of mount Blanc, are on a diminutive scale in comparison with those of the other continents; and Malte-Brun observes that the whole peninsula would hardly be sufficient for the basin of one great river like the Nile. That very curious inquirer, the author of the Dissertation on the Cabiric Mysteries, observes, in regard to the derivation of the word, "the continent of Europe derived its name from the worship of Eur-op, the Serpent of the Sun; and not from the fabulous Europa. Herodotus justly explodes the notion of its being so called from the Persian princess, observing that she never saw the region which the Greeks denominated Europe; but that she was conveyed from Tyre into Crete, and from Crete into Africa." But, however we may choose to accept the derivation of this name, it is now very well understood that the whole country now known as Europe was not originally included in that designation. The Romans gave to that part of the coast which lay opposite to them, the name of Africa, which only, by gradual extension, came at last to signify the whole of the vast peninsula which now bears that appellation. The same was equally the case in regard to Asia; and from the parts contiguous to Europe, the name extended over the largest part of the world of the ancients. On the shores of the Propontis, a portion or region of Thrace was first denominated Europe, in the opinion of D'Anville, as being "the entrance of Europe, opposite the land of Asia;" but more probably, the first called by that name, which it communicated at an early period to one whole division of the earth. The capital of Europa, in the limited sense in which, according to this opinion, that title was first applied, was Heraclea, which continued among the Romans of the empire a place of some importance till the removal of the imperial seat to Byzantium, thenceforward Constantinople. "European languages may be divided into two great classes; the first consists of those which resemble one another, and have some affinity with the Sanscrit and Persic; the second comprises those in which such resemblance does not exist, or at all events is faint and indistinct. In the first class may be distinguished the Greek and partly the Latin, the Slavonic and its branches, the German and Scandinavian: in the second, the Finnic, the Celtic, and the Basque or Biscayan. It is impossible to determine whether such radical differences are to be attributed to two different Asiatic invasions or to two separate periods of civilization. Ten distinct RACES exist still in Europe, but the most ancient are, on the whole, the least numerous The GREEKS, of whom the Pelasgi were a very ancient branch, after having peopled with their colonists the most of the coasts on the Mediterranean, now exist only in some provinces of Turkey, chiefly in the Archipelago and the Peloponnesus. The ALBANIANS are the descendants of the Illyrians, who mingled formerly with the Pelasgic Greeks, and at a later period with the modern; enough of their ancient language remains to enable us to discover its European character, and its connexion with the German and Slavonic. No trace is left of the ancient people that are supposed to have inhabited Thrace and the countries adjacent to the Danube; they were probably composed of different races, as the Phrygian, the Slavonic, the Celtic, and the Pelasgic; perhaps, too, what is strictly called the Thracian language, was the common source of the Phrygian, the Greek, the Illyrian, and even the Dacian or Dake. It is towards Thrace, mount Hemus, and the Lower Danube, that we can discover the earliest origin of European states; but these indications disappear if we traverse Asia Minor, or travel by the north round the Euxine Sea. The TURKS, the modern rulers of the Greeks, belong to the same family as the Tartars, and are scattered throughout Russia from the Crimea to Kasan; one of their colonies is established in Lithuania. That people, foreign to Europe, or who only occupied in ancient times the Uralian confines, are now domiciled in our peninsula, and probably fixed in it for ages; they are incorporated with the Greek races, and with the ancient nations of Asia Minor and Thrace. The Turcomans, of whom a branch is settled in Macedonia, have preserved incorrupted their Asiatic origin. Two great races have probably existed in the north-east of Europe for some thousand years. The vain Greeks and proud Romans despised the obscure names of SLAVONIANS and FINNS, (Slavi and Finni;) but these populous tribes have occupied, from the earliest dawn of history, all the countries comprehended under the vague and chimerical names of Scythia and Sarmatia. Almost all the topographical names of these countries are derived from the Slavonic and Finnic; a very small number owe their origin to the short empires of the Scythians, the Sarmatians, the Ostrogoths, and the Huns, the successive conquerors and rulers of these immense plains. It is probable that a Scythian nation, sprung from the Medes, ruled over the Finns and Slavonians, who formed the agricultural and pastoral tribes. The Sarmatians, who appear to have been of Tartar descent, mixed with the Scythians and their vassals; the Huns were another horde of the same people; both the one and the other came from the banks of the Wolga and the shores of the Caspian Sea. It is certain that, at the time in which they appeared in these countries, the banks of the Vistula and the Dnieper were peopled by Slavonic and Finnic tribes. The SLAVONIC nations are divided, according to their dialects, into three branches; first, the eastern Slavi, including the Russians, a people descended from the Roxelans or Roxolani, the Slavi and Scandinavians, the Rousniacs, in Galicia, the Servians or Slavi on the Danube, the Sclavonians, the Croatians, and others; secondly, the western Slavi, or the Poles, Bohemians, Hungarian Slavi, and the Sorabs or Serbs of Lusatia; thirdly, the northern Slavi or the Venedes of the Romans, the Wends of the ancient Scandinavians, a very numerous tribe, earlier civilized, but at the same time earlier incorporated in different states than the other two. The same tribe comprehends the remains of the German Wendes or Polabes, the Obotrites and Rugians, long since confounded with their conquerors the Germans; it also includes the Pomeranians, the Kassubs, subdued by the Poles; the ancient Prussians or Prutzi, exterminated or reduced to disgraceful slavery by their Teutonic conquerors; and lastly, the Lithuanians, the only branch which has retained some traces of its ancient language, although mixed with the Scandinavian and Finnic. The WALLACHIANS, in the ancient Dacia and the adjacent countries, are the descendants of the Getæ, the Slavi, and the Romans; their language resembles the Latin. The BULGARIANS are a Tartar tribe, that migrated from the neighbourhood of Kasan, and perhaps ruled over Finnic vassals; after having reached mount Hemus, they mingled with the Slavi on the Danube, and partly adopted their language. The FINNS, whom Tacitus designates under the name of Fenni, and Strabo under that of Zoumi, wandered probably from time immemorial in the plains of eastern Europe. Some of their tribes having mixed with other nations, were included by the Greeks among the European Scythians. Their descendants were subdued and driven to the north and the east by the numerous hordes of Slavonians. It is probable that the branches of the Finnic race are the Laplanders, who are also perhaps connected with the Huns, the Esthes, or ancient Esthonians and Livonians; the Permians incorporated with the Scandinavians, particularly the Norwegians, the last people founded a powerful state in the tenth century; lastly, the Hungarians or Magyars, who were composed of Finnic and Turkish tribes, and governed by Persians or Bucharians. Such are considered the ramifications of the Finnic race, or, as it is called in Russia, the Tchoude. There are, without doubt, many reasons that may induce some to regard the Hungarians as a separate branch, or at all events a mixed, though ancient people. The TEUTONIC nations, of which the most important are the Germans, the Scandinavians, and the English, are situated to the west of the Slavonians and Finns, in the western and central regions of Europe. The GERMANS, on account of their different dialects, may be divided into two classes; the inhabitants of the mountains on the south, and those of the plains on the north. The high German, and its harsh and guttural dialects, are spoken in Switzerland, Swabia, Alsace, Bavaria, the Austrian States, Silesia, and Transylvania. The softer dialects, or the low German, may be again divided into Dutch and Flemish, or into all that remains of the ancient Belgian, which extended from the Zuider-zee to Sleswick; and into low or old Saxon, which was spoken from Westphalia and Holstein to eastern Prussia. We ought, lastly, to mention the Saxon, as holding an intermediate place between these two German dialects, almost as different from each other as the Italian and the French. The Saxon is the language of Franconia, and of the higher orders in Livonia and Esthonia. The SCANDINAVIAN nations, or the Swedes, Goths, Norwegians, Danes, and Jutlanders, form a distinct race from the German nations, and were separated from them at a remote period. Still, however, there is some resemblance between them and the Dutch, the Frieslanders, and the low Saxons. All that remains of the ancient Scandinavian, as it was spoken in the ninth century, is retained in the Dalecarlian, the old Norwegian of the valleys of Dofre, in the dialect of the Feroe islands, and the Norse, the language of the Shetland islanders. Two others, or rather modern dialects, the Swedish and the Danish, are both of them branches of the ancient Scandinavian; but in the progress of civilization they have lost much of their strength, and even of their copiousness. A third dialect, that of Jutland, retains the marks of the old Anglo-Saxon, which has some affinity with the ancient Scandinavian. The ENGLISH and SCOTS in the lower part of Scotland, are sprung from Belgians, Saxons, Anglo-Saxons, Jutlanders, and Scandinavians. Their different dialects united and modified, formed the old English or the Anglo-Dano-Saxon, a language which was corrupted by the sudden introduction of barbarous Latin and barbarous French at the Norman invasion; but its ancient character was not thus destroyed; it was afterwards slowly but gradually improved. It must be confessed, however, that the dialects spoken in Suffolk, Yorkshire, and in the low counties of Scotland, bear a stronger resemblance than the English to the Teutonic tongues. The languages derived from the Latin are now spoken in the west and the south of Europe; but it is necessary to make, in connexion with the subject, some remarks on certain nations that were oppressed and subdued. No distinct trace remains of the Etruscans, the Ausonians, the Osci, and other indigenous states, or such at least as were anciently settled in Italy. The words Celts and Iberians are no longer used in France, Spain, and Britain; but under other denominations we may discover the descendants of these great and ancient nations. The BASQUES, confined to the western base of the Pyrenees, still retain one of the most original languages in our part of the world; it has been proved that it is a branch of the Iberian, which was spoken in eastern and southern Spain, and was common also in Aquitanian Gaul. The CELTS, one of the primitive European races, were most widely scattered in different countries. We may learn from the earliest histories of Europe, that they were settled at a remote epoch on the Alps and in the whole of Gaul, from which they migrated into the British islands and the central and western regions of Spain; at a later period they inundated Italy, Thrace, and Asia Minor. The Hibernians are an old branch of the same people; and according to some authors, the highlanders of Scotland are a colony of the native Irish. The Erse or Gaelic is the only authentic monument of the Celtic language; but it may be readily admitted that a nation so widely extended must have been incorporated with many states whose dialects are at present extinct. BELGIUM was at one period inhabited by Celts and Germans, but it may be proved that the earlier inhabitants were of Celtic origin; the Belgians, having conquered parts of England and Ireland, mingled with the native Celts, and were afterwards subdued by the Anglo-Saxons of Wales, Cumberland, and Cornwall; from these districts they returned to the continent, and peopled lower Brittany. The Gaulois or Gallic that is still spoken, is derived from the Belgian, which is very different from the Celtic, and the more modern dialect of lower Brittany is composed of several others; the Gauls called their language the Kumraigh or the Kymri, and the Latin authors of the middle ages den minated the people Cambrians; some geographical writers have incorrectly styled them Cimbres. Such are the three native and ancient races of western Europe. The language of the Romans, particularly the popular dialect or Romana rustica, came gradually into use in different countries it was thus mixed with native languages, and gave rise to provincial idioms; the purer Latin was spoken in the towns and churches. The irruption of the northern states, all of them, or almost all of them, of Teutonic origin, introduced new confusion and new idioms into the Latino-Gallic and Latino-Iberian dialects; the language of the Troubadours, of which the seeds had been sown in a very remote age, appeared about the same time in western Europe. From it emanated the Italian, the Lombard, Venetian, and Sicilian dialects, and also the Provençal, the Oc or Occitanian, the Limosin and Catalonian. The old French and some of its dialects, as the Walloon and that of Picardy, must have existed for many centuries before the French name was known; to the same source must be attributed the modern Spanish, or the Castilian and Gallician. We are entitled to conclude from this imperfect account of the ancient European languages, that the three most populous races were the Romano-Celtic in the south and west; the Teutonic in the centre, the north, and north-west; and the Slavonic in the east. The Greek, the Albanian, the Turkish, and the Finnic languages in the east; the Basque, the Celtic or Erse, and the Gaelic or Kymric, however interesting to the philologist, are considered secondary by the political arithmetician. These seven languages are not spoken by more than twenty-five or twenty-seven millions in Europe, whilst the three great races comprise a European population of more than a hundred and seventy-five millions. Europe reckons among its inhabitants the descendants of Arabians; they are distinguished in the island of Candia by the name of Abadiotes, and are confounded with the natives in the south of Spain. There are also two tribes of Kalmucs, who lead a wandering life between the Wolga and the Don. We may likewise mention the Jews that are dispersed throughout Europe, Zigeunes or gypsies, an ancient Indian caste, and other tribes of the same sort, that are treated with greater or less severity." Malte-Brun.

Eurotas, a river of Laconia, now the Ere, or Vasilico Potamos. Its source was in Arcadia, near Asea, and the springs of the famous Alpheus. For some distance this stream is lost beneath the surface of the ground, (Vid. Alpheus,) but rising again in the Laconian territory near Belmina, it takes a southerly course, and running almost midway between the Saronicus Sinus and the Myrtoan Sea upon the east, and Messenia on the west, it discharged itself into the Laconic gulf. All the streams of Laconia poured their waters into this largest of the Peloponnesian rivers, by means of which they paid their tribute to the sea. On the banks of the Eurotas stood Sparta, the great capital of Laconia and of the Peloponnesus, and, for a short time, of all Greece; besides which, innumerable towns and villages gave to its margin the appearance of a regular and continuous seulement.

Eurytanes, the greatest of the three principal tribes into which the Ætolian people were divided. They occupied the northern part of Ætolia, from the lake Trichonis to the borders of Thessaly. The Eurytanes are said by Thucydides to have been a barbarous people, speaking a language foreign to the Greeks, and uncivilized in their habits and lives.

Euxinus Pontus, one of the principal reservoirs of the great rivers which drain the continent of Europe. This celebrated sea is situated between Europe and Asia, forming a part of the line of separation, and encroaching upon the boundaries of both. In antiquity, the countries which bordered upon this remarkable basin were on the south, Mysia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus in Asia, and the Byzantine peninsula upon the side of Europe; the western shore was peopled by the Thracians, the Scythians, and the Cimmerians; upon the north, a great variety of tribes, chiefly Sarmatian, occupied the coast between the Tyras and the Tauric Chersonese; the eastern and north-eastern shores for the most part constituted the kingdom of Colchis between this coast and Taurica, the waters of the Palus Mæotis passing through the Cimmerian Bosphorus, emptied into the Euxine, which disgorged itself again on the opposite side, through another narrow strait into the Propontis; thence, again through the Hellespont into the Ægean and the Mediterranean, of which it constituted the principal basin and first depositary. It was frequently called by the ancients, Pontus, without any peculiar name or designation, as the only body of water in those regions which could be called a sea; but many distinguishing appellations were afterwards given to it, derived either from some peculiar property or appearance in its waters or its coast, from tradition; or lastly, from the character of the tribes which were settled on its shores. It was anciently called ἀξεινος, inhospitable, on account of the savage manners of the inhabitants on its coasts. Commerce with foreign nations, and the plantation of colonies in their neighbourhood, gradually softened their roughness, and the sea was no longer called Axenus, but Euxenus, hospitable. The Euxine is supposed by Herodotus to be 1387 miles long and 420 broad. Strabo calls it 1100 miles long, and in circumference 3125. It abounds in all varieties of fish, and receives the tribute of above 40 rivers. It is not of great depth, except in the eastern parts; whence some have imagined that it had a subterraneous communication with the Caspian. It is called the Black sea from the thick dark fogs which cover it. Orid. Trist. 3, el. 13, l. 4, el. 4, v. 54.—Strab. 2, &c.—Mela, I, c 1.—

Ptin. 3.—Herodot. 4, c. 85. The principal rivers that empty into the Euxine or Black Sea, are the Don, formerly the Tanais, through the Palus Mæotis, the Dnieper, Danapis, and Borysthenes; the Bog, which joins the Dnieper at its embouchure, and the Dniester, Danaster or Tyras, which emptied north of the mouths of the Danube. All these rivers drain the Russian empire, formerly Sarmatia, between the Volga and the Danube, east of a line drawn from Moscow to Warsaw. The Danube itself, the principal tributary of this body of water, supplies it from the streams collected in its course of 1500 miles from Germany, the Alps, and the greater part of Turkey north of the Balkans, the Hæmus of antiquity.

FABARIS, now Farfa, a river of Italy in the territories of the Sabines, called also Farfarus. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 334.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 715.

FABRATĒRIA, now Falvaterra, a town of Latium, situated on the Latin Way. It belonged first to the Volsci, but as early as 424 U. C. placed itself under the protection of Rome. It was colonized 628 U. C. Cram.

FABRICIUS PONS, "the bridge which connects the island in the Tiber with the left bank of that river. Dio Cassius speaks of it as having been built of stone soon after the conspiracy of Catiline; whence it might be inferred that a wooden one existed previously on the same spot. Its modern name is Ponte di quattro Capi." Cram.

FÆSULÆ, a considerable town of Etruria, 25 miles to the south-east of Pistoria, and a short distance to the north-east of Florence; "its ruins and name are preserved in the well-known hill and village of Fiesole. It is noticed for the first time in history by Polybius, in his account of the early wars between the Gauls and the Romans. We find Fæsulæ subsequently mentioned as one of those colonies which Sylla established to reward his adherents; and we know that Catiline made it the chief hold of his party in Etruria. It was still a flourishing city in the time of Pliny and Ptolemy." Cram. The author of a "Tour through part of France, Switzerland, and Italy," gives this account of the modern Fiesole. "A walk of about 4 miles brought us to Fæsulæ, one of the 12 ancient cities of Etruria, and famed in those days for its skill in divination and interpretation of omens. Parts of the ancient walls, being stones of immense size, piled without cement one upon the other, still remain. Within the last 12 years an amphitheatre has been discovered by digging. A portion of the rising seats and steps; a reservoir for water under an arch; together with several vaulted caves, supposed for the wild beasts; and entrances for the people, remain in excellent preservation. A church dedicated to, and containing the corpse of St. Alexander, was built in the 6th century on the site of a temple supposed sacred to Bacchus. Its 14 ancient Ionic columns support the roof, while outside the door stands the very altar where Pagan incense formerly smoked in honour of the jolly god. Fiesole is placed on the summit of a high hill, and the delighted eye ranges on every side, over one unbounded prospect of the riches of nature perfected by cultivation, and embellished with innumerable villas which seem to extend even to the distant Appenines." At Fiesole are the church of St. Lawrence, adorned by the skill of Michael Angelo: the splendid mausoleum of the first six Grand Dukes of Tuscany; and the Laurentian library, which owes its origin to Cosmo de Medici. Here are several curiosities; among them the famed Pandects of Justinian, found at Amalfi in 1137; also the oldest manuscript Virgil extant, with the notes of a Roman consul of the 5th century; likewise a Horace, with Petrarch's own hand-writing in it, and notes; and a complete copy of Terence's six plays, written throughout by Boccaccio, in a beautiful hand. Polyb. 2, 25; 3, 82.—*Cic. FALERII, or FALERIUM, a town of Etruria, to the south-west of Fescennium, "the capital of the ancient Falisci, so well known from their connexion with the early history of Rome. Much uncertainty existed respecting the site of this city; but it seems now well ascertained that it occupied the position of the present Civita Castellana. Falerii, according to Dion. Hal. (1, 21.) belonged at first to the Siculi; but these were succeeded by the Pelasgi, to whom the Greek form of its name is doubtless to be ascribed, as well as the temple and rites of the Argive Juno, and other indications of a Greek origin which were observed by that historian, and with which Ovid, who had married a lady of that city, seems also to have been struck, though he has followed the less authentic tradition, which ascribed the foundation of Falerii to Halesus, son of Agamemnon. We find the epithet of Æqui commonly attached to the Falisci by the poets, as they are said to have paid particular attention to the laws of equity; and it is supposed the Romans derived from them their feciales and other ceremonies for making war or peace; but Strabo seems to have considered this word as part of their name, rather than an adjunct. The same writer states, that many conceived the Falisci to be a peculiar people, distinct from the Tuscans, and having a language of their own. They formed part, however, of the Etruscan confederacy, and constituted one of its principal states. The early wars of the Falisci with Rome are chiefly detailed in the fifth book of Livy, where the celebrated story of Camillus and the school-master of Falerii occurs. It was not, however, till the third year after the first Punic war that this people was finally reduced. The waters of the Faliscan territory were supposed, like those of the Clitumnus, to have the peculiar property of communicating a white colour to cattle." Cram.—Strab. 5, 226.—Plin. 3, 5.—*Ovid. FALERNUS AGER, a district in Campania, contiguous to the Ager Calenus, celebrated "as producing the best wine in Italy, or indeed in the world." Without pretending to fix the limits of this favoured portion of Campania with scrupulous accuracy, it seems evident, from the testimony of Livy and Pliny, that we must regard it as extending from the Massic hills to the Vulturnus. That part of the district which grew the choicest wine was distinguished by the name of Faustianus, being that of a village about six miles from Sinuessa." Cram. Eustace considers the cause of the decline of Italian wines in the estimation of the connoisseur, and is inclined to attribute it to a change in the taste of the Italians, and not to any alteration in the climate or want of skill in the cultivation of the vine. "The modern Italians are extremely sober; they drink wine as Englishmen drink small beer, not to flatter the palate but to quench the thirst. In the cultivation of the vine, very little attention is therefore paid to the quantity or perfection, but merely to the quality of the produce. Not so the ancients; they were fond of convivial enjoyments; they loved wine, and considered it not only as a gratification to the palate, but as a means of intellectual enjoyment and a vehicle of conversation. To heighten its flavour, therefore, to bring it to full maturity by age, in short, to improve it by every method imaginable, was with them an object of primary importance; nor can it heighten surprise that in circumstances so favourable the vine should flourish. Yet with all this encouragement, the two most celebrated wines in Italy, the Cæcuban and the Falernian, had lost much of their excellency and reputation in Pliny's time; the former, in consequence of a canal drawn across the vale of Amyclæ by the emperor Nero; and the latter, from its very celebrity, which occasioned so great a demand, that the cultivators, unable to resist the temptation, turned their attention from the quality to the quantity." Classical Tour, vol. 2, p. 322.—*Sil. Fanum Fortunæ, now Fano, a town of Umbria, on the Flaminian Way, between Pisaurum and Sena Gallica, and near the river Metaurus. "About seven miles further, (from Pesaro), is Fano (Fanum Fortunæ), a well-built and very handsome town. One of the gates of Fano is a triumphal arch of Augustus; a gallery or portico of five arcades was built over it at a late period, that is, under Constantine; the whole is, or was, Corinthian. The theatre was a noble and commodious edifice, but has been so long neglected, that it has at present much the appearance of a ruin." Eustace's Classical Tour.

Faventia, now Faenza, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, situated on the Via Æmilia, between Ariminum and Bononia, and nearer the latter than the former. "It is noted in the history of the civil wars of Rome for the defeat of Carbo's party by that of Sylla." Cram.—Liv. Epit. 88.—Vell. Paterc. 2, 28.—Strab. 5, 216.

Feltria, now Feltre, a town of Venetia, on a branch of the Flavis, and on a road, which, leaving the Via Æmilia at Concordia, joins at Tridentum "the great road which leads now, as formerly, from Italy into Germany by the pass of the Brenner, a mountain to which, with the adjacent Alps, the Tridentini communicated their name. It was a town of some consequence, as would appear from inscriptions." Cram.—Plin. 3, 19.

Fenni, or Finni. Vid. Europa.

Ferentinum, I. a town of Etruria, now Ferenti, situated on the right of the Via Cassia to one going from Rome. Horace probably alludes to this town (1 Epist. 17.) "From Vitruvius, who speaks of some valuable stone quarries in its neighbourhood, we collect that it was a municipium: Strabo ranks it with the lesser towns of Etruria; but it is remarked that Frontinus names it among the colonies of that province. The emperor Otho's family was of that city." Cram.—Strab. 5, 225.—Suet. Oth.—Tacit. Hist. 2, 50. Ann. 15, 53.——II. A town of Latium, "now Ferentino, about eight miles beyond Anagnia, on the Via Latina. It appears to have belonged originally to the Volsci, but was taken from them by the Romans, and given to the Hernici. It is afterwards mentioned as being in the possession of that people (Liv. 9, 43); but subsequently it appears to have fallen into the hands of the Samnites, unless the name of Ferentinum be corrupt in the passage of Livy referred to (10, 34). It should be observed also, that Stephanus Byz., who is not, however, much to be depended upon with respect to Italian cities, assigns Ferentinum to this people. According to Livy, Ferentinum, though subject to Rome, was governed by its own laws, but in the time of Gracchus it had become a municipal town; for Aulus Gellius quotes part of an oration, in which that celebrated character inveighed against the conduct of a Roman prætor who had most tyrannically ill-treated two quæstors of Ferentinum. Cluverius is mistaken in supposing Ferentinum to have been a colony; in the passage he quotes from Livy (35, 9), we should read Thurinum, and not Ferentinum." Cram.—Liv. 4, 51; 9, 43.—Aul. Gell. 10, 3.

Ferentum, or Forentum, a town of Apulia, now Forenza, about 8 miles south of Venosa, and on the other side of mount Vultur. Cram.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 15.—Liv. 9, c. 16 and 20.

Ferōniæ lucus, a grove with a temple and fountain, situated in Latium, and sacred to the goddess Feronia. It is thus described by Eustace: "Between two and three miles from Terracina, a few paces from the road, a little ancient bridge crosses a streamlet issuing from the fountain of Feronia.

Viridi gaudens Feronia luco. Virg. 7, 800.

The grove in which this goddess was supposed to delight has long since fallen; one only solitary ilex hangs over the fountain. The temple has sunk in dust, not even a stone remains! Yet she had a better title to the veneration of the benevolent than all the other goddesses united. She delighted in freedom, and took deserving slaves under her protection. They received their liberty by being seated on a chair in her temple, inscribed with these words, Bene meriti servi sedeant; surgant liberi." (Vid. Servius, quoted by Cluverius.) Classical Tour.

Fescennium, or Fescennia, a town of Etruria, near the Tiber. It is now Galese. Here that species of poetry was first cultivated, which was sung or declaimed during the pomp of sacrifices or celebration of marriages; whence the ancient nuptial hymns of the Romans were called Fescennine. "It is evident, however, that these Etruscan songs, or hymns, were of the very rudest description, and probably never were reduced to writing. They were a kind of impromptus, composed of scurrilous jests, originally recited by the Italian peasants at those feasts of Ceres which celebrated the conclusion of their harvests; and they resembled the verses described by Horace, Epist. Lib. 2, Ep. 1." Dunlop's Roman Literature.

FIRMÊNUS, a small river of Latium, which empties into the Liris, and now bears the name of Fiume della Posta. Above its junction with the Liris, it forms a small island, now S. Domenico Abate, which belonged to Cicero, and where was laid "the scene of his dialogues with Atticus, and his brother Quintus, on legislation. He describes it in the opening of the book as the property and residence of his ancestors, who had lived there for many generations: he himself was born there, A. U. C. 646. The island afterwards came into the possession of Silius Italicus." Cramer.—Martial. 11. ep. 49.—Silius, 8, 401.

FICULEA, or FICULNEA, a town of Latium, beyond mount Sacer, at the north of Rome. Cicero had a villa there, and the road that led to the town was called Ficulnensis, afterwards Nomentana Via. Cic. 12.—Att. 34.—Liv. 1, c. 38, l. 8, c. 52.

FIDÊNÆ, or FIDÊNA, a town of the Sabines, near the Tiber, at a distance of between four and five miles from Rome, originally an Alban colony, "but fell subsequently into the hands of the Etruscans. According to Dionysius, it was conquered by Romulus soon after the death of Tatius; he represents it as being at that period a large and populous town. It would be tedious to enumerate the different attempts made by this city to emancipate itself from the Roman yoke; sometimes with the aid of the Etruscans, at others in conjunction with the Sabines. Its last revolt occurred A. U. C. 329, when the dictator Æmilius Mamercus, after having vanquished the Fidenates in the field, stormed their city, which was abandoned to the licentiousness of his soldiery. From this time we hear only of Fidenæ as a deserted place, with a few country-seats in its vicinity. In the reign of Tiberius, a terrible disaster occurred here by the fall of a wooden amphitheatre during a show of gladiators, by which accident 50,000 persons, as Tacitus reports, or 20,000 according to Suetonius, were killed and wounded. (Ann. 4, 62.) From the passage of Tacitus here cited, it appears that Fidenæ had risen again to the rank of a municipal town." The site of the ancient city is probably near Castel Giubileo. Cram.—Dion. Hal. 2, 23, and 54.—Liv. 1, 6; 4, 9.—Strab. 5, 226.

FIDENTIA, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, to the south of the Padus, on the Via Æmilia between Placentia and Parma. Here "Sylla's party gained a victory over Carbo. From the martyrdom of Saint Donninus, Fidentia has obtained the name of Borgo San Donnino." Cram.—Vell. Paterc. 2, 28.—Liv. Epit. 88.—Plin. 3, 15.

FIRMUM PICENUM, a town of Picenum, situated about five miles from the sea, on which stood the Castellum Firmanorum, now Porto di Fermo. It was colonized towards the beginning of the first Punic war, and is accordingly styled in ancient inscriptions as Col. Augusta Firma. The modern town of Fermo is yet a place of some note in the Marca d'Ancona. Cram.—Plin. 3, 13.—Strab. 5, 241.

FLANATICUS SINUS, a bay of the Flanates, in Liburnia, on the Adriatic, now the gulf of Quarnaro. Plin. 3, c. 19 and 21.

FLANO, a commercial town on the Illyrian side of the Flanaticus Sinus, to which it is supposed by many to have imparted its name.

FLEVO, a canal which was excavated by order of Drusus, to convey the waters of that branch of the Rhine, which, among the many mouths of that river, retained its proper name, with the northern ocean, and to drain the country of the Frisii through which it passed. In the centre of this country or thereabouts, was a lake of considerable magnitude, called also Flevo, and through this lake passed the Isala or Yssel to the sea. The lake appears to have owed its origin to this canal. "This canal," says D'Anville, "by a derivation of the waters of the Rhine into the Yssel, had expanded to such a degree as to form a considerable lagune or lake, whose issue to the sea was fortified by a castle bearing the same name. This lagune, having been in the progress of time much increased by the sea, assumed the name Zuyder-zee, or the Southern Sea; and of several channels which afford entrance to the ocean, that named Vlie indicates the genuine egress of the Flevo." D'Anville.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6, l. 4, v. 72.—Plin. 4, c. 15.—Mela, 3, c. 2.

FLORENTIA, the chief town of Tuscany, is comparatively a modern city. It extends on both sides of the Arno at the present day, though, when first founded, and for a long time afterwards, it served for little else than as a port and market of the older town of Fæsulæ. In the time of Cæsar a colony was first established there, and by the period at which the barbarians first began their incursions into Italy it had become a respectable city. It suffered, however, very much in the wars which those savage conquerors brought upon Italy, and no indications of its future splendour are to be found in any era of its early history. During the reigns of the dukes of Tuscany, Florence was not a capital city; and Lucca, till about the epoch of the accession of the catholic countess Matilda, enjoyed the rank and character of principal among the cities of Tuscany. From that time, however, Florence took its place among the first cities, not merely of Tuscany but of all Italy; and by the year 1300 it had assumed a rank for power and learning that placed it far before any other city of Europe. Neither the literature nor the arts, nor yet the proud and independent spirit of the early Greeks, gave them any boast over the Florentines of the period that succeeded; and Florence remained, till the commencement of the era of modern history, the first city of Europe for her arts, her letters, and the independent character of her citizens. Tacit Formiæ, now Mola di Gaeta, one of the most ancient towns of Italy. It was near the borders of Campania in Latium, upon the Caietanus Sinus, and all antiquity concurred in fixing there the seat of the fabled Læstrigones. Formiæ was a favourite residence of Cicero, who was also treacherously murdered there on being proscribed by the second triumvirate. Liv. 8, c. 14, l. 38, c. 36.—Horat. 1, od. 20, v. 11, l. 3, od. 17. Sat. 1, 5, v. 37.—Plin. 36, c. 6.

Formio, a river emptying into the Flanaticus Sinus, and forming, till the reign of Augustus, the eastern boundary of Italy. The modern name is Risano. Plin. 3, c. 18 and 19.

Fortunatæ Insulæ, islands at the west of Mauretania in the Atlantic Sea. They are supposed to be the Canary Isles of the moderns, though only two in number, at a little distance one from the other, and 10,000 stadia from the shores of Libya. They were represented as the seats of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. The air was wholesome and temperate, the earth produced an immense number of various fruits without the labours of men. When they had been described to Sertorius in the most enchanting colours, that celebrated general expressed a wish to retire thither, and to remove himself from the noise of the world and the dangers of war. Strab. 1.—Plut. in Sertor.—Horat. 4. od. 8, v. 27.—Epod. 16.—Plin. 6, c. 31. "Those of them that lie nearest the continent were called Purpurariæ, as Juba, king of Mauretania, intended to establish there a manufactory for purple dye. The more remote being specially denominated the Fortunate Isles, we must recognise in them Lançarota and Forteventura. Canaria has given the name of Canaries to these islands in general." These islands were the most western of all the lands with which the ancients were acquainted; and from the fables in which their poets indulged in regard to them, we may suppose that their knowledge of these distant places was not improved by frequent communication. The Peak of Teneriffe rises in one of these islands, in the form of a pyramid, to an enormous height, and being covered with snow upon the summit, is supposed to have given the name of Nivaria to the island on which it stood. All knowledge of the Insulæ Fortunæ was lost to the ignorant ages that saw and succeeded the fall of the empire. They were again discovered about the year 1330, by the crew of a vessel driven thither by the impetuosity of a storm.

Forum Romanum. "It is collected from Livy and Dionysius, that the Forum was situated between the Capitoline and Palatine hills; and from Vitruvius we learn that its shape was that of a rectangle, the length of which exceeded the breadth by one third. From these data, which agree with other incidental circumstances, it is generally thought that the four angles of the Roman Forum were formed by the arch of Severus at the foot of the Capitol; the arch of Fabian, which was placed at the termination of the Via Sacra; the church of St. Theodore, at the foot of the Palatine; and that of the Consolazione, below the Capitol. The ground which it occupied is now commonly known by the name of Campo Vaccino. The Forum was first adorned with porticoes and shops by Tarquinius Priscus. We hear of its being surrounded also with temples, basilicks, and innumerable statues; among which were those of the twelve deities, named Consentes Urbani, whereof six were males and six females. The first object to be considered in a detailed examination of the Forum is the position of the Rostra. It is well known that this name was given to the elevated seat from whence the Roman orators and men in office addressed the assembled people; from the circumstance of its having been adorned with the beaks of some galleys taken from the city of Antium. When Livy applies the word templum to this structure, we are to understand him as alluding rather to the reverence with which it was regarded by the Romans, as being a consecrated place, than to its size or shape. It appears that the Rostra were first placed opposite the middle of the south side of the Forum, near the Comitium, and that part where the senate usually met. Julius Cæsar removed the Rostra from the position they first occupied, and placed them close under the Palatine hill, near the south-western angle of the Forum. From this circumstance the new Rostra were commonly known by the name of Julian. Amongst the illustrious characters who enjoyed the distinction of having their statues placed near the Rostra, we may notice Sylla, Pompey, and Augustus. Likewise the ambassadors who might perish in the discharge of their public functions: as in the instance of those who were put to death by order of Lars Tolumnius, king of Veii, and of Teuta, queen of the Illyrians. Above the Rostra was the Curia, or senate-house, sometimes called Hostilia from having been originally built by Tullus Hostilius. The ascent to it from the Forum was by a flight of steps. It was repaired, and probably embellished, by Sylla; soon after which it was set on fire, on the occasion of the corpse of P. Clodius being burnt in it by the populace, when it was totally destroyed. Somewhat behind the Curia was the Comitium, a space of ground, as it appears, elevated above the rest of the Forum, which was appropriated to the meetings of the Curiæ in the early days of Rome, and subsequently to the trials of civil causes. Here also delinquents were publicly scourged. This area was at first uncovered, but a roof was added nine years after the entrance of Hannibal into Italy, that is, 542 A. U. C. The celebrated Capitoline marbles, so called from the circumstance of their being preserved in the modern Campidoglio, were discovered in the sixteenth century, and lately other fragments of the same records have been found on the supposed site of the Comitium; hence it is conceived that these monuments were commonly affixed to some part of that building. The following buildings appear to have been connected with this edifice. The Græcostasis, a hall in which the envoys of foreign nations awaited the answer of the senate on the subject of their mission. It was burnt, together with the Curia Hostilia, by the partisans of Clodius after his death, but was afterwards rebuilt by Antoninus Pius. A Senaculum, or building in which the senate met on extraordinary occasions. The Basilica of Opimius, and a small temple of Concord. This temple was of bronze, and was built and consecrated by C. Flavius, a Curule Ædile. The famous fig-tree, called Ruminalis, under which Romulus and Remus were said to have been suckled by the she-wolf, grew in the area of the Comitium. An image of the animal and her nurslings was cast in bronze, and placed under this tree. To the right of the Curia stood the Basilica Porcia, built by Porcius Cato when consul, A. U. C. 564, and is thought to have been the first edifice of that kind which was erected in Rome. Plutarch informs us that it was the hall in which the tribunes of the people sat to administer justice. That part of the Forum which lay at the foot of the Palatine is known to have been called Velia, and perhaps there was a street of this name leading up to the hill just mentioned, one summit of which might be thence called Veliensis. In the Velia stood the temple of the Penates, supposed to have been brought by Æneas from Troy. In the court of this temple was a palm-tree planted by Augustus. This edifice was burnt in the great fire which occurred under Nero. Under the Palatine was a celebrated temple of Castor and Pollux, said to have been erected to those deities for the aid which they were supposed to have afforded to the Romans in the battle fought near the lake Regillus. It was situated near a fountain commonly called the lake of Juturna.

At quæ venturas præcedit sexta Calendas,
Hac sunt Ledæis templa dicata Deis,
Fratribus illa Deis fratres de gente Deorum
Circa Juturnæ composuere lacus.

According to Nardini, the Forum had four outlets on the side that we are now considering, which looks to the west and to the Tiber. These were the Vicus Jugarius, Vicus Tuscus, Via Nova, and a branch of the Via Sacra. The first of these streets is supposed to have derived its name from an altar of Juno, surnamed Juga, because she presided over marriages. It passed at the foot of the Capitol, and terminated opposite the Porta Carmentalis. In this street we must place the house of the seditious Spurius Mælius, which being razed to the ground, the space which it occupied was afterwards called Æquimælium. Livy mentions a great fire which broke out in this part of the city, and lasted two nights and a day. The Vicus Tuscus was a little to the south of the street above mentioned, and consequently nearer the Palatine; it appears to have led from the Forum to that part of the city which was called the Velabrum, and from thence to the Circus Maximus. The fourth street which issued from the western angle of the Forum seems to have been a continuation or branch of the Via Sacra. Between the Via Nova, and that part of the Via Sacra above described, was the celebrated temple of Vesta, in which the eternal flame was preserved, and where the Palladium, saved from the ruins of Troy, was also deposited. This temple was erected by Numa, together with the neighbouring building called the hall of Vesta which was afterwards added, having been originally the dwelling of that king.

Hic focus est Vestæ, qui Pallada servat et ignem.
Hic fuit antiqui regia parva Numæ.

If we now turn to the north side of the Forum, being that which is under the Capitol, we shall have to notice the following buildings. The arch of Severus, which is yet entire, and is known to have been erected in honour of the victories of that emperor, and his two sons Geta and Caracalla, over the Parthians. The name of Geta has been erased, and supplied by other letters. The temple of Concord, stood, as we are informed by Festus, between the Capitol and the Forum; while we learn from Plutarch that it fronted the Comitium, and was built by order of the senate in consequence of a vow made by Camillus. It was for a long time supposed that the architrave, supported by eight pillars of the Ionic order, which is yet standing at the foot of the Capitol, originally formed part of this temple; but it seems now agreed that this opinion is erroneous, and some late discoveries have brought to light, as it is thought, the area of the temple of Concord, near the ruins supposed to belong to the temple of Jupiter Tonans, and somewhat lower than the architrave and pillars above mentioned. Close to the temple of Concord was the Senaculum, or occasional senate-house, in which, by the advice of Cicero, decisive measures were determined upon against Catiline and his associates. Contiguous to this last building was the temple of Saturn, situated at the foot of the ascent called Clivus Capitolinus. The date of its construction is not known, but it was considered as one of the most ancient edifices of Rome. We learn from Plutarch, that Valerius Publicola selected this building for a public treasury, to which use it appears to have been appropriated ever after. Still lower, and in the vacant space of the Forum, was the celebrated Milliarium Aureum, from which it has been supposed by some antiquaries, and more particularly by D'Anville, that all the roads which lead to the different parts of the empire were measured; but though this idea seems to derive some support from a passage in Plutarch's life of Galba, it is evident from Pliny, that the Milliarium Aureum was that point in the Forum from which the distances to the several gates of the city were alone reckoned. All the Roman ways had already been measured in the time of C. Gracchus, as Plutarch informs us. Milliarium Aureum was erected by Augustus. In the open space of the Forum stood also the tribunal of Aurelius Cotta, the prætor, which appears to have been a court of justice surrounded by steps like an amphitheatre, in order that the people might sit and hear the trials decided there. In the centre of the Forum was the celebrated Lacus Curtius, so called, according to some accounts, from Metius Curtius, a Sabine officer, who, in the engagement between Tatius and Romulus, was nearly immersed in its muddy hollow. According to others, from Curtius, a Roman knight, who from a spirit of devotion to his country leaped into it on horseback, after the oracle had declared that this dangerous gulf could not otherwise be closed. This bog having in process of time become dry, an altar was erected on the spot. It was the custom also to erect pillars in the Forum commemorative of great victories and achievements; of this kind were the Pila Horatia; the column of C. Menius, who conquered the Latins and placed the Rostra in the Forum; the rostral column of Duilius, who gained the first naval victory against the Carthaginians. The Puteal Libonis, mentioned by ancient authors as being in the Forum, was either an altar or a tribunal, and certainly the haunt of usurers and money lenders. There was a statue of Marsyas near the above-mentioned spot, which seems likewise to have been frequented by the same description of persons, who came probably to have their causes tried.

Deinde eo dormitum, non sollicitus, mihi quod cras
Surgendum sit mane; obeundus Marsya, qui se
Vultum ferre negat Noviorum posse minoris.

The celebrated temple of Janus is known to have stood in the Forum, though it is not easy to determine the precise situation which it occupied. Procopius says it was a small square edifice of bronze, containing a statue of Janus, placed in front of the Curia, and a little above the chapel of the three Fates. It is probable, however, that he does not mean the ancient Curia Hostilia; as the temple of the three Fates or Parcæ is known to have stood near the church of S. Adriano, distinguished in old ecclesiastical writings by the title of "in tribus Fatis." Ovid seems to imply, that this edifice, consecrated to Janus, stood close to two Fora, which are supposed to be those of Cæsar and Augustus. Great confusion has arisen on the subject of the building in question, from the number of temples and arches erected to Janus in different parts of the city. The one of which we are now speaking was built by Romulus and Tatius, and was distinguished by the title of Quirinus. According to Suetonius, this was the temple which Augustus closed for the third time from its foundation after the battle of Actium, which statement is confirmed by Horace,

. . . . . et vacuum duellis
Janum Quirini clausit, et ordinem
Rectum, et vagantí fræna licentiæ
Injecit——

Livy speaks, however, of a temple of Janus built by Numa in the Argiletum, to which he applies the fact above stated. This seems to have been called Janus Geminus; or perhaps the two buildings were designated by that name, as it appears that they were always closed together. Besides the temple of Janus, there were three arches dedicated to this god in different parts of the Forum, as we learn from Horace. The central one was the usual rendezvous of brokers and money-lenders. On the eastern side of the Forum were the Tabernæ Argentariæ, or bankers' shops, called also Novæ, to distinguish them from the Tabernæ Veteres; which stood, as we have seen, in another part of the Forum. It was near this spot, as we learn from Livy, that Virginius shed the blood of his daughter to save her honour. On the same side was the statue of Venus, surnamed Cloacina. We hear also of the Stationes Municipiorum as being in this part of the Forum. These were probably rooms where the municipal deputations from different parts of the empire met previous to their appearing in court, whenever they had any cause to plead. The Basilica of L. Æmilius Paulus is supposed to have occupied the site of the church of St. Adrian, if that modern structure be not in a great measure formed from the materials of the ancient building. This Basilica was erected by L. Æmilius Paulus, who was consul A. U. C. 703, out of the sum of 1500 talents sent him by Cæsar from Gaul, in order to gain him over to his side. Appian, who relates the same fact, says it was one of the most splendid edifices of Rome; and Pliny speaks of its columns of Phrygian marble as most worthy of admiration. This building was repaired successively by different individuals of the Æmilian family under Augustus and Tiberius. In this vicinity we hear also of a temple of Hadrian, erected to the memory of that emperor by Antoninus Pius. Connected with the great Forum of Rome, the whole of which has now been described, were two on a smaller scale, built by Julius Cæsar and Augustus. That which Cæsar erected, as Appian states, was not for the purposes of trade, but was used for pleadings, and meetings on public business. Its principal ornament was a magnificent temple of Venus Genetrix, with a highly prized statue of that goddess, and one of Cleopatra by her side. Several other statues, and some pictures belonging to this temple, are noticed by Pliny. In front of this edifice was an equestrian statue of Cæsar. The horse of bronze gilt was said to be the celebrated figure of Bucephalus, the work of Lysippus. Dio. Cassius asserts that the great Forum was inferior in beauty to that of Cæsar, upon the area of which alone, according to Suetonius, 4000 sestertia, or upwards of 800,000*l.* of our money, had been expended. Contiguous to it, but nearer the Capitol, was the Forum of Augustus, which seems to have been entirely appropriated to law business. Suetonius informs us that it was of no great extent, that emperor being unwilling to inconvenience persons whose houses stood in the way of his improvement. It boasted, however, of a double portico, adorned with several statues and pictures, and a temple consecrated to Mars the avenger, which Augustus had vowed to that deity during the civil war. It was ordered by Augustus that the senate should always hold their consultations on the affairs of war in this temple. The Forum of Trajan, which occupied the extreme portion of the eighth region, between the Capitol and Quirinal, was yet more extensive and magnificent than any of the structures which have been hitherto described. It is stated by Ammianus Marcellinus, that no part of Rome excited so much wonder and admiration in the emperor Constans and the Persian prince Hormisdas, when viewing the city, as this superb Forum and its stupendous assemblage of buildings. It was surrounded with a portico, the top of which was crowded with equestrian statues and military ornaments, principally in bronze. Its chief buildings consisted of a basilica, a triumphal arch, a temple, and a library. The famous column which yet remains entire, points out more particularly the situation of the Forum now under consideration, to the splendour of which it doubtless added considerably. It was erected by order of the senate in commemoration of Trajan's victories over the Daci, which are described in the bas reliefs with which the shaft of the pillar is ornamented. The ashes of Trajan, it is said, were contained in an urn placed on the summit, an honour, as Eutropius observes, which never had been paid to any before that emperor. At the angle formed by the Via Nova and Valabrum, was the tomb and statue of Acca Laurentia, the wife of Faustulus and nurse of Romulus and Remus, to whom an annual sacrifice was offered on this spot. Here were also the chapel and grove of the Lares, and likewise a temple of Fortune built by Lucullus. Nearer the Circus Maximus was the Forum Boarium, so called from a brazen bull which stood in the centre.

Pontibus et magno juncta est celeberrima Circo Area, quæ posito de bove nomen habet.

According to Pliny, this figure was brought to Rome from Ægina. It probably served to denote the business carried on in this Forum, which was, in fact, the sale of oxen, according to Livy. We learn from the same author, and from Pliny, that this part of Rome was the scene of a barbarous sacrifice, which was not entirely abolished even in the latter's time. It consisted in burying alive two persons of each sex belonging to some hostile nation. We must now turn to the Capitoline hill, which contained the citadel and fortress of Rome. Three ascents led to its summit from the Forum. 1st, By the 100 steps of the Tarpeian rock, which was probably on the steepest side, where it overhangs the Tiber. 2d, The Clivus Capitolinus, which began from the arch of Tiberius and the temple of Saturn, near the present hospital of the Consolazione, and led to the citadel by a winding path. 3d, The Clivus Asyli, which, being less steep than the other two, was on that account the road by which the triumphant generals were borne in their cars to the Capitol. This ascent began at the arch of Septimius Severus, and from thence, winding to the left, passed near the ruined pillars of the temple of Concord as it is commonly but improperly called, and from thence led to the Intermontium. The Capitoline hill is said to have been previously called Saturnius, from the ancient city of Saturnia, of which it was the citadal. Afterwards it was known by the name of Mons Tarpeius; and finally it obtained the appellation first mentioned, from the circumstance of a human head being discovered on its summit in making the foundations of the temple of Jupiter. It was considered as forming two summits, which, though considerably depressed, are yet sufficiently apparent. That which looked to the south and to the Tiber, was the Tarpeian rock or citadel; the other, which was properly the Capitol, faced the north and the Quirinal. The space which was left between these two elevations was known by the name of Intermontium. It was on this part of the Capitoline mount that Romulus established his Asylum, which appears to have been an enclosure formed by a thick plantation of trees and underwood, having a small temple within, consecrated to some unknown divinity." *Cram. Franci, a German people, or rather a generic term for a confederation of certain Germanic tribes. Much labour has been spent in the attempt to ascertain the original seats of these warlike people, but they have all been more or less unsuccessful, except where directed to the examination of particular divisions of the league. There can be little doubt, however, that they all were branches of the greater Suevic nation, detached, perhaps, at different periods from the parent stock. They formed, moreover, the most important body of the German nation at the time that they first became known to the Romans. At this time they dwelt between the Albis, Elbe, the Mænus, Mayne, the Rhine, and the Northern Ocean, in the modern countries of Franconia, Thuringia, Hesse Frisia, and Westphalia; or, according to the present political division of Germany, the kingdoms of Hanover and Holland, a part of Prussia, Saxony, the smaller German states, a part of the kingdom of Bavaria, and the Grand Duchy of the Rhine. This famous league appears to have been formed about the year two hundred and forty. The principal people of the Francic association were the Cherusci, by whom the Roman legions of Augustus were destroyed, to the disgrace of the name of Varus and the imperial arms; the Chauci, the Catti, and the Sicambri. These resistless barbarians, in the reign of Gallienus, having forced the passage of the Rhine, the limits and bulwark of the empire, and crossing the last defences of the distant province of Hispania, the vainly trusted ramparts of the Pyrenees, brought devastation and slaughter into the defenceless region of Tarraconensis. From thence they crossed over into Africa, where they renewed the barbarities to which they seemed to have been invariably excited in those ages by the Roman name, the appearance of Roman manners, and the recollection of the long Roman usurpations. But through all these manifestations of an unyielding character, and an uncompromising and savage independence, the Roman discipline still reached its end in subduing, to a partial and temporary allegiance, such of these fierce people as remained in their seats in Germany. The emperor Probus removed them in great numbers to colonize the most distant regions of his dominions; and a body established in conformity with this policy, near the Phasis on the Euxine Sea, attested the power which the Roman arms had acquired over the refractory Germans. From this settlement, however, resulted consequences unexpected, and involving the fate of a great part of Europe for centuries afterwards. These barbarians, discontented with their situation in an unknown, distant, and inhospitable country, resolved to abandon it, and seizing on some vessels which they found in one of the ports on the Euxine, they ventured themselves upon the unknown seas. Through the Euxine, the Propontis, the Hellespont, the Ægean, and the Mediterranean, this bold colony, till then untried upon the waters, carrying the same irresistible fury in their way, arrived at the Straits of Gibraltar, the renowned Pillars of Hercules, and launching into the open ocean, returned in their frail barks, the first circumnavigators of Europe, to the lands of their countrymen, the coasts of Batavia and Frisia, by the Rhine, the Ems, and the Elbe. After this memorable exploit, the northern barbarians became no less formidable by sea than by land to the countries of Europe; and the reduction of a part of Gaul, the conquest of Britain, and all the long series of the Danish and Norwegian piracies and victories, were the fruits of this bold and successful adventure. The leader under whom the Francs thus returned to their homes is one of those, who, in the obscurity of history, lay claim to the introduction of a new religion, and to the title of a supreme divinity, under the name of Odin among his countrymen. It is more probable, however, that admiration of his achievement first conferred upon him the title of a deity, long before worshipped in Germany, and that succeeding generations confounded the deity and the deified through ignorance and error. An uneasy and precarious authority still marked the power of the Empire over the people of the north; but when the emperor Constantius invited them to cross the Rhine, and allowed them, on condition of aiding against his enemies, to establish themselves within that barrier of the empire, the Francs and Allemani, regardful as little of the rights of his subjects as of those of his enemies, established themselves on the ruin of whole provinces and people in those regions, from which they extended themselves indefinitely over the empire, but from which they were never again to be removed. The Franci first settled themselves in a part of Brabant, then called Toxandria, and originated there the empire of the French. Established in their new abodes, the Franks began to assume, in some degree, the manners and feelings of those among whom they had taken up their homes, and a gentler influence than that of conquest began to effect what attempted conquest had failed to do, in producing a gradual assimilation to the Roman character and a regard for the Roman name. Hence, on the invasion of Gaul by the Suevi, Vandali, Alani, and Burgundiones, the Franci were found on the side of Stilicho and the Empire, resisting, though unsuccessfully, the incursion which constituted, according to the opinion of Gibbon, "the fall of the western empire beyond the Alps." In the reign of the third Valentinian, the king of the Franks, who held his royal court at Dispargum, a village between the modern Brussels and Louvain, and who still retained the characteristics of his German ancestry, courage and a fierce spirit of enterprise and gain, resolved upon the conquest of the Belgic province of Gaul; and under his conduct his subjects effected their first settlement in the country to which they were subsequently to transmit their name. The son of Clodion, Meroveus, began the dynasty and line of the Frank kings, which was confirmed a few years afterwards, about 486 A.D. by Clovis, "who in 30 years," says Gibbon, "accomplished the establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul. Twenty-five years afterwards," continues the same historian, "Justinian, yielding to the Franks the sovereignty of the countries beyond the Alps which they already possessed, absolved the provincials from their allegiance, and established on a more lawful, though not more solid foundation, the throne of the Merovingians." The name of Franci is of doubtful origin; but the ferocious courage of the people to whom it belonged, their unquenchable fondness for liberty, and their success in maintaining it, have caused the general belief that this name was intended to designate its possessors as more peculiarly endued with these attributes than any of the people by whom they were environed. While the Franks continued a German people, though we hear of their chiefs, who exercised a kind of royal power, it was by no means of that nature which became afterwards the attribute of sovereignty and the inherent right of the sovereign. Their laws were few and simple; and those which formed the Salic and the Ripuarian customary or prescriptive law, being, in the reign of Dagobert, collected and revised, were formed into a code, the basis and the constitution of those institutions by which France was afterwards to be governed for almost a thousand years, and which still exclude the daughters of its monarchs from the throne. The Franks were converted to christianity in the reign of Clovis, about the period of the establishment of their rule in the ancient province of Gaul.

FRENTĀNI, a people of Samnite origin, but at an early period separated from the Samnites, and constituting a separate and independent state. The little country of the Frentani, though it may at one time have been more widely extended, was, in the time of Augustus, confined within the river Aternus, Pescara, and the Tifernus, Biferno; the former of which separated them from the Marrucini, while the latter flowed between their territory and Campania. Its greatest length was on the Adriatic, from the shores of which it extended in the interior to the borders of Samnium. Strab.—Liv. 9, 45.—App. Civ. Bell. 1, 39.

FRETUM, (the sea), is sometimes applied by way of eminence to the Sicilian Sea, or the straits of Messina. Cæs. C. 1, c. 29.—Flor. 1, c. 26.—Cic. 3, Att. 1.

FRISII, a German people, north of the mouth of the Rhine, and extending thence upon the coast across the Yssel and the canal of Drusus, to the mouth of the Amisea, Ems. The spreading of this canal and the lake which it formed (Vid. Flevo), submerged a great portion of the country of the Frisons or Frisii, which now lies under the Zuyder Zee, or appears at its mouth in the form of the islands Texel, Vlieland, Schelling, Ameland, Schiermonickoog, &c. What remains now constitutes the districts of Friesland, Overyssel, and Groningen.

FRUSINO, now Frosinone, a small town of the Volsci, on one of the branches of the Liris. Juv. 3, v. 223.—Liv. 10, c. 1.—Sil. 8, v. 399.—Cic. Att. 11, ep. 4 and 13.

FUCINUS LACUS, a celebrated Italian lake in the territory of the Marsi, now Lago Fucino and Lago di Celano. The circumference of this lake was not less than 40 miles, and as it had no visible outlet, the surrounding country was frequently inundated by its extensive sheet of water. It was believed, according to a vulgar tradition of the Romans, that the waters of the Pitonius did not mingle with those proper to the lake, but that, preserving a much greater degree of coolness, they passed under the bed of the lake, and emerging again, assumed the name of Aqua Marcia. Suetonius relates that Julius Cæsar and his successor had both intended to secure the neighbouring people from the effects of the inundations of this body of water, by effecting an artificial drain, but that they were deterred by the difficulty and the expense of the undertaking. "The emperor Claudius," proceeds that writer, "entered upon the task of draining the superfluous waters of the Fucine lake, not less from the expectation of gain than from the hope of glory, when several individuals proposed to furnish the means, on condition that they should receive the lands to be thus recovered. After eleven years of labour, although he had kept at the work no less than 30,000 men incessantly employed, he succeeded with the greatest difficulty in excavating a canal of three miles in length through a mountain which he was obliged in part to dig through, and in part absolutely to level." Suet. Claud. 20. The lake, surrounded by a ridge of high mountains, is not more than 12 feet deep on an average. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 56.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

FULGINĀTES, a people of Umbria, whose chief town was Fulginum, now Foligno. Sil. It. 8, v. 462.—Plin. 1, c. 4, l. 3, c. 14.

FUNDANUS, a lake near Fundi in Italy, which discharges itself into the Mediterranean. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 69.

FUNDI, a town of Italy near Caieta, on the Appian road, at the bottom of a small deep bay called Lacus Fundanus. This town was very early admitted to the privileges of Rome, except that the inhabitants were not admitted to the exercise of the right of suffrage, to which the Romans attached so much importance, and which they accorded with such reluctance to the neighbouring districts. This privilege was granted to them A. U. C. 564. The veterans of Augustus afterwards formed a colony in this place. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 34.—Liv. 8, c. 14 and 19, l. 38, c. 36.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Cic. Rull. 2, c. 25.—*Tacit. G.

GABÆ, a city on the northern borders of Sogdiana, supposed by D'Anville to be the same as the present Kauos, and among the first places in which Alexander signalized himself in the countries of the east, beyond the well known regions of the Asiatic peninsula.

GABALI, and GABALES, a people of Aquitania, near the borders of Narbonensis. They were subordinate to the Arverni, and dwelt in the country lying between the possessions of the Cadurci and the Velauni. Their chief town was Anderitum, now Anterieux, in Auvergne. Plin. 4, c. 19.

GABAZA, the same as Gabæ. Curt. 8, 4.

GABELLUS, now La Secchia, a river falling in a northern direction into the Po, opposite the Mincius. Plin. 3, c. 16.

GABII, a city of the Volsci, built by the kings of Alba, but now no longer in existence. It was taken by the artifice of Sextus, the son of Tarquin, who gained the confidence of the inhabitants by deserting to them, and pretending that his father had ill-treated him. Romulus and Remus were educated there, as it was the custom at that time to send there the young nobility, and Juno was the chief deity of the place. The ruins of her famous temple are said to be still visible near a spot called L'Osteria del Pantano. Before this place the banished Camillus retrieved the character of the Romans, who had seen their capital in the hands of the Barbarians, by the final and total defeat of the Gauls. The Cinctus Gabinus was a peculiar mode of folding the toga, which the Gabini are said to have adopted for the sake of giving more ease to their motions when suddenly summoned from a sacrifice to the field. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773, l. 7, v. 612 and 682.—Liv. 5, c. 46, l. 6, c. 29, l. 8, c. 9, l. 10, c. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 709.—Plut. in Romul.

GADES, a town of Bætica in Spain, on the Atlantic, now Cadix, equally important and celebrated in antiquity and among the moderns. It was early founded by the Tyrians, in compliance, according to Strabo, with the command of an oracle. The ancients place it on an island connected by a causeway with the coast of Spain; but the probability is that alluvial changes have transformed the aspect of the coast in that region, and incorporated the former island with the great peninsula. The inhabitants retained to the last the characteristics of the people from whom they sprung, and their vessels were continually seen on every sea which the navigation of their times had been able to compass. "This island," says Strabo, "arrived at such a pitch of fortune, that though it is situated in the farther regions of the earth, it yet surpasses all in fame, and only yields to Rome." Five hundred Roman knights were a part of the stable population of this place; a greater number than any of the towns of Italy could boast with the exception of Padua alone. The Greek name for this place was Gadira, but it was also called Cotynusa. The first was but the Greek form of the Phœnician name, which signified a hedge. After the accession of Octavius to the imperial sceptre, with the title of Augustus, a colony was established at Gades, which took the name of Augusta Julia. On the same island the ancients placed the town of Erythea, sacred to Juno. *Vid. Erythea. GĀDĪTĀNUS SINUS, an arm of the ocean setting into the coast of that part of Spain which is now Andalusia, and was called by the Romans Bætica. It was between the Straits of Gibraltar, Fretum Herculeum, and the mouth of the Bætis, (the Guadalquiver,) and is now called the Gulf of Cadiz.

GADITANUM FRETUM, the same as Herculeum Fretum, or Straits of Gibraltar.

GÆTŪLIA, a country of Libya, near the Garamantes, which formed part of king Masinissa's kingdom. The country was the favourite retreat of wild beasts, and is now called Bildulgerid. The people are called Berbers, and reside in the lofty regions of Atlas. Sallust. in Jug.—Sil. 3, v. 287.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

GALATA, I. a town of Syria.——II. An island near Sicily.——III. A town of Sicily.——IV. A mountain of Phocis.

GĀLĪTÆ, the inhabitants of Galatia. Vid. Galatia.

GĀLĀTIA, or GALLOGRÆCIA, a large country of Asia Minor, originally belonging to Phrygia, having Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the north; Pontus and Cappadocia on the east; on the south, Cappadocia and Phrygia; and Phrygia alone upon the west. This name was given to the country when the Gauls, about 270 B. C., after the defeat of their leader Brennus in his designs against Rome, passing over into Bithynia, extorted from the king a territory for themselves and their posterity. The compound, Gallogræcia, was also derived from this Gallic settlement, and from the Greeks, who, in the time of Alexander, established themselves in the same district of country. The two races must have kept themselves distinct for many generations; since, in the time of St. Paul, when the common dialect was Celtic, we find that apostle addressing the Galatians in the language of Greece, or rather, perhaps, as we should say, in Syro-Greek. The preaching of St. Paul was as much almost as three centuries after the Gallic invasion; and their language, whatever it was, we find to have been still preserved for at least 200 years longer. The principal Gallic tribes which emigrated to these distant seats were the Tolistoboii, who fixed themselves on the borders of Phrygia; the Trocmi, towards Cappadocia; and the Tectosages, who occupied the country in the direction of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. Their chiefs or kings were called by the Greeks, Tetrarchs; and the sovereign power was divided in each district among a number of individuals, of whom no one was absolute or independent of the rest or of the council of nobles. These tetrarchs were long, in fact, dependants upon Rome; under the favour, however, and protection of Pompey, Dejotarus, one of these tetrarchs, obtained the supremacy, and ruled as king alone. To him succeeded Amyntas, the creature of Antony, in whose reign, Galatia, his kingdom, was extended beyond its natural limits, within those of Lycaonia and Pisidia. This extensive region before the death of Amyntas was reduced by Augustus to a province of the empire. At a later period Galatia was divided into two provinces by Theodosius, the second Galatia being called Salutaris. This was a permanent subdivision, confining Galatia within the ancient boundaries, beyond which they had been extended for a time over a part of Pontus and Paphlagonia. On the other hand, the Galatians had lost a portion of the territory that seemed naturally to belong to them, between the mountains and the mouth of the Halys. The principal town of Galatia was Ancyra, the capital of the Tectosages, the modern Angoura; Pessinus, famous for the worship of Cybele, belonging to the same; Gordium, the ancient capital of the country before the arrival of the Gauls, on the Sangarius, and called, on its rebuilding in the time of Augustus, Juliopolis; Tavium, belonging to the Trocmi, on the borders of Pontus, and Eccobriga, a Celtic name, on the Halys. The northern parts of Galatia towards Bithynia rose into mountains, which, with the name of Olympus, divided those countries. The principal rivers, the Sangarius and Halys, arose, the former on the borders of Phrygia, and traversed the western corner of Galatia, passing into Bithynia; and the latter in Cappadocia and the mountains of Cilicia, watering the eastern section of Galatia, and passing from that country between Pontus and Paphlagonia to the sea. The part towards the source of the Sangarius belongs only to Galatia, which claimed the middle course of the Halys, the boundary of the dominions of Crœsus. The name of Gallogræcia, which seems to indicate the origin of the people by whom this part of the peninsula was inhabited, has not been sufficient to allay the doubts which etymologists and others have entertained and excited in regard to the true derivation of the inhabitants of Galatia. It is observed, that the Treveri, whose language was said by St. Jerome to have been the same as that of the Galatians, were a German people, and that Treves was also a city of Germany.

GĀLĒSUS, now Galeso, a river of Calabria, flowing into the bay of Tarentum. The poets have celebrated it for the shady groves in its neighbourhood, and the fine sheep which feed on its fertile banks, and whose fleeces were said to be rendered soft when they bathed in the stream. Martial. 2, ep. 43, l. 4, ep. 28.—Virg. G. 4, v. 126.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 10.

GALILÆA, a part of Palestine, between the coast upon the west, Samaria upon the south, Batanea upon the east, and the mountains of Antilibanus upon the north. It was extremely fertile and populous; and while inhabited by a Jewish population, was the dwelling-place of the tribes of Aser, Naphtali, part, of Dan, together with Zebulon and Issachar. The later Galilæans are known to have been a mingled race of Assyrians and Hebrews, the former established in the country on its subjugation by the Babylonish kings, and the latter, descendants of such of the Jewish tribes as were enabled to conceal themselves in those regions, the property of which was thus transferred to stranger hands. After the extension of the first sect of Christians, and before that name was assumed by them, they were generally designated by the epithet of Galilæan, bestowed on them in derision or contempt. The division of Galilee was into Galilee Superior, towards Phœnicia and the mountains; and Galilee Inferior (the Lower), on the boundaries of Samaria. The former of these was called also Galilæa Gentium, or Galilee of the Gentiles, both on account of its greater remoteness from the limits of Judæa, and from the intermixture of the Tyrian people and manners, which from the time of king Solomon had begun to distinguish the people in the northern parts of his realm. Vid. Decapolis.

GALLIA, properly so called, was bounded on the east by the Rhine, Rhætia, and the Alps, which separate it from Gallia Cisalpina; on the south by the Mediterranean and the Pyrenees; on the west by the ocean; and on the north by the ocean and the Rhine. Thus enclosed on every side by the natural barriers of the mountains, the ocean, the sea, and the Rhine, with a surface happily divided into mountains, and plains, and valleys, watered by fertilizing rivers; Gaul was prepared by nature for the abode of a numerous and enterprising people. Few countries are so advantageously intersected with rivers. The Rhine receives the Mosella, Moselle; the Vahalis, or Waal, joins the Mosa, Meuse, or Maes, which also receives the Scaldis, Scheldt, some distance from its mouth. On the western side of Gaul are the Sequana, Seine, with its tributaries, of which the chief one is the Matrona, Marne; the Ligeris, Loire, which receives the Elaver, Alier; the Garumna, Garonne, with which the Duranius, Dordogne, unites near its mouth; and the Aturus, Adour, near the Base of the Pyrenees. On the southern or Mediterranean side is the Rhodanus, whose tributaries are the Arar, Saone, Isara, Isere, and Druentia, Durance. The principal mountains of Gaul are Jura, Vogesus, Vosges, and Cebenna, Cevennes. Gallia took its name from that of its inhabitants, whom the Romans called Galli, converting into a Latin word the term Celtæ, by which the nation styled themselves; or, perhaps, more properly the word Gaël, whence the Latin Galli and the Greek Γάλαται. Some etymologists have traced the name Celtæ to Κέλης, "a horseman;" and Galatæ, to γαλα, "milk," in reference to the complexion of the Gauls, thus referring both those appellations to the Greek. Properly the Celtæ were the occupants of a third part of Gaul, according to the account of Cæsar; but Diodorus (lib. 5.) informs us, that all the nations from the Pyrenees to Scythia were called Gauls; and we may gather from Strabo that a fourth part of the known world was possessed by the Celtæ; and, in fact, the Germans, Gauls, and even the Hispani, were called Celtæ by the Greeks. The Gauls, who had migrated from eastern regions towards the west, till they had arrived in the country called from them Gallia, having at length attained in this favoured region a degree of prosperity which justified a diminution of the population by migration to other lands, at length determined on sending expeditions in the direction of the land whence their race originally sprung. In the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, the Bituriges enjoyed an ascendency over the rest of the Gallic nations, and their king exercised regal authority over all Gaul. It was at this time that the disposition to migrate manifested itself. Accordingly, Ambigatus king of the Bituriges, gave his nephews Bellovesus and Sigovesus each command over a powerful body of adventurers. The Gauls, under Sigovesus, took the direction of the Hercynian forest, which they passed through; they then penetrated Illyria, and established themselves in Pannonia. This branch of the Gauls, retaining the restless spirit which characterized the nation at large, at length formed a plan of further conquest, B. C. 281. They divided their army into three parts. One directed its efforts against Macedonia, and returned to their homes after having defeated and slain Ptolemy Ceraunus, the Macedonian king. Another division laid waste Ætolia, and advanced to plunder Delphi, under the conduct of Brennus (younger than the conqueror of Rome.) The Gauls were repulsed and almost exterminated, and that by the miraculous interposition of the deity in defence of his favoured shrine, according to the fictions of Grecian superstition. The third branch, commanded by Leonorius and Lutarius, advanced to Thrace, took Byzantium and Lysimachia, Hexamili; and having crossed the Hellespont, successfully aided Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, against Zybœa. They then subdued Ionia and Æolis, and at length established themselves near the Halys, giving name to Galatia or Gallogræcia. Bellovesus took the route by the Alps to Italy, where he defeated, and expelled from their possessions, the Tuscans, who then occupied the country between the Alps and the Padus. Here he founded the city of Mediolanum, Milan. The Cenomani, who had accompanied him, settled in the vicinity of Brixia and Verona; the Salluvii, in the neighbourhood of the Ticinus. The Boii and Lingones, who, upon crossing the Alps, found all the country north of the Po already seized upon, crossed the river, and driving before them not only the Etruscans, but also the Umbrians, established themselves between the Po and the Appenines. The Senones pushed their conquest still farther, and occupied the region bordering on the Hadriatic, and extending from the Ufens, Montone, near Ravenna, to the Æsis, Esino near

Ancona. The northern part of Italy being now in the possession of Gallic tribes, was called Gallia; and, for distinction's sake, the two Gauls were named, in reference to their situation this side or the other side of the Alps as regarded Rome, respectively, GALLIA CISALPINA and GALLIA TRANSALPINA. In the year of Rome 364, A. C. 390, the Gauls under Brennus waged against the Romans the war in which the city was sacked by the Barbarians. After the lapse of nearly three centuries, the Romans seized on a favourable pretext for gaining a footing in Transalpine Gaul, and sent Fulvius Flaccus to aid the Massilians against their troublesome neighbours, the Salii. A few years later, A. U. C. 633, Fabius Maximus and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, having been sent to support the Ædui against the Allobroges and Arverni, subdued that part of Gaul which was at first styled Provincia, and afterwards Narbonensis, from Narbo, now Narbonne. It was surnamed Braccata, from a garment worn by the natives, as Celtic Gaul was called Comata, because the people wore long hair. The Roman possessions in Gaul were confined to the province, until the invasion of Cæsar, more than sixty years after the victories of Fabius. At the time that Gaul was conquered by Cæsar, "three great nations, Celtæ, Belgæ, and Aquitani, distinguished by language as by customs, divided among them the whole extent of Gaul." Vid. Celtica, Belgica, and Aquitania. "When Augustus gave laws to the conquests of his father, he introduced a division of Gaul, equally adapted to the progress of the legions, to the course of the rivers, and to the principal national distinctions, which had comprehended a hundred independent states. For one hundred and fifteen cities (civitates) appear in the Notitia of Gaul, and it is well known that this appellation was applied not only to the capital towns, but to the whole territory of each state. The sea-coast of the Mediterranean, Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, received their provincial appellation from the colony of Narbonne. The government of Aquitania was extended from the Pyrenees to the Ligeris. The country between the Loire and the Seine was styled the Celtic Gaul, and soon borrowed a new denomination from the celebrated colony of Lugdunum, or Lyons. The Belgic lay beyond the Seine, and in more ancient times had been bounded only by the Rhine; but a little before the age of Cæsar, the Germans, abusing their superiority of valour, had occupied a considerable portion of the Belgic territory. The Roman conqueror very eagerly embraced so flattering a circumstance; and the Gallic frontier of the Rhine, from Basle to Leyden, received the pompous names of Upper and Lower Germany. Such, under the reign of the Antonines, were the six provinces of Gaul; the Narbonnese, Aquitaine, the Celtic or Lyonnese, the Belgic, and the two Germanys." (Gibbon.) In the new modelling of the empire by Constantine the Great, Gaul was appointed for the seat of one of the four Præfecti Prætorio. His title, Præfectus Prætorio Galliarum; his government extending over the diocesses of Gaul, Spain, and Britain: this diocess being cast into seventeen provinces, that is to say: 1. Lugdunensis Prima; 2.—Secunda; 3. — Tertia; 4. — Quarta; 5. Belgica Prima; 6.—Secunda; 7.—Germania Prima; 8.—Secunda; 9.—Narbonensis Prima; 10.—Secunda; 11.—Aquitania Prima; 12.—Secunda; 13. Novem-Populana; 14. Viennensis; 15. Maxima Sequanorum; 16. Alpes Graiæ and Penninæ; 17. Alpes Maritimæ. "But long it stood not in this state. For within sixty years after the death of Constantine, during the reigns of Honorius and Theodosius, the Burgundians, a great and populous nation, were called in by Stilico, lieutenant to Honorius the western emperor, to keep the borders of the empire against the French, then ready, with some other of the barbarous nations, to invade the same. The Goths, not long after, by agreement with the same Honorius, leaving their hold in Italy, were vested in Gaul Narbonois, by the gift of that emperor, with a good part of Tarraconensis, one of the provinces of Spain; Aquitanin being soon after added, in regard of the service they had done the empire in driving the Alani out of Spain, then likely to have made a great impression on that country. And in the reign of Valentinian the third, the French, who had long hovered on the banks of the Rhone, taking advantage of the distractions of the empire, ventured over the river; first made themselves masters of Belgic Gaul, and afterwards spread themselves over the rest of the provinces which had not been subdued by the Goths and Burgundians, excepting a small corner of Armorica, then possessed by the Britons."—(Heylin.) A. D. 582, the Burgundians yielded to the overwhelming force of the Franks, who followed up this success by an attack on the dominions of the Goths. Under the pretence of exterminating the Arian heresy, Clovis, the christian hero of the Franks declared war against the Goths, and slew with his own hand their king Alaric, at the decisive battle of Poictiers, which transferred the ample province of Aquitania to the dominion of the Franks, A. D. 506. At length, 25 years after the death of Clovis, in a treaty between Justinian and the sons of Clovis, the sovereignty of the countries beyond the Alps was yielded to the Franks, and thus was lawfully established the throne of the Merovingians, A. D. 536. The population of Gaul in the time of Cæsar, as well as the degree of civilization existing there, has given rise to much discussion. On the former point, if we take as the basis of a calculation the catalogue given by Cæsar of the confederate Belgæ, and make allowance for the women, children, slaves, and such as were incapable of bearing arms, we shall find the probable amount to be more than 30,000,000. D. Hume makes the number as low as 12,000,000; and Wallace, in his dissertation on the population of ancient nations, extends it to 49,000,000. A French critic, Cl. Dulaure, has attempted to overthrow the received opinions in regard to the condition of ancient Gaul, by perverting the meaning of the terms civitas, urbs, and oppidum, as used by Cæsar. He argues, that because civitas is used in reference to Tolosa, Carcasso, and Narbo, cities of the Gallic province, the same term would have been applied to Bibracta, Genabum, and Gergovia, if they had been entitled to rank as towns. But the cases are not parallel. Tolosa, &c., were colonies, and, as such, formed with their respective territories independent states; enjoying, in a greater or less degree, the privileges of Roman citizens and therefore called civitates, in reference to their citizens and the immunities they enjoyed. Had he spoken of those same places without reference to their inhabitants or their privileges, he would have styled them urbes or oppida. When we go beyond the province, we find him still using the appellation civitas, where the people are intended, and not the place merely which they occupied. Thus we read civitas Æduorum, civitas Arvernorum; but not civitas Bibracta, civitas Gergovia, because here the places are intended and not the people. In the latter case, urbs or oppidum are the proper terms. Nor are we to consider, with Dulaure, the Gauls of that period too rude to possess towns. In truth, their early migrations, which indicate an excess of population, lead us to conclude that they must have assembled in towns; and we are justified in this inference, by the fact, that before the Phocæans had set the example of building cities to the Gauls, Bellovesus founded in Cisalpine Gaul the city of Mediolanum. (See this question fully and ably discussed in the reply of de Golbéry to Dulaure, entitled "Dissertatio de antiquis urbibus Galliarum.") Under the Lower empire, "when the government of the church in Gaul had conformed itself to that of the state, the ecclesiastical provinces, if we except those formed by the elevation of a few cities to the dignity of metropolitan sees, correspond with the division of civil provinces. This conformity extends even to the particular cantons of which each province was composed, the ancient civitates, or communities, corresponding for the most part with the ancient dioceses. D'Anville.—Lemaire.—Brotier, ad Tac. 1, p. 367, ed. in 12.—Cæs. Bell. Gall.—Strab. 4.—Senec. 3, Nat. Quæst.—Cic. pro M. Font.—Liv. 5, 34, 35, et seqq. 38, 16.—Plin. 32, 1, 5.—Pausan. 10.—Polyb. 4.—Justin. 25, 2.——CISALPINA. "It is well ascertained, that in times beyond which the annals of Italy do not reach, the whole of that rich country, which now bears the name of Lombardy, was possessed by the ancient and powerful nation of the Tuscans; but that subsequently the numerous hordes which Gaul poured successively over the Alps into Italy, drove by degree the Tuscans from these fertile plains, and at last confined them within the narrow limits of Etruria. The Gauls, having securely established themselves in their new possessions, proceeded to make further inroads into various parts of Italy, and thus came into contact with the forces of Rome. More than two hundred years had elapsed from the time of their first invasion, when they totally defeated the Roman army on the banks of the Allia, and became masters of Rome itself. The defence of the Capitol, and the exploits of Camillus, or rather, if Polybius be correct, the gold of the vanquished, and dangers which threatened the Gauls at home, preserved the state. From that time, the Gauls, though they continued by frequent incursions to threaten and even to ravage the territory of Rome, could make no impression on that power. Though leagued with the Samnites and Etruscans, they were almost always unsuccessful. Defeated at Sentinum in Umbria; near the lake Vadimon in Etruria; and in a still more decisive action near the port of Telamo in the same province, they soon found themselves forced to contend not for conquest, but for existence. The same ill success, however, attended their efforts in their own territory. The progress of the Roman arms was irresistible; the Gauls were beaten back from the Adriatic to the Po, from the Po to the Alps, and soon beheld Roman colonies established and flourishing in many of the towns which had so lately been theirs. Notwithstanding these successive disasters, their spirit, though curbed, was still unsubdued; and when the enterprise of Hannibal afforded them an opportunity of retrieving their losses, and wreaking their vengeance on the foe, they eagerly embraced it. It is to their zealous co-operation that Polybius ascribes in a great degree the primary success of that expedition. By the efficient aid which they afforded Hannibal, he was enabled to commence operations immediately after he had set foot in Italy, and to follow up his early success with promptitude and vigour. As long as that great commander maintained his ground, and gave employment to all the forces of the enemy, the Gauls remained unmolested, and enjoyed their former freedom, without being much burdened by a war which was waged at a considerable distance from their borders. But when the tide of success had again changed in favour of Rome, and the defeat of Asdrubal, together with other disasters, had paralysed the efforts of Carthage, they once more saw their frontiers menaced; Gaul still offered some resistance even after that humbled power had been obliged to sue for peace; but it was weak and unavailing; and about twelve years after the termination of the second Punic war, it was brought under entire subjection, and became a Roman province. Under this denomination it continued to receive various accessions of territory, as the Romans extended their dominion towards the Alps, till it comprised the whole of that portion of Italy which lies between those mountains and the rivers Macra and Rubicon. It was sometimes known by the name of Gallia Togata, to distinguish it from Transalpine Gaul, to which the name of Gallia Comata was applied. Another frequent distinction is that of Ulterior and Citerior. According to Polybius, the whole of the country which the Gauls held was included in the figure of a triangle, which had the Alps and Appenines for two of its sides, and the Adriatic, as far as the city of Sena Gallica, Sinigaglia, for the base. This is, however, but a rough sketch, which requires a more accurate delineation. The following limits will be found sufficiently correct to answer every purpose. The river Orgus, Orca, will define the frontier of Cisalpine Gaul to the north-west as far as its junction with the Po, which river will then serve as a boundary on the side of Liguria, till it receives the Tidone on its right bank. Along this small stream we may trace the western limit, up to its source in the Appenines, and the southern along that chain to the river Rubico, Fiumesino, which falls into the Adriatic near Rimini. To the north, a line drawn nearly parallel with the Alps across the great Italian lakes will serve to separate Gaul from Rhætia and other Alpine districts. The Athesis, Adige, from the point where it meets that line, and subsequently the Po, will distinguish it on the east and south from Venetia; and the Adriatic will close the last side of this irregular figure. The character which is given us of this portion of Italy by the writers of antiquity is that of the most fertile and productive country imaginable. Polybius describes it as abounding in wine, corn, and every kind of grain. Innumerable herds of swine, both for public and private supply, were bred in its forests; and such was the abundance of provisions of every kind, that travellers when at an inn did not find it necessary to agree on the price of every article which they required, but paid so much for the whole amount of what was furnished them; and this charge at the highest did not exceed half a Roman as. As a proof of the richness of the country, Strabo remarks, that it surpassed all the rest of Italy in the number of large and opulent towns which it contained. The wool grown there was of the finest and softest quality; and so abundant was the supply of wine, that the wooden vessels in which it was commonly stowed were of the size of houses. Lastly, Cicero styles it the flower of Italy, the support of the empire of the Roman people, the ornament of its dignity. The division of Cisalpine Gaul into Transpadana and Cispadana is one which naturally suggests itself, and which it will be found convenient to adopt in the description of that extensive province." The whole of this country was distributed among Gallic tribes, the principal of which, with their chief cities, are as follows: Salassi; city, Augusta. Prætoria (Auoste); Orobii, Comum, Bergamum (Como and Bergamo); Cenomani, Cremona, Brixia, Mantua (Cremona Brescia, Mantoua); Lingones, Forum Allieni, Ravenna (Ferrara and Ravenna); Boii, Bononia, Faventia (Bologna, and Faenza); Anamani, Parma (Parma); Insubres, Mediolanum (Milan); Taurini, Augusta Taurinorum (Turin.) Chief rivers; Padus, with its tributaries, Ticinus, Addua, Mincius, Tanarus, and Trebia. Cramer.

Gallipŏlis, a fortified town of the Salentines, on the Ionian Sea.

Gangăridæ, a people near the mouths of the Ganges. They were so powerful that Alexander did not dare to attack them. Some attributed this to the weariness and indolence of his troops. They were placed by Valer. Flaccus among the deserts of Scythia. Justin. 12, c. 8. —Curt. 9, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 27.—Flacc. 6, v. 67.

Ganges, a large river of India, which empties into the Gangeticus Sinus, Bay of Bengal, and which was but little known to antiquity. "The upper part of its course, to the point where it changes from Scythian to Indian, by opening a passage through a chain of mountains, was not known in geography till our days." (D'Anville.) "The Ganges is called by the Hindoos, Padde, and Boora Gonga, or "the river," by way of eminence. This mighty river was long supposed to have its origin on the north side of the Himalah mountains, till the fact came to be doubted by Mr. Colebrook; in consequence of which Lieut. Webb being sent in 1808 by the Bengal government to explore its sources, ascertained that all the different streams above Hurdwar, which form the Ganges, rise on the south side of the snowy mountains. At some places above the confluence with the Jumna, the Ganges is fordable; but its navigation is never interrupted. At a distance of 500 miles from the sea, the channel is thirty feet deep when the river is at its lowest. This depth it retains all the way to the sea, where, however, the settling of sand, by the neutralization of the current, from the meeting of the tide with the stream of the river, produces bars and shallows which prevent the entrance of large vessels. The accessions which the Ganges receives in the spring by the melting of the mountain snow are not considerable. At any great distance from the sources, as at Patna, any cause affecting these sources produces little comparative effect. About 200 miles from the sea, the Delta of the Ganges commences by the dividing of the river. Two branches, the Cossimbazar and the Jellinghy, are given off to the west. These unite to form the Hoogly, or Bhagirathy, on which the port of Calcutta is situated. It is the only branch commonly navigated by ships, and in some years it is not navigable for two or three months. The only secondary branch which is at all times navigable for boats, is the Chandah river. That part of the Delta which borders on the sea is composed of a labyrinth of creeks and rivers called the Sunderbunds, with numerous islands, covered with the profuse and rank vegetation called jungle, affording haunts to numerous tigers. These branches occupy an extent of 200 miles along the shore. The Ganges is calculated to discharge in the dry season 80,000 cubic feet of water in a second; and, as its water has double the volume when at its height, and moves with a greater velocity in the proportion of five to three, it must at that time discharge 405,000 cubic feet. The average for the whole year is reckoned 180,000. That line of the Ganges which lies between Gangootre, or the source of the leading stream, and Sagor island, below Calcutta, is held particularly sacred. The main body, which goes east to join the Brahmapootra, is not regarded with equal veneration. Certain parts of the line now mentioned are esteemed more sacred than the rest, and are the resort of numerous pilgrims from great distances to perform their ablutions, and take up the water to be employed in their ceremonies. Wherever the river happens to run from north to south, contrary to its general direction, it is considered as peculiarly holy. The places most superstitiously revered are the junctions of rivers, called Prayags, the principal of which is that of the Jumna with the Ganges at Allahabad. The others are situated among the mountains. Hurdwar, where the river escapes from the mountains, and Sagor island, at the mouth of the Hoogly, are also sacred. The water of the Ganges is esteemed for its medicinal virtues, and on that account drunk by Mahometans as well as Hindoos. In the British courts of justice, the water of the Ganges is used for swearing Hindoos, as the Koran is for Mahometans and the gospels for Christians. The waters of the Ganges are augmented by many successive tributaries, some of which are very large rivers. On its right bank it receives the Jumna, which has a previous course of 780 miles from the lower range of Himalah between the Sutledge and the Ganges, and falls into the latter at the fortress of Allahabad. It is said to receive at the same point a rivulet under ground, on which account the junction is called, according to Tiefenthaler, Trebeni, or the confluence of three rivers. The Gogra, after forming the eastern boundary of the British district of Kemaoon, which it separates from the Goorkha territory, passes near Fizabad, and joins the Ganges in Berar, where it is called Dewa, being one of the longest tributaries which the Ganges receives. Malte-Brun.

GĂRĂMANTES, (sing. Garamas,) a people in the interior parts of Africa. "Major Rennel and the learned Larcher consider Fezzan as the ancient country of the Garamantes; a point still, however, very doubtful." The name of the modern town Germah resembles that of the ancient Garama. Malte-Brun.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 198, l. 6, v. 795.—Lucan. 4, v. 334.—Strab. 2. —Plin. 5, c. 8.—*Sil. GARGĂNUS MONS, now St. Angelo, a lofty mountain of Apulia, which advances in the form of a promontory into the Adriatic Sea. The promontory is now called Punta di Viesti, and extends between the bays of Rodi and Manfredonia. One of the summits of this hill was called Drium, from which there issued a stream whose waters were of peculiar virtue in healing the disorders of cattle. Horace, Lucan, and Silius Italicus, have celebrated this spot in their verses. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 257.—Lucan. 5, v. 380.

GARGĂPHIA, a valley near Platæa, with a fountain of the same name, where Actæon was torn to pieces by his dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 156.

GARGĂRUS, (plur. a, orum,) a town and mountain of Troas, near mount Ida, famous for its fertility. Virg. G. 1, v. 103.—Macrob. 5, c. 20. —Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 30.

GARUMNA, a river of Gaul, now called Garonne, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and separating Gallia Celtica from Aquitania. It falls into the Bay of Biscay, and has, by the persevering labours of Lewis 14th, a communication with the Mediterranean by the canal of Languedoc, carried upwards of 100 miles through hills and over valleys. Mela, 3, c. 2. According to the early division of the Gallic provinces, when Aquitania was extended to the Liger, this river formed the northern boundary of Novem Populana. In its course it watered the regions of the Garumni, who dwelt near its source, the Nitisbriges, the Bituriges, the Vibisci, and the Santones who occupied the lands from its mouth. This river, the third of the purely Gallic streams in magnitude and importance that empty into the ocean, received the tributary waters of almost all the many rivers and rivulets that drain the provinces of Guienne, Gascony, and Languedoc. Below the mouth of the Dordogne, which discharges itself into the Garonne, a little to the north-west of Bourdeaux, this river expands itself, and assumes the appearance of a bay. Here the name of Garonne is exchanged for that of Gironde, which is used to designate the present department on its southern bank. The canal royal connects the waters of the Garonne with the Mediterranean, uniting with that river above its junction with the Tarn, near the city of Toulouse, and passing through the departments of Upper Garonne, Aude, and Herault, the former Languedoc.

GAUGAMĒLA, a village near Arbela, beyond the Tigris, and between that river, the Bumadus, and the Zabus, where Alexander obtained his second victory over Darius. Curt. 4, c. 9. —Strab. 2 and 16.

GAULUS and GAULEON, I. an island in the Mediterranean Sea. It was contiguous and belonged to Melita (Malta), and is now called Goso.——II. Another, on the coast of Crete towards Libya, called also Goso in modern geography.

GAURUS, a mountain of Campania, famous for its wines. Lucan. 2, v. 667.—Sil. 12, v. 160.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 5, v. 99.

GAZA, a town of Palestine upon the south, and towards the borders of Egypt. It was near the coast between Ascalon and Raphia, and, though destroyed by Alexander, it still occupies its former site, and holds its former name, having been rebuilt after its demolition. This was a principal town of the Philistines, the gigantic offspring of Anak, and was never subdued by the Jews, who waged such unrelenting wars with that people, till the time of the Maccabees. According to Mela, the origin of this name, which was a Persian word signifying treasures, was derived from the circumstance of its being made the depository of a part of his treasures by Cambyses, the Persian king. Vossius, in his commentary upon the Latin geographer, sufficiently establishes, on the contrary, the Hebrew origin of that name. "The port," according to D'Anville, "formed a town at some distance, and a small stream runs a little beyond it." Mela, 1, 11.—Voss. ad Pomp. Mel.

GĒDRŌSIA, a province of Persia, on the Erythrean or Arabian Sea. Its northern boundary was formed by the Bœtius mons, which separated it from Arachosia; the Arbiti montes lay between it and the nearer India; while on the west, its deserts were prolonged in those of Carmania. A few rivers on the coast discharged their feeble waters into the ocean; but towards the mountains, the desert and the desert sands disputed the empire of man. The armies of Semiramis and Cyrus were unable to contend with the inhospitality of these barren and burning regions; and that of Alexander, on its return from India through the same steril tract, lost more than all its battles or its victories had cost or gained. The inhabitants who dwelt by the sea-side, were Ichthyophagi; and the produce of the waves afforded them at once clothing and food. The modern name of the country is Mekran, and Pura, the ancient capital towards the borders of Carmania, is the modern Foreg or Purg. Am.—Strab.

GĔLA, a town on the southern parts of Sicily, about 10 miles from the sea, which received its name from the Gelas. It was built by a Rhodian and Cretan colony, 713 years before the Christian era. After it had continued in existence 404 years, Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, carried the inhabitants to Phintias, a town in the neighbourhood, which he had founded, and he employed the stones of Gela to beautify his own city. Phintias was also called Gela. The inhabitants were called Gelensis, Geloi, and Gelani. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.—Paus. 3, c. 46.

GĔLŌNES, and GĔLŌNI, a people of Scythia, inured from their youth to labour and fatigue. They painted themselves to appear more terrible in battle. They were descended from Gelonus, a son of Hercules. Virg. G. 2, v. 15.—Æn. 8, v. 725.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Claudian in Ruf. 1, v. 315.

GEMONIÆ, a place at Rome where the carcases of criminals were thrown. Suet. Tib. 53 and 61.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 74.

GENĀBUM, a town of Celtic Gaul, upon the Liger, belonging to the Carnutes. Its modern name of Orleans it derived from the name of an ancient people the Aureliani. Cæs. B. C. 7, 3.—Lucan. 1, 440.

GĔNĔVA, an ancient, populous, and well-fortified city, in the country of the Allobroges on the Rhone, as it passes from the Lacus Lemanus, now Lake of Geneva, to form the boundary between France and Savoy. This town, of some repute and importance in the days of Cæsar, was held by the Allobroges, on the borders of the Helvetii, the progenitors of the Swiss. It now belongs to the latter people, giving name to a very large canton.

GENUA, now Genoa, a celebrated town of Liguria. The earliest accounts of this city, which does not appear to have been a very important place in the early ages of Roman history, represent it as taking part with the Romans in the first Punic war, and as suffering the penalty of its adherence, being burnt to the ground by Mago, the Carthaginian general. It was rebuilt by the Romans, and continued, as the capital of Liguria, one of the 11 regions into which Augustus portioned Italy, to belong to them till the overthrow of their empire. About the year 600 of our era, Genua was again laid waste, the Lombards, under their king Alboinus, having taken and pillaged it. The present town was built by Charlemagne, and rapidly increased in ambition and power. As an independent commonwealth, it was at one time mistress of the greater part of the surrounding country of Liguria, and of the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, the Baleares, a part of Tuscany, and even the distant Constantinopolitan suburb of Pera. Its wars with Pisa and Venice, and the facilities which these and other internal dissentions of the Italians gave to foreign powers, deprived Genoa, first of her liberty, then of her independence, and lastly of her political existence. Liv. 21, c. 32, l. 28, c. 46, l. 30, c. 1.

GENŪSUS, now Semno, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Adriatic above Apollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 462.

GERANEIA. The loftiest summit of the Onæi montes, which extended south from the Cithæron mons across the territory of Megaris, was called Geraneia, and was said to afford the only passage through its defiles from the north of Greece to the Peloponnesus. It was fortified in such a manner as to render it almost impracticable. The modern name of this pass is Perbeni-vouni, and it continues to be the avenue for travellers into the Morea. Thucyd.

GERMANIA. The geographical description of Germany for any given era or age, will suffice for that age or that era alone; and the Germany of Tacitus is not the Germany of any other Roman geographer. In order, therefore, that the student may not be rather misled than instructed in our account of this country, it will be necessary to consider it in various sections, as represented in one age by Cæsar, in another by Strabo, in a third by Pliny; and lastly, to compare all these with the relations of the most approved among modern geographers. A second division, applicable more particularly to the moral and ethnographical description of Germany, will require that the period anterior to the Roman occupation, that, during which the conquering legions of the emperors established their name and precarious authority beyond the Rhine, and that which is generally designated as the dark or middle ages, be carefully separated and distinguished. Before attempting the complicated relation of the various divisions, both in regard to time and place, the various people and the infinite geographical changes, we may observe, that the greatest extent of Germany was from the Rhine to the Vistula, and from the Danube to the Northern seas. This was Germany Proper, or the Greater Germany, called also Transrhenana, to distinguish it from the province of Belgic Gaul west of the Rhine, which, from the access of German tribes, and the prevalence of German manners, &c., was called also Germany. This smaller province of that name was considered as altogether distinct from the country called from one of its tribes Germany, and included in the above-defined boundaries; and all that region which is now called Germany, south of the Danube, is to be omitted in the account of Germania Antiqua, of which it was not considered a part. Of the natural divisions of Germany formed by her mountains and rivers, the ancients have transmitted but confused accounts, demonstrating nothing more fully than the ignorance of their authors. Concerning the earliest inhabitants of Germany, it is easy to form plausible theories; and not a doubt remains that the first people of this vast region were Celts, who migrated long before the dawn of history from the regions of the Palus Mæotis towards the farthest west. (Vid. Celtæ.) So far the Gauls and Germans had one origin, and so far they were one people; but the Germans of this race had long been superseded by the Teutonic tribes that in the ages of the Roman dominion occupied the country north of the Danube, and who were justly considered to be a separate people. In order to produce something like a regular succession in the account of the various settlements which we shall have to detail, we shall follow the progress of the early tribes that successively established themselves in Germany. The first branch from the Tanais and the Palus Mæotis appear to have followed the shores of the Baltic and the German seas: a second population, crossing the Vistula and the Oder, fixed themselves for a period between the latter river and the Elbe, in the country now forming a large part of the kingdom of Prussia. These were the Suevic family, which afterwards became and long continued the chief hive of the German migratory tribes. An early detachment that first crossed the Elbe and journeyed towards the borders of the Rhine, were the Semnones, supposed in antiquity the noblest of the Suevic race. To these succeeded the Casti, and the other people living towards the Rhine, from whence the Batavi and all the greater part of the inhabitants of Lower Germany. At the same time the Danish peninsula, then the Cimbric Chersonese from the name of its inhabitants, was peopled by races of men called Cimbri and Teutones; while the still more northern regions, by the gulfs of Finland and Bothnia, were held by the last of the Germanic people called Fenni or Finni, by some authors considered of Sarmatian, and not of Scythian or Germanic origin. Among innumerable tribes of these people, all the country of ancient Germany was distributed in such a manner as to make it almost impossible to define their settlements, more particularly as these were subject to continual change. Without attempting this, we shall pass to the different accounts and descriptions of Germany according to the most authentic writers of antiquity. The first among these, in point of time and authority, is Cæsar in his Commentaries, in which we are only to understand the territory of the Suevi. Of these people the principal were the Semnones, between the Warta and the Oder; the Longobardi, bordering upon the Semnones in the district of Brandenburg; the Angli and Varini, who, with five other tribes, formed one confederacy, and dwelt between the Elbe and the Suevic ocean. The Germania of Strabo, referring to the time of Augustus or Tiberius, included only the country between the Rhine, the Danube, and the Elbe; which last river, according to that geographer, divided Germany into two parts, the known and the unknown. The Germany of Pomponius Mela extended but little beyond that of Strabo. In the works of Pliny we find, however, all Sarmatia, nearly, included in the limits of Germany; but this was at no time, politically considered, a recognised description. He divides all Germany between the Istevones, from the Rhine to the Elbe, and from the ocean to the springs of the Danube; the Erminones, between the Danube and Vindilia; the Vindili along the Baltic and the Cimbric Chersonese; the Ingerones in Scania and Finningia; and the Peucini to the east of all these people as far as the Tanais and the Palus Mæotis. The various emigrations of the Suevic tribes, with particular names which they imparted to the countries in which they took up their abodes, soon reduced the name of Suevia to signify merely the country between the Elbe and the Vistula. It might be possible to give a catalogue of all the subdivisions of the two races of Cimbri and Suevi, the great division of the Teutonic or German family, but such a list would occupy too large a space; and, though of great value in tracing the origin of nations, would not be required to illustrate the writings of antiquity. For that purpose we must examine particularly the Germania Romana. The first conflict of the Romans with the people from beyond the Rhine, when Marius is reported to have made a tremendous slaughter of the united Cimbri and Teutones, was B. C. 114. The seats abandoned by these people were immediately occupied by the Suevi, who already began to extend themselves towards the west. For a long time no interference of the Germans with the Roman provinces gave them a place in Roman history, and we know little of their state. The conquests of Cæsar, and the defeat of Ariovistus, in no respect altered the common limits of Germany and the empire, though they repressed the advances of the Suevi, who had been urging forward towards the borders of the Rhine. The regions of Augustus and Tiberius saw the reduction of Germany to the form of a province; divided, for the most part, among different people, as follows: the country between the Danube and the Rhine, as far as the Mayne, comprising the circle of Suabia, or the Grand Duchy, of Baden and the kingdom of Wirtemburg, was occupied by the Allemani and Marcomanni, of Suevic origin, but early separated and distinguished by their proper name. North of these, along the margin of the Rhine, were the Teucteri, the Usipii, and the Marsaci; extending east towards the Ems, were found the Frisii, the Bructeri, the Batavi, the Chamavi, the Marsii, and the Sicambri, all included in the nation of the Istævones, occupying the modern kingdom of Holland and the Grand Duchies of the Lower Rhine and Hesse Darmstadt. Still farther east the Chauci occupied the region lying between the Ems and the Elbe, towards the mouths of those rivers or the kingdom of Hanover. Between the same rivers, but nearer to their rise, the Cherusci and Catti, possessed the country now divided among the petty states of central Germany. From the Elbe to the Oder, the Suevi, divided into many tribes, of which the Longobardi were the principal, held that which afterwards received the name of Saxony, being themselves no longer the great parent stock of all the German races. "The entrance of the Cimbrian Chersonese, or that which corresponds with modern Holstein, contained two nations highly illustrious in their progress; on one side the Angli, on the other the Saxones. These last were bounded in their primitive state by the issue of the Elbe." The Burgundiones, Guthones, Semnones, and Longobardi, were fixed in those parts which is now formed into Brandenburg. The people of that part of Germania which is now called Pomerania, were Goths, Rugii, and Herules. Bohemia was occupied by the Boii, and the Quadi were settled in Moravia. During the vicissitudes of the Roman empire which preceded and led to its fall, such was, for the most part, the distribution of the countries of Germany. In the latter days of this exhausted power, new names, if not new people, began to figure in Germany, which loses the name for so long a time distinguishing it. The Franks, a league of all the principal German tribes known as the Chauci, Catti, Bructeri, &c. united with the Saxons of the Chersonese, and, pushing across the barriers of the Rhine, began to seek for settlements among the more civilized people of the Roman provinces. Gaul, Hispania, and even the shores of Africa, became the prey of these barbarians. Yet these were not the most formidable enemies that Germany sent forth in the weakness of the Roman power to revenge the wrongs and injuries that it had sustained from it in the days of its prosperity and strength. The Lombards, expelled from their seats by yet more savage tribes, advanced towards the empire; and while a Lombard nation was established in Italy, so much of Germany as had been held by them before now took the name of the Vandili. The same people spread themselves over Pomerania, when the more ancient inhabitants, the Goths and Heruli, passed also to the invasion of the empire. From the northern regions (now Mecklenburg,) the Vandals, in formidable numbers, threatened the defenceless provinces that had vainly trusted to the name and protection of the Roman arms; and their country, thus abandoned, was soon occupied by the Vendili or Wends, who were preparing a powerful empire in the north. Such were the changes that were altering the political geography of Germany while the Franks were engaged in the subjugation of Gaul and the establishment of a German empire upon the Roman side of the Rhine, now no longer a protection against the inroads of the barbarians. (Vid. Franci.) The manners of the Germans were various, according to the tribe and the times; they were, however, all a warlike people, and distinguished alike for the virtues and the blemishes of uncivilized life. Their religion the Romans endeavoured to interpret according to the notions of their own mythology; but very little resemblance existed, in fact, between the rude worship of Germany and the refined religion of Rome. In the middle ages the worship of Odin prevailed, and of this religion were those barbarians who established the Saxon dominion in Britain. In the cosmography of Heylin we find the following remarks upon the origin of the name: "Germany was thus called first by the Romans, (as some conceive,) who, seeing the people both in customs, speech, and course of life, so like those of Gallia, called them brothers to the Gauls. And of this mind is Strabo, who, speaking of the great resemblance which was between those nations, concludes that the Romans did, with very good reason, call them Germans; intending to signify that they were brethren of the Gauls. But this is to be understood of those people only which dwelt next to Gaul, it being very well observed by Tacitus, that Germany was at first nationis non gentis nomen, the name of some nations only and not of all the country. Others will have the name to be merely Dutch, deriving it from Ger, which signified all; and the word man signifying in that language as in ours." Bochart refers the name also to Ger, which he derives from the ancient Gallic, signifying guerre, or war, and supposes that this name of warrior was given to them by the Gauls. The principal rivers of ancient Germany, between its three great boundaries, the Danubius, the Rhenus, and the Vistula, were the Amisia, Ems, which passed through the country of the Francic league; the Visurgis, (or Weser,) which arose in the country of the Cherusci, and, towards its mouth, divided the Chauci into the Greater and the Less; and the Albis, Elbe, dividing the Suevi from the people of Cimbric or Cimbro-Saxon origin, and emptying on the western side of the Cimbric Chersonese. All these rivers flowed into the northern ocean. East of the Albis, the Viadrus, Oder, after draining in several branches the Suevic countries, poured its waters into the Sinus Codanus, now Baltic Sea. Of all these rivers, the chief tributaries were the Menus, Mayne, belonging to the Rhine, into which it flows near Mentz; the Lupia, Lippe, which discharges itself into the same river farther north; and the Sala, which belongs to Thuringia, and empties into the Elbe. A striking feature in the geography of Germany is the mountains, which, in antiquity, under the name of Hercynian, and, in modern times, with the appellation of the Hartz, extend with the woods of the same name over the greater part of the south-west of Germany. Vid. Hercynii Montes.

Gerra, a town of Arabia, "on a little gulf, making a creek of the Sinus Persicus. A city enriched by the commerce of the perfumes brought from the Sabæan country, sent up the Euphrates to Thapsacus and across the desert to Petra. The city, for the construction of whose houses and ramparts stones of salt were used, appears to be represented by that now named el Katif." D'Anville.

Gĕrrhæ, a people of Scythia, in whose country the Borysthenes rises. The kings of Scythia were generally buried in their territories. Herodot. 4, c. 71.

Gerus, and Gerrhus, a river of Scythia. Id. 4, c. 56.

Geronthræ, a town of Laconia, where a yearly festival, called Geronthræa, was observed in honour of Mars. Paus. Lacon. This town belonged to the Eleutherolacones, and was of great antiquity.

Gerunium, a fortified place in Apulia, on the borders of the Frentani, a few miles from Luceria upon the north. It suffered greatly in the wars of Hannibal, being laid waste by that general after his campaign against the temporizing Fabius. The Carthaginians wintered within its walls, and converted its public buildings into store-houses for provisions, &c. Polyb.—Liv. 22, 18.

Gessoriăcum, the name of Boulogne before it assumed that of Bononia, from which its modern appellation is derived.

Getæ, a people of European Scythia, near the Daci. Ovid, who was banished in their country, describes them as a savage and warlike nation. The word Geticus is frequently used for Thracian. Ovid. de Pont. Trist. 5, el. 7, v. 111.—Strab. 7.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 2, v. 61, l. 3, s. 1, v. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 54, l. 3, v. 95. Though the Getæ were unquestionably Goths, and though the whole extensive people who, as Gothi, or under analogous names, invaded the Empire, were also designated sometimes by the term Getæ, yet, in the more limited application of the name, the latter were only the inhabitants of the more eastern parts of Dacia between the Danubius and the Danaster.

Getulia. Vid. Gætulia.

Glaucus sinus, "a gulf which confines Lycia on the side of Caria," now the Gulf of Macri. At the head of this bay stood the ancient town of Telmissus, the modern Macri, whence the name Telmissus, often applied to the Sinus. D'Anville.

Glissas, a town of Bœotia, mentioned by Homer. It was situated on the borders of the Aonius Campus, on mount Hypatus.

Glota, the ancient name of the Clyde.

Glyppia. "This is apparently the fortress called by Polybius Glympes, and which he describes as being in the northern part of Laconia, on the Argive frontier. It has been succeeded by the little town of Cosmopolis, which is also the name of a district of modern Laconia." Cram.—Polyb. 4.

Gnatia. Vid. Egnatia.

Gnossus, a famous city of Crete, the residence of king Minos. This city was situated on the small river Cæratus, now Cartero, which is said to have been the first name of this town. It derived its early importance and splendour from king Minos, who made it the capital of his kingdom; and it is celebrated in the legends of fable for the famous labyrinth of Dædalus, which contained the Minotaur said to have been in its neighbourhood. Long Candia is the modern name applied to the site of the ancient Gnossus. Strab, 10, 476.—Il. Σ. 490.—Cram.

Gomphi, a town in Thessaly, situated on the Peneus, was a place of great strength and importance, as commanding the passes from Epirus into Thessaly. Its modern name is Stagous, according to Meletius; but Pouqueville makes it Cleisoura. Cram.

Gonni, and Gonocondylos, a town of Thessaly at the entrance into Tempe. Liv. 36, c. 10, l. 42, c. 54.—Strab. 4.

Gordiæi, mountains in Armenia, where the Tigris rises, supposed to be the Ararat of scripture.

Gordium, a town of Phrygia, in that part which was afterwards called Galatia, on the Sangarius. Quintus Curtius places it at equal distance from the Euxine and Cilician seas; but his account is not to be followed. D'Anville accords with Ptolemy, and assigns as the site of this city a spot removed from the southern coast about eighty leagues, and from the northern only twenty-five. In the reigns of Gordius, from whom it took its name, and of his successor Midas, Gordium was the capital of Phrygia; and the events which signalized the era of those princes, according to the poets, and to those historians who followed their inventions, have made the city among the most noted of antiquity. (Vid. Gordius and Midas.) In more historical years this city had lost all its splendour and magnificence; but, being rebuilt by order of Augustus, it assumed the name of Juliopolis, and for some time it was comparatively flourishing. In the time, however, of Justinian, it again required the imperial patronage. It is not possible now to define with accuracy its site. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Liv. 38, c. 18.—Curt. 3, c. 1.

Gorgo, the capital of the Euthalites, a tribe of the Chorasmii. Its present name of Urgheaz is the same, says D'Anville, as the Corcany of the eastern geographers.

Gortyn, Gortys, and Gortyna, a principal town in the island of Crete. As second in importance and power to Cnossus, the chief town on the island, Gortyna, ambitious of the highest place, was continually engaged in contests with her rival. It was situated off the coast of the Libyan Sea, on the river Lethe, about nine miles, having at that distance Lebena and Metallum, its ports. In antiquity Gortyna might vie with any of the cities of Greece, its traditionary founder having been Gortys, the son of Tegeates, or, as the Cretans themselves asserted, of Rhadamanthus. It was, however, most probably, like the other cities of Greece and Italy which bore the name of Gortyna, of Pelasgic origin. Modern travellers have been induced, from an examination of Gortyna's very few remains, to fix there the celebrated Labyrinth; but the proof is not sufficiently strong against the concurrent evidence of all antiquity. In the Peloponnesian war this city took part against the Lacedæmonians. The site and ruins of this ancient town are now denominated Metropoli.

Gortynia, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Gothi. The most ancient records and traditions relating to the Goths, refer their first settlement in Europe to Scandinavia, where their name is extant still in that of the extensive tract of country between Sweden Proper and the kingdom of Norway. This region, separated by a narrow strait from the islands of Denmark, and opposite to Rugen and the coast of Pomerania on the narrowest part of the Baltic, is called Gothland, and was most probably the first established seats of the Gothi in Europe. Originally one extensive nation, the Gothi and the Vandali, in the progress of years, became divided, as a consequence of numbers and of frequent migration. Each people, however upon this separation, appeared in subsequent history sufficient for the conduct of the most adventurous enterprises and the subversion of the best established empires. The Goths themselves were subdivided into Ostro Goths and Visi Goths, referring to their relative geographical situation most probably, after the passage of the Baltic Sea; besides which were the Gepidæ, who also belonged, as may be gathered from a comparison of manners and a collation of records, to this division of the Scandinavian horde. The Lombards, Burgundians, and Herulians, are merely to be mentioned as of Gothic blood; in Europe they made themselves known as a distinct people, or connected at most with the Vandalic stem. From the shores of the Baltic the first migration of the Goths conducted them through the savage region that intervened, to the countries lying on the Euxine Sea. From this sea they next opened themselves a passage to the southern branch of the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Prypee of the present day, their numbers increasing at each march by the Venedi and Bastarnæ, who united with them in their devastations, allured by their success or terrified by their irresistible power. The province of Dacia, reduced but not subdued by the arms of Trajan, offered little resistance to the entrance of the Goths, now fixed on its confines; and through this unresisting country, abandoning the Ukraine, they passed, in the reign of the Roman emperor Decius, into the second Mœsia, a civilized province and colony of the Empire. The events of this war exalted the character of the Barbarians, and struck a fatal blow to the vanity of Rome; the Goths advanced as far as Thrace, defeated the emperor in person on their way, and secured an introduction within the now defenceless limits of the Empire at any future time. Their removal, on this occasion, was only effected by the payment of tribute, which Rome, still boasting her empire over the world, was content to pay to an undisciplined and half-armed tribe of barbarians. Such was the result of the first descent of the Goths upon the outposts of the Roman dominion, A. D. 262. Diverted from the western territory of the Empire, the Goths next turned to the no less inviting regions of the east. They seized on the Bosphorus, and, passing over into Asia, they acquired an incalculable booty, effecting the subjugation of all the country through which they passed, and which offered scarcely a show of resistance to their dreaded arms. This is recorded as the first naval expedition of the Goths. A second succeeded, and a third, which brought these northern barbarians before the Long Walls of Athens, the once famous Piræus. The whole of Greece on the main land was ravaged in this descent of the Goths, who pursued their way to the borders of the sea, beyond which they could behold the coasts of Italy, which had not yet been violated by the foot of a barbarian. Here they paused in their career of devastation and victory; numbers were induced to submit to the authority of the Roman empire, and incorporated with the soldiers of the emperor. The rest returned, with various fortune and adventures, to their seats in the Ukraine and on the borders of the Euxine Sea. Innumerable wars succeeded the period of this great expedition of the Goths, in which the Romans were not always sufferers; yet the Gothic power steadily increased till the appearance of an enemy as formidable as they themselves had been when they first broke the bounds of their native wilderness, who threatened war and ruin no less to the half civilized people who had preceded them in their march towards the rich capital of the world, than to that capital itself. The kingdom of the Ostro Goths then extended from the Baltic to the Euxine Sea, and its throne was occupied by Hermanric, one of their greatest princes, who ruled over an immense number of tribes. The Visi Goths, at the same time, occupied the banks of the Niester and the German side of the Danubius. Before the valour and ferocity of the Huns and Alani, these once dreaded conquerors were either prostrated or put to flight; and the barbarians, who had so often sent terror to the gates of Rome, now begged its clemency, and sued to be taken under its protection and received into the Empire. The emperor Valens was then upon the throne; and in his reign the Visi Goths were transported as tributaries and subjects within the ancient limits, which had not yet receded from the Danube and the Rhine. Established in Mœsia, and for a time beyond the fear of the Sarmatians, the Goths soon began to forget their allegiance, and to desire, if not to enjoy, their old independence. The next Gothic war was conducted, therefore, within the boundaries over which the Roman emperor pretended to rule; and the conflict was no longer for the integrity of the empire, but for its existence. Huns, Alani, Ostro Goths, and Visi Goths, united in this war; but the death of the Gothic leader, and the accession of Theodosius in the east, preserved yet a little longer the Empire and its name. For some time after this, the principal seats of the Gothic tribes were in Thrace and on the coast of Asia Minor, in which, in some measure, they resided as the stipendiaries of the emperor. The reigns of the successors of Theodosius were coeval with the elevation of Alaric to the throne of the Visi Goths; and the wars of that people were renewed with a spirit which proved that they had not yet accustomed themselves to look upon the Romans as other than their enemies, and that they considered them still as legitimate a prey as when they first broke into their empire from the regions of the north. In the year 410 the city of Rome fell into the hands of these long-aspiring warriors; and all Italy, that had so long been the privileged destroyer of nations, experienced the retributive justice which had for ages been invoked against her ambition. But no permanent empire succeeded the occupation of the Goths, and the death of Alaric terminated their sovereignty in Italy. Very soon afterwards, however, they obtained a less illustrious dominion in Gaul, in which they occupied the whole of the 2d Aquitaine on the sea-coast from the Garonne to the Loire. From this comparatively narrow territory, and which, moreover, they enjoyed but as subjects of Rome, the Goths extended themselves over all the other southern parts of Gaul, and crossing the Pyrenees, established a new monarchy in Spain. We have thus traced the progress of the Visi Goths to their final settlement in that part of the Empire which they were to hold as a permanent possession; they here become the progenitors of the modern Spaniards, and require no longer notice from the historian of antiquity. The fortunes and fate of the other races were not yet decided; but a branch of one of them, the Heruli, was destined very soon afterwards to put an end to the still remaining name and office of imperial power, and to fix a Barbarian throne in the seat of universal empire. The reign of Odoacer, however, and his Heruli, can hardly be placed to the account of the Goths, so long had that branch been severed from the original stem. When the Visi Goths became satisfied with the possession of Hispania, another numerous horde, the Ostro Goths, still roamed without dominion equal to their courage and their wants. The last years of the reign of Odoacer embroiled him with the leader of those still craving marauders; and the overthrow of the Heruli, and of the first Barbarian empire in Italy, was succeeded by the reign of Theodoric and the dominion of the Ostro Goths, A. D. 493. About 60 years afterwards the eunuch Narses, at the head of the forces of Justin emperor of the east, put an end to the Gothic usurpation in Italy. The above account is furnished by the accredited authority of history; but another inquiry concerning the origin of the Goths proceeds upon other data, and innumerable theories supply the place of authenticated fact. Two only seem deserving here of particular notice; the first involving the question, "were the Goths Scythians?" and the second, that of their affinity with the Germans. It seems, the better arguments are brought to prove that, in the early settlement of Europe, when a second migration from the east impelled the Celtæ beyond the Danube and the Rhine, a division of the great Teutonic horde occurred; that a large portion directed itself beyond the Sinus Codanus towards the wild countries of the present Sweden and Norway, while the rest proceeded towards the centre of Europe. These latter people were the Germans; the former were the Scandinavians, who, at a later period recrossed the gulf or sea, and, with the name of Goths, &c. possessed themselves of the abodes which the Germans, pressing on towards the limits of the empire, were abandoning almost from day to day.

Græcia. "It is universally acknowledged that the name of Hellas, which afterwards served to designate the whole of what we now call Greece, was originally applied only to a particular district of Thessaly. At that early period, as we are assured by Thucydides, the common denomination of Hellenes had not yet been received in that wide acceptation which was afterwards attached to it, but each separate district enjoyed its distinctive appellation, derived mostly from the clan by which it was held, or from the chieftain who was regarded as the parent of the race. In proof of this assertion the historian appeals to Homer, who, though much posterior to the siege of Troy, never applies a common term to the Greeks in general, but calls them Danai, Argivi, and Achæi. The opinion thus advanced by Thucydides finds support in Apollodorus, who states, that when Homer mentions the Hellenes, we must understand him as referring to a people who occupied a particular district in Thessaly. The same writer observes, that it is only from the time of Hesiod and Archilochus that we hear of the Panhellenes. Scylax, whose age is disputed, but of whom we may safely affirm that he wrote about the time of the Peloponnesian war, includes under Hellas all the country situated south of the Ambracian gulf and the Peneus. Herodotus extends its limits still further north, by taking in Threspotia, or at least that part of it which is south of the river Acheron. But it is more usual to exclude Epirus from Græcia Propria, and to place its north-western extremity at Ambracia, on the Ionian Sea, while mount Homole, near the mouth of the Peneus, was looked upon as forming its boundary on the opposite side. In Græcia Propria were the following divisions: Thessalia, Acarnania and its islands, Ætolia and Athamania, Doris, Locris, and Eubœa, Phocis, Bœotia, Attica, and Megaris. The Peloponnesus and its provinces, together with the adjacent islands, form the third and last portion of the whole. The northern boundary of the Grecian continent is formed by the great mountain-chain, which, branching off from the Julian Alps near the head of the Adriatic, traverses those extensive regions known to the ancients under the names of Illyria, Dardania, Pæonia, and Thrace, and terminates at the Black Sea. The principal summits of this central ridge are celebrated as the Scardus, Orbelus, Rhodope, and Hæmus of antiquity, and constitute some of the highest land of the European continent. Of the seas which encompass Greece, that on the western side was called Ionium Mare; the portion of it which at present bears the name of Adriatic, or gulf of Venice, being termed by the Greeks Ionius Sinus. This was reckoned to commence from the Acroceraunian promontory on the coast of Epirus, and the Iapygian promontory on that of Italy. On the south-east the Peloponnesus was bounded by the Cretan Sea, which divided it from the celebrated island whence its name was derived. Strabo, in his view of Greece, which is peculiar to himself, divides it into five peninsulas, the first of which is Peloponnesus, separated from the Grecian continent by an isthmus of forty stadia. The second is reckoned from the town of Pagæ, on the Corinthian gulf, to Nisæa, the haven of Megara; the distance of this isthmus is one hundred and twenty stadia. The third is enclosed within a line drawn from the extremity of the Crissæan bay to Thermopylæ, across Bœotia, Phocis, and the territory of the Locri Epicnemidii, a space of five hundred and eight stadia. The fourth is defined by the gulf of Ambracia and the Melian bay, separated from each other by an isthmus of eight hundred stadia. The fifth is terminated by a line traced also from the Ambracian gulf across Thessaly, and part of Macedonia, to the Thermaicus Sinus. No part of Europe, if we except Switzerland, is so mountainous throughout the whole of its extent as Greece, being traversed in almost every direction by numerous ridges, the summits of which, though not so lofty as the central range of the Alps, attain, in many instances, to the elevation of perpetual snow. The most considerable chain is that which has been described as forming the northern belt of Greece, and which divides the waters that mix with the Danube from those that fall into the Adriatic and Ægean. It extends its ramifications in various directions throughout the ancient countries of the Dalmatians, Illyrians, Pæonians, Macedonians, and Thracians, under different names, which will hereafter be more particularly specified. Of these the Scardus and Candavii montes are the most important and extensive. Striking off nearly at right angles from the central chain on the borders of ancient Dalmatia and Dardania, they served to mark the boundaries of Illyria and Macedonia; thence continuing in the same direction, under the still more celebrated name of Pindus, they nearly divided the Grecian continent from north to south, thus separating Epirus from Thessaly, and the waters of the Ionian Sea from those of the Ægean. and uniting at length with the mountains of Ætolia, Dolopia, and Trachinia. From Pindus the elevated ridges of Lingon, Polyanus, and Tomarus, spread to the west over every part of Epirus, and finally terminate in the Acroceraunian mountains on the Chaonian coast. The Cambunii montes branch off in the opposite or eastern direction, and form the natural separation between Macedonia and Thessaly, blending afterwards, near the mouth of the Haliacmon, on the Thermaic gulf, with the lofty summits of Olympus. The latter runs parallel to the sea, as far as the course of the Peneus, and is succeeded by the chain of mount Ossa, and this again by mount Pelion, along the Magnesian coast. At a lower point in the great Pindian range, where it assumes the appellation of Tymphrestus, mount Othrys stretches eastward, thus forming the southern enclosure of the great basin of Thessaly, and terminating on the shores of the Pagasæan bay. Mount Œta is situated still further to the south. After forming near the mouth of the Sperchius the narrow defiles of Thermopylæ, it encloses the course of that river in conjunction with the parallel ridge of Othrys, and after traversing the whole of the Grecian continent from east to west, unites, on the shores of the Ambracian gulf, with the mountains of the Athamanes and Amphilochians. Connected with mount Œta, in a south-westerly direction, are Corax and Aracynthus, mountains of Ætolia and Acarnania; while more immediately to the south are the celebrated peaks of Parnassus, Helicon, and Cithæron, which belong to Phocis and Bœotia. A continuation of the latter mountain, under the names of Œnean and Geranean, forms the connecting link between the great chains of northern Greece with those of the Peloponnesus. The principal rivers of Greece are furnished, as might naturally be expected, by the extensive provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, and Illyria. In Thrace we find the Hebrus, Maritza, and Strymon, Stroumona; in Macedonia, the Axius, Vardar, the Erigonus, Kutchuk, the Lydias, Caraismak, and the Haliacmon, Indje Mauro. In Illyria, the Drilo, Drino, the Genusus, Scombi, and the Apsus, Ergent. Some considerable streams flow also into the Ionian Sea from the mountains of Epirus; such as the Aous, now Voiousa, the Aracthus, or river of Arta; and still further south, the rapid but troubled Achelous, now Aspropotamo. In Thessaly, the Peneus, named by the modern Greeks Salembria, takes its rise from Pindus, and, after collecting numberless tributary streams, traverses the famous gorge of Tempe, and falls into the gulf of Therme. The Sperchius, now Helliada, a river of southern Thessaly, coming from mount Tymphrestus, is received into the Maliac gulf a little to the north of Thermopylæ. The Cephissus, now Mauro, rises in the Phocian mountains, and, after flowing through part of that province and of Bœotia, empties itself into the Copaic lake. The Asopus, Asopo, passes through the southern plains of Bœotia, and is lost in the narrow sea which separates the continent from Eubœa. Lastly, we may mention the Evenus, now Fidari, a river of ancient Ætolia, which falls into the Corinthian gulf a few miles to the east of the Achelous. The most considerable lakes of Greece are those of Scutari and Ochrida in Illyria, the Labeatis Palus and Lychnitis Palus of ancient geography. In Macedonia, those of Takinos and Betchik, near the Strymon, answer to the Cercinitis and Bolbe. In Epirus, the lake of Ioannina is perhaps the Pambotis Palus of Eustathius. Frequent mention is made by classical writers of the Lacus Bœbias, now Carlas, of Thessaly. Ancient historians have also noticed some lakes in Acarnania and Ætolia, the most considerable of which was that of Trichonium, now Vrachori, in the latter province. In Bœotia, the lake of Copæ has exchanged its name for that of Topolias. An inquiry into the origin of the earliest settlers in ancient Greece seems to be one of those questions from which no satisfactory result is to be expected, all that has hitherto been written on the subject having only served to furnish additional proof of the doubt and obscurity in which it is enveloped. Strabo represents Greece, on the authority of Hecatæus the Milesian, as inhabited, in remote ages, by several barbarian tribes, such as the Leleges, Dryopes, Caucones, and Pelasgi, with the Aones, Temmices, and Hyantes. These apparently overspread the whole continent of Greece, as well as the Peloponnesus, and were in possession of that country when the migrations of Pelops and Danaus, of Cadmus and the Phœnicians, and of the Thracians headed by Eumolpus, produced important changes in the population, and probably in the language, of every portion of the territory which they occupied. The tribes here enumerated by Strabo must therefore be considered as the most ancient inhabitants of the Hellenic continent which are known to us; but to attempt to discriminate between their respective eras with the scanty materials which have reached us, would probably be a task surpassing the abilities of the most indefatigable antiquary. If it be necessary, however, to adopt some decided opinion on the subject (and in such obscure and complicated questions, it seems difficult to avoid falling into some system,) we should be inclined to follow the notions of the learned Mannert. With respect to the Leleges, and the other tribes above enumerated, he regards them as the original inhabitants of the Grecian continent, and prior to the Pelasgi, though, on account of their wandering habits, they were not unfrequently classed with that more celebrated race. He grounds his opinion on a passage of Hesiod, which speaks of the Leleges as coeval with Deucalion, together with other citations adduced from Strabo, in the place already referred to. Aristotle assigns to them Acarnania, Locris, and Bœotia. Pausanias leads us to suppose they were established at a very early period in Laconia, for he speaks of Lelex as the oldest indigenous prince of that country. It appears that they were not confined to the continent of Greece, since we find them occupying the islands of the Archipelago in conjunction with the Carians, an ancient race, with whom they were so much intermixed as to become identified with them. We know also from Homer, that a portion of this widely diffused tribe had found its way to the shores of Asia Minor. Belonging to the same stock were the ancient Curetes of Ætolia and the Teleboæ and Taphii, pirates of Acarnania and the islands situated near its shores. We may also consider the Acarnanians and the Ætolians themselves as descended from this primitive race though the latter were associated with a colony from Peloponnesus, of which the leader's name prevailed over that of the indigenous Curetes. Little seems to be known of the Caucones, who, together with the Leleges, are ranked by the historian Hecatæus among the earliest nations of Greece. We collect from Homer that they inhabited the western part of Peloponnesus, which account is confirmed by Herodotus. Homer, however, in another place enumerates them among the allies of Priam, which leads to the conclusion that they had formed settlements in Asia Minor, as well as the Leleges. In support of this supposition, Strabo affirms that many writers assigned to the Caucones a portion of Asia Minor near the river Parthenius; and he adds, that some believed them to be Scythians, or Macedonians, while others classed them generally with other tribes, under the name of Pelasgi. In his own time, all trace of the existence of this ancient race had disappeared. The Dryopes seem to have first settled in the mountainous regions of Œta, where they transmitted their name to a small tract of country on the borders of Doris and Phocis. Dicæarchus, however, extends their territory as far as the Ambracian gulf. We know from Herodotus that they afterwards passed into Eubœa, and from thence into Peloponnesus and Asia Minor. It is worthy of remark, that Strabo ranks the Dryopes among those tribes chiefly of Thracian origin, who had from the earliest period established themselves in the latter country towards the southern shores of the Euxine. To the same primeval times must be referred the Aones, who are said to have occupied Bœotia before the invasion of Cadmus, and the reign of Cecrops in Attica; we hear also of the Ectenes, Hyantes, and Temmices, which probably belonged to the same family, from the circumstance of their having all held possessions of that fertile portion of Greece. We are now to speak of the Pelasgi, a numerous and important people, and, as such, entitled to a greater share of our notice than any of the primitive Grecian tribes hitherto enumerated. To examine, however, all the ancient traditions which have been preserved relative to this remarkable race, and still further to discuss the various opinions which have been upheld respecting its origin in modern times, would of itself occupy a volume, and consequently far exceed the limits of a work designed for more general purposes. We shall therefore endeavour to present the reader with a summary account of what has been transmitted to us by the ancients, as well as of the conclusions to which modern critics have arrived, on this subject. We may observe that almost all the historians, poets, and mythologists of antiquity, derive their appellation from a hero named Pelasgus, though they differ in their account of his origin. Some supposing him to have sprung from the earth, others representing him to be the son of Jupiter and Niobe. They concur also in attributing to the Pelasgi the first improvements in civilization and in the arts and comforts of life. They were not confined to one particular portion of Greece, for we find them spread over the whole country; but they are stated to have occupied, more especially, Epirus and Thessaly, parts of Macedonia and Thrace, the shores of the Hellespont and the Troad, together with the Cyclades and Crete, Bœotia and Attica; in the Peloponnesus, Achaia, Arcadia, and Argolis. We have already had occasion to notice their numerous and extensive settlements in Italy; such were, in fact, the migratory habits of this people, that they obtained in consequence the nickname of πελαργοι or storks, from the Athenians; and we have reasons for believing that the term of Pelasgi was afterwards applied to tribes which resembled them in regard to the frequency of their migrations, although of a different origin. We cannot doubt, however, the existence of a nation specifically so designated, since we find it mentioned by Homer in his account of the allies of Priam. Great and universal, however, as was the ascendency usurped by the Pelasgic body in the earliest ages of Greece, its decline is allowed to have been equally rapid and complete. In proportion as the Hellenic confederacy obtained a preponderating power and influence, the Pelasgic name and language lost ground, and at length fell into such total disuse, that in the time of Herodotus and Thucydides scarcely a vestige remained, to which those historians could refer, in proof of their former existence. Such are the general facts relative to the history of the Pelasgi, which are founded on the universal testimony of antiquity; but the origin of this once celebrated people is far from being equally well attested; and, as it is a point which seems materially connected with the history of the first population of Greece, we may perhaps be permitted to take this opportunty of investigating the subject somewhat more in detail than we have hitherto ventured to do. With regard, then, to the origin of the Pelasgi, two conflicting systems, principally, are presented to our notice, each of which, however, seems to obtain support from antiquity, and has been upheld by modern critics with much learning and ingenuity. The one considers the Pelasgi as coming from the northern parts of the Grecian continent, while the other derives their origin from Peloponnesus, and thus regards that peninsula as the centre from which all their migrations proceeded. The latter opinion, it must be confessed, rests on the positive statement of several authors of no inconsiderable name in antiquity; such as Pherecydes, Ephorus, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Pausanias, who all concur in fixing upon Arcadia as the mother country and first seat of the Pelasgi; while the former notion is not, we believe, positively maintained by any ancient author. But this silence cannot be deemed conclusive; and, on the examination of facts and probabilities, we shall find a much greater weight of evidence in its favour. To this conclusion Salmasius long since arrived, and after him the abbé Geinoz; and the opinion has been, we conceive, materially strengthened by the researches of the learned author of the Horæ Pelasgicæ. Larcher, however, and the French critics of the present school, appear still to adhere to the authority of Dionysius, or rather to that of the genealogists whose accounts he principally follows. Were we to look to probabilities alone, we should at once discredit a theory which attributed the origin of so numerous a people, as the Pelasgi undoubtedly were, to Peloponnesus generally; but still more so, when they are referred to a small mountainous district in the centre of that peninsula. Without pretending to deny that the Arcadians were among the first settlers in the Peloponnesus, it must be urged, that it seems utterly incredible they should have ever had the means of extending their colonies throughout Greece, and even to Italy, in the manner ascribed to them; or, if there is any truth in these accounts, we must presume that the Arcadia of that early age was much more extensive than the small Peloponnesian tract to which the Grecian historians so often allude. If we concede to Arcadia, properly so called, the honour of having given birth to the Pelasgic race, we must allow also that Laconia was the mother country of the Leleges, according to the tradition mentioned by Pausanias; and thence it must follow, that the whole of Greece derived its population from the Peloponnesus, a fact not only improbable in itself, but also in contradiction to history, which, with little exception, represents the stream of Grecian migration as flowing from north to south. It will not surely be asserted that those vast countries which lie to the north of Hellas were yet unpeopled, while the island of Pelops was sending forth such swarms of warriors to occupy distant and unknown regions, or that the hordes of Illyria, Pæonia, Macedonia, and Thrace, were less adventurous than the barbarians of Arcadia. If these suppositions cannot be admitted, we shall be led to conclude that the above-named extensive countries not only furnished the primitive population of Greece, but also from time to time supplied those numerous bands of adventurers, who, under the name of Pelasgi, first paved the way for the introduction of civilization and commerce amongst her savage clans. That Asia Minor also contributed to the peopling of Greece can scarcely be doubted, when we notice the remarkable fact, that all the earliest Grecian tribes were known to have possessed settlements on the former continent before the siege of Troy. But the constant interchange which seems to have subsisted from the earliest period between the inhabitants of Thrace and Macedonia, and their neighbours on the opposite shores of the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, rather prevents our arriving at any determinate conclusion on this part of the inquiry. Let us now examine what confirmation can be derived from antiquity in support of a theory which has been hitherto defended on the score of probability alone. In the first place then we may collect from Herodotus, that, at the remotest epoch to which his historical researches could attain, Epirus and the western regions of northern Greece were largely peopled by the Pelasgi, whence it received the name of Pelasgia, which it continued to bear till it was superseded by that of Hellas. The existence of this people in the mountains and plains of northern Thessaly, in very distant times, is abundantly proved by the names of Pelasgiotis, and Pelasgic Argos, which were applied to the particular districts which they had occupied. Still further north, we follow them with Justin into Macedonia, and their possession of that country is also confirmed by Æschylus, as he extends Pelasgia to the banks of the Strymon. We have also numerous authorities to prove the establishment of the same people, at a period of uncertain, but doubtless very early date, in the isles of Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. It has been asserted, indeed, by some writers, that these islands were the seat of the first Pelasgi, and it may be observed by the way, that this maritime situation might lead to a connexion between the people whose origin we are now discussing and the Phœnicians, who had formed similar settlements, and in times equally remote, in the Cyclades. Of all the Pelasgic tribes, the most celebrated, as well as most important, was that of the Tyrrheni. Assuming, then, that the Tyrrheni formed one of the most ancient and numerous branches of the Pelasgic body, we are induced to fix their principal Grecian settlements in Epirus, because, according to Herodotus and other writers, that province was their earliest and most extensive abode; and it was from thence that they crossed over, as we are told, to the opposite shores of Italy. We shall thus also be able to account for a curious tradition preserved by one of the scholiasts to Homer, who tells us in a note to Il. II. 235.

Σοὶ ναίουσ' ὑποφῆται ἀνιπτόποδες χαμαιεῦναι, that, according to Alexander of Pleuron, the Selli were descended from the Tyrrheni, and worshipped Jupiter, according to their native custom, in the manner described by the poet. These Selli, as is well known, were possessed of the temple and oracle of Dodona, and were accounted one of the most ancient tribes of Greece according to Aristotle; so that, if the Tyrrheni were their progenitors, these must have been ἀρχαιότατοι. The Γραῖκοι, from whose name the Latin word Græci is doubtless derived, were probably another branch of the same Pelasgic stock, as Aristotle names them in conjunction with the Selli, and places them in the same part of Greece, that is, about Dodona and the Achelous. He adds, that the Γραῖκοι were afterwards called Hellenes, which is confirmed by the Parian Chronicle and Apollodorus, who quotes the word from many ancient writers. It is certainly remarkable that the Latins should have constantly employed an obsolete appellation to designate a people, with whom they were afterwards so much better acquainted under that of Hellenes; and the fact can only be satisfactorily explained by admitting that a frequent intercourse existed between Epirus and Italy before the name of Hellenes had been generally substituted for that of Græci; and this surmise is in perfect harmony with the well-authenticated accounts of the Pelasgic migrations into the latter country. As Strabo expressly remarks that the Epirotic nations were descended from the Pelasgi, we can have little doubt that this statement applies to the Chaones, Molossi, and Thesproti, who at a subsequent period constituted the main population of that part of Greece. The latter are indeed positively classed with the Pelasgi by Herodotus, when he states that Thesprotia was once called Pelasgia. If we now pass into Thessaly, we shall find another considerable part of the Pelasgic race settled in that rich province under the name of Æolians. Herodotus is we believe the only writer who positively ascribes the conquest of this country to the Thesprotian Pelasgi, at which period he says it bore the name of Æolis. Strabo, however, seems to have been aware of such a tradition. But whatever opinion we adopt as to this particular fact, we can have no hesitation in admitting the Pelasgic origin of the ancient Æolians, as it is clearly acknowledged by Strabo, and is also farther confirmed by the affinity which has been traced between the language of the Pelasgi and the Æolic dialect. If we concede this point, it is clear that we must regard the Hellenes and the Achæi as springing from the same stock, although, in the first instance, they were certainly confined within the limits of Thessaly, and are always alluded to by Homer in that restricted sense. It will, perhaps, be objected to this classification, that we generally find the Hellenic name opposed to that of the Pelasgic, but it does not follow that they are thereby distinguished as being of a different race; it would rather seem that they are compared together in a political point of view, from each in its turn having become widely diffused, and having exercised the greatest influence over those countries in which it had taken root. According to Herodotus, the Athenians were also originally Pelasgi: this fact he has twice asserted in different parts of his work; nor has he ever, we believe, been contradicted by any ancient author. Larcher, however, in his examination of the Chronology of Herodotus, has entered into a long dissertation to prove that that writer was misinformed on this point. The real truth seems to be, that the learned Frenchman, in his endeavour to derive all the Pelasgic migrations from the Peloponnesus, found this assertion of Herodotus incompatible with his system, and therefore attempted to set it aside. Until more solid reasons therefore can be adduced against the testimony of so accredited an historian, we must allow his authority to remain unshaken, and admit that the Athenians, in the earliest period of their history, were Pelasgi, and bore the specific appellation of Cranai before they assumed that of Cecropidæ. It is well known that they, with many other tribes under similar circumstances, afterwards became incorporated with the Hellenes. We shall now conclude this section with a short account of the dialects of Greece, as it is furnished by Strabo. 'Greece,' says that accurate geographer, 'contains many nations, but the principal ones are equal in number to the dialects spoken by the Greeks, which consist of four. Of these, the Ionic may be said to be the same as the ancient Attic, since the inhabitants of Attica were once called Ionians, and from these were descended the Ionians, who founded colonies in Asia Minor, and used the dialect which we call Ionic. The Doric is the same with the Æolic, as all the Greeks without the Isthmus, if we except the Athenians and Megareans, and those Dorians who dwell in the vicinity of Parnassus, are even now called Æolians. It is also probable that the Dorians, being few in number, and inhabiting a most rugged soil, long retained their primitive language, as they had but little intercourse with their neighbours, and adopted different customs from those of the Æolians, with whom they formerly were united by ties of consanguinity. This was also the case with the Athenians, who occupied a poor and barren country, and consequently were less exposed to invasion; hence they were accounted indigenous, as Thucydides reports, since none were induced to covet their territory, and to seek to wrest it from them. This therefore was the reason why so small a people remained always unconnected with the other nations of Greece, and used a dialect peculiar to itself. The Æolians were not confined to the countries without the Isthmus, but occupied also those which were situated within; these, however, became subsequently intermixed with the Ionians who came from Attica, and who had established themselves in the Ægialus; and likewise with the Dorians, who, in conjunction with the Heraclidæ, founded Megara, and several other cities in the Poloponnesus. The Ionians were afterwards expelled by the Achæans, who were Æolians, so that only two nations remained within the Peloponnesus, the Æolians and the Dorians. Those states which had but little intercourse with the latter, preserved the Æolic dialect; this was the case with the Arcadians and the Eleans, as the former were altogether a people of mountaineers, and never had been included in the division of Peloponnesus made by the Heraclidæ; and the latter, from being dedicated to the service of the Olympian Jupiter, had long remained in the peaceable enjoyment of their country: they were moreover of Æolian origin, and had received the forces sent by Oxylus to assist the Heraclidæ in recovering possession of Peloponnesus. The other nations of that peninsula speak a mixed dialect, more or less approximating to the Æolic; and, though they are called Dorians, the idiom of no one city is now the same as that of any other.'" Cram. In the first periods of their history, the Greeks were governed by monarchs; and there were as many kings as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first rendered the Greeks respectable among their neighbours, and in the succeeding age the wars of Thebes and Troy gave opportunity to their heroes and demi-gods to display their valour in the field of battle. The simplicity of the ancient Greeks rendered them virtuous; and the establishment of the Olympic games in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was a laurel crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame and not the slaves of riches. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, sufficiently show what superiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undisciplined barbarians. After many signal victories over the Persians, they became elated with their success; and when they found no one able to dispute their power abroad, they turned their arms one against the other, and leagued with foreign states to destroy the most flourishing of their cities. The Messenian and Peloponnesian wars are examples of the dreadful calamities which arise from civil discord and long prosperity; and the success with which the gold and the sword of Philip and of his son corrupted and enslaved Greece, fatally proved that when a nation becomes indolent and dissipated at home, it ceases to be respectable in the eyes of the neighbouring states. The annals of Greece, however, abound with singular proofs of heroism and resolution. The bold retreat of the ten thousand, who had assisted Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, reminded their countrymen of their superiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander that the conquest of the east might be effected with a handful of Grecian soldiers. While the Greeks rendered themselves so illustrious by their military exploits, the arts and sciences were assisted by conquests, and received fresh lustre from the application and industry of their professors. The labours of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a composition was determined by the applause or disapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators; and eloquence seemed to be so nearly connected with the military profession, that he was despised by his soldiers who could not address them upon any emergency with a spirited and well delivered oration. The learning, as well as the virtues of Socrates, procured him a name; and the writings of Aristotle have, perhaps, gained him a more lasting fame than all the conquests and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accomplishments of the Greeks; their language became almost universal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring states, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. The Greeks planted several colonies, and totally peopled the western coasts of Asia Minor. In the eastern parts of Italy, there were also many settlements made; and the country received from its Greek inhabitants the name of Magna Græcia. For some time Greece submitted to the yoke of Alexander and his successors; and, at last, after a spirited though ineffectual struggle in the Achæan league, it fell under the power of Rome, and became one of its dependant provinces, governed by a proconsul.

Græcia Magna, a name by which a part of Italy, and sometimes the island of Sicily, were designated, from the number of Greek colonies established in them. Magna Græcia in the peninsula extended over the south of Italy, as far as the borders of Campania, and the country of the Frentani, including Apulia, Messapia or Iapygia, Lucania, and the district possessed by the Brutii. The Greeks endeavoured to establish a claim to the earliest settlement of this part of Italy, which they would gladly have represented as the first in all Italy which received a population and a name; but, however early may have been the Achæan emigration, it does not appear to have taken place till all Italy, from the Alps to the straits of Messina, had been populated by tribes as worthy of the name of indigenous as the Greeks who prided themselves in their own country in that vain epithet. The Œnotri will then be the last production of the great aboriginal Italian stock, which, instead of spreading gradually from the south, arrived at it by slow degrees, by propagation and extension from the north. But though the last of all the native tribes of Italy, the Œnotri could yet boast that one of their princes communicated to the whole country between the Alps and the Tuscan and Ionian seas, the appellation which to this day it retains, if we be willing to recognise any truth in the traditions of so remote and unauthentic an era. The vicissitudes and conflicts of the Œnotri, the Iapyges, the Messapii, and all the many inhabitants of this extensive and fertile country belonging to the same obscure epoch, afford little instruction for the investigation of antiquity; and their wars with the Siculi may likewise be dismissed with equal brevity. All the real interest which attaches to the name of Græcia Magna is derived from its colonization by the Achæans, Spartans, Phocæans of Ionia, &c. at a period much posterior to the pretended migration of the Arcadians. Without denying that settlements may have been effected from Greece at an earlier date upon this coast, we may refer the general introduction of Grecian manners, opinions, and language, to the era of 730 years, or thereabout, before the birth of Christ, and very little more than twenty years after that to which the founding of Rome is conventionally assigned. Sybaris, Metopontum, Caulon, and Crotona, owed their origin to the Achæans, who, driving the Œnotri and Chaones from the eastern coast, established there the language, the improvement, and the arts of Greece. The Partheniæ of Sparta soon after laid the foundation of the Tarentine rule; and the Phocæans, disappointed in their attempts upon the island of Corsica, bending their course towards the south, erected the city of Velia. Of all these cities Sybaris first rose to power and eminence; and many wars were the result of the attempts of other important places to extend their territories within the limits of her authority, or within that of other principal towns. Second in importance only to the colonization of this coast by the Greeks, was the arrival of Pythagoras, and the introduction of his sublime philosophy. Not only Crotona, which he chose as his residence, but all the other cities of Magna Græcia, and even the barbarous inhabitants of the surrounding country, were softened and instructed by his virtues and his doctrines; and his disciples very soon attained an influence that the political body could not counterpoise, and that nothing but a revolution, bloody, general, and exterminating, could eradicate. The arrival of this first of the ancient philosophers may be referred to the year B. C. 540. It may occasion some wonder that the Italian colonies should have been selected by Pythagoras as a place for the dissemination of his lofty truths in preference to their parent country, whose language he spoke, and of which he might almost be considered a native; but the same cause that had tended to the prodigiously early and rapid increase of the Achæan cities in Italy, had, no doubt a strongly operative effect in determining the choice of this early apostle of truth. The Achæan cities of Magna Græcia, more especially adopting the liberal principles of the Republic to which they owed their origin, accorded freely to strangers the rights and privileges of native citizens; and Pythagoras could there, without the odium and reproach of foreign birth, impart the wisdom which with years of labour he had gained. For thirty years the disciples of this illustrious benefactor continued to moderate the councils of Crotona, and, in a less degree, of the neighbouring cities; but on the destruction of Sybaris, the enemies of the sect, availing themselves of the dissatisfaction which it had given by its moderation in regard to the distribution of the spoil, resolved and conspired its ruin. At Crotona commenced the proscription and the massacre which terminated with the murder of the greater part of the body, and a decree of perpetual banishment against the rest. The immediate and lasting consequence of this barbarity were a series of factions, civil wars, and mutual jealousies, which diminished the power of the Italiot cities; and while it obstructed their progress towards a condition of concentrated vigour, left upon the south no obstacle to the Roman ambition, which otherwise might not have extended over those regions, and whose dominion, if checked at first in Italy, might never have extended itself over the earth. In the Persian war, while yet the cities of Italy acknowledged the parental rights of the Grecian states, one single vessel, equipped at the expense of an individual, appeared to sustain the liberties of Greece, in the name of her children, against the usurpations of Persia, and the free institutions and principles of Europe and the western world, against the oppressive and debasing system of Asia and the east. In the Peloponnesian war Magna Græcia took but an mactive part, and the diminution of her power was still more strikingly and sensibly perceived when the tyrant of Syracuse was, after an ineffectual resistance, permitted to raze the walls of Caulon and to pillage Rhegium; and when all the cities of Magna Græcia together were unable to contend with the pretensions of a petty tyrant from Sicily. Thus worn out by their enemies, the people of Magna Græcia were yet to meet another and more resolutely persevering enemy; and the country, which had long before been wrested from the aboriginal Italians, was to fall again into their hands before the occupation of their territory by the now resistless forces of the Roman republic. In the last weakness of the Greek colonies, the Brutii and Lucani, derived from the Samnite race, appeared in numerous hordes and with irresistible fury on the borders of the Grecian states; Thurii, Metapontum, and Heraclea, fell in succession beneath the attacks of these determined invaders, and very little remained to justify the ostentatious name of Græcia Magna. A very short time afterwards, that is to say, about the year U. C. 480, B. C. 270, the Romans effected the reduction of the whole country, and formed from it the provinces of Lucania and the Bruttian territory. The most striking geographical features of Magna Græcia were its deep and spacious bays. The principal of these were the Tarentine gulf, between the Bruttian and Iapygian peninsulas, the Scylacius Sinus in the country of the Brutii, the Sinus Urias in Daunia on the Hadriaticum Mare, and the Laius Sinus, belonging to Lucania on the Tyrrhene sea. The language of this country was the Doric Greek, with a few idiomatic forms peculiar to the Italian provinces. Micali, Italia.—Niebuhr.

Grampius mons, a long range of hills in Scotland, rising in Aberdeenshire between the Dee and the Don, running almost parallel with the chain of northern lakes, and dividing Scotland into two nearly equal parts. It terminates upon the west in Argyleshire. It was here that Galgacus, the Caledonian hero, made his last stand (described Tac. Vit. Agric.) against the arms of the Romans, and that 10,000 of the natives being left upon the field, the imperial conquest of Britain was effectually complete.

Granicus, a river of Mysia, now the torrent Ousvola. It is famous for the battle fought there between the armies of Alexander and Darius, 22d of May, B. C. 334, when 600,000 Persians were defeated by 30,000 Macedonians. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin.—Curt. 4, c. 1.

Graviscæ, now Eremo de St. Augustino, a maritime town of Etruria. The air was unwholesome on account of the marshes and stagnant waters in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.—Liv. 40, c. 29, l. 41, c. 16.

Gruthi, a people tributary to the Nervii, supposed to have inhabited the country near Tournay or Bruges in Flanders. Cæs. G. 5, c. 38.

Grynêum, and Grynium, a town near Clazomenæ, where Apollo had a temple with an oracle, on account of which he is called Grynæus. Strab. 13.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 72. Æn. 4, v. 345.

Gyarus, and Gyaros. "The last of the Cyclades enumerated by Artemidorus, is probably the islet which Homer calls Gyræ or Gyræa. So wretched and poor was this barren rock, inhabited only by a few fishermen, that they deputed one of their number to Augustus, who was at Corinth, after the battle of Actium, to petition that their taxes, which amounted to 150 drachmæ, might be diminished, as they were unable to raise more than 100. It became subsequently notorious as the spot to which criminals or suspected persons were banished by order of the Roman emperors.

Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris, et carcere dignum.—Juven. Sat. 1, 73.

Pliny estimates its circumference at 12 miles. The modern name is Ghioura." Cramer.—Hom. Od. 4, 500 and 507.—Strab. 10.—Tacit. 3, 68, 69; 4, 30.—Plin. 4, 12.

Gymnasium, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exercises were performed, and where not only wrestlers and dancers exhibited, but also philosophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compositions. The room was high and spacious, and could contain many thousands of spectators. The laborious exercises of the Gymnasium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wrestling, and boxing, which was called by the Greeks πενταθλον, and by the Romans quinquertia. In wrestling and boxing the athletes were often naked; whence the word Gymnasium, γυμνος, nudus. They anointed themselves with oil to brace their limbs, and to render their bodies slippery and more difficult to be grasped. Plin. 2, Ep. 17.—C. Nep. 20, c. 5.

Gymnias, a town of Armenia, now Ginnis, situated on that branch of the Euphrates which was called Frat. It is mentioned in the retreat of the ten thousand. D'Anville.

Gyndes, a river which empties into the Tigris below Ctesiphon. "It descends, according to Herodotus, from the mountains of Mantiene or Matiane, in the northern part of Media. Cyrus finding it on his passage, divided it into 360 channels. This name of Gyndes, or, as Tacitus expresses it, Gindes, in describing a river of Aria, is the same as Zeindeh, in the Persian language denoting a river which revives after having disappeared. The Gyndes, of which Herodotus speaks, reduced to nothing by the number of drains which it suffered from Cyrus, has at length re-assumed its course to the Tigris; and its entrance into the river is called Foum-el-Saleh, or the 'Mouth of Peace,' in the Arabic language. The name given it by the Turks in the place whence it issues, is Kara-sou, or the Black River." D'Anville.

Gyrtone, or Gyrton, a town of Thessaly, "situated not far from the junction of the Peneus and Titaresius. Many commentators have imagined that this city was formerly named Phlegya, and that Homer alluded to it when speaking of the wars of the Ephyri and Phlegyæ. It is termed an opulent city by Apollonius. The Gyrtonians favoured the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. In the Macedonian wars frequent mention is made of their town." *Cram.—Hom. Gythium, a town of Laconia, "the port of Sparta, was 40 stadia from Las and 240 from the capital. The Gytheatæ pretended that their town had been built by Hercules and Apollo, whose statues were placed in the forum. The principal buildings noticed here by Pausanias are the temples of Ammon, Æsculapius, and Ceres. He mentions also the statues of Neptune named Gaiuchus, Apollo Carneius, and Bacchus, the gates of Castor, and, in the citadel, the temple and statue of Minerva. Polybius states that the port, distant thirty stadia from the town, was both commodious and secure. Strabo remarks that it was an artificial haven. Gythium stood a little to the north of the present town of Marathonisi. The site is now called Palæopoli, but no habitation is left upon it." Cramer.

H.

HADRIA, or HATRIA, I. in Venetia. "This ancient city, which must have been once powerful and great, since it was enabled to transmit its name to the sea on which it stood, is known to have been possessed by the Tuscans at the time of their greatest prosperity, and when their dominion in Italy had been extended from sea to sea. Some traditions, coupled with what we know touching the origin of the neighbouring cities of Spina and Revenna, lead to the conclusion that these three towns were at a remote period founded by the people who are sometimes called Thessalians, and at other times Pelasgi, but whose real name was that of Tyrrhenians. When the Tuscan nation had extended its conquests into the north of Italy, it is most probable that Hadria and Spina fell into their hands; Ravenna, as we learn from Strabo, was occupied by the Umbri. The oldest writer who has recorded Hadria, is Hecatæus, quoted by Steph. Byz. According to this ancient historian, it was situated near a river and bay of the same name. The river is the Turtaro, but the bay into which it discharges itself has been long since filled up. Hadria still existed when Strabo wrote, but as an insignificant place. Few remains of any moment have hitherto been discovered on the site of Hadria, and of these a very small number can be referred to the Tuscans prior to the Roman dominion. It may be remarked, however, that it is a matter of great dispute among numismatic writers, whether the coins with the retrograde legend TAH ought to be ascribed to the Venetian Hadria, or to the Hadria in Picenum, supposed to be its colony. From these and other coins it appears that the real name of this city was Hatri, which the Greeks changed to Ἀδρία." Cram.——II. "A city of Picenum, of considerable note, and which appears to have formed with its territory, known anciently by the name of Hadrianus Ager, a little independent state, before it became a Roman colony and was included in the province of Picenum. It is of importance to state here that the Tuscans, having extended themselves first north of the Apennines, and afterwards about the Po and its mouths, obtained possession of the settlements originally formed by the Tyrrhenian Pelasgi, among which Hadria is to be numbered. From this part of Italy we know that they were driven in process of time by the Gauls; but as they were still masters of the sea, it is probable that they retired to other settlements which they might have formed to the south. This city was situated at some distance from the sea, between the rivers Vomanus and Matrinus; but nearer to the latter, at the mouth of which was its emporium, which now takes the name of the modern city as the Porto d'Atri. It seems generally allowed, that the emperor Hadrian was descended from a family originally of this city." Cram.

HADRIANOPŎLIS, I. a town of Thrace, situated at the place where the Hebrus first changes its course from east to south. It originally bore "the name of Orestias, which the Byzantine authors frequently employ in speaking of this city. The three rivers, by which it is pretended that Orestes, polluted by the murder of his mother, purified himself, had their confluence here: for at Adrianople the Hebrus received the Ardiscus on one side and the Tonzuz on the other, now the Arda and Tonza. This city served as a residence for the Ottoman sultans before the taking of Constantinople, and is now the second in the empire. "The numerous minarets of Adrianople, or Edrineh, rise above groves of cypress and gardens of roses; the Hebrus, increased by many tributary streams, descends from the central ridge, turns southwards, and flows past the town, of which the population is not less than 100,000 souls." Malte-Brun.——II. A city of Epirus, "apparently built in the reign of Hadrian, is said by Procopius to have borne subsequently the appellation of Justinianopolis, but we find it noticed under the former name by Hierocles, and in the Table Itinerary, which places it fifty-five miles from Amantia to the south-east, and twenty-four from a place beyond named Ilio, on the road to Nicopolis. It is clear from the description here given of its situation, that we must look for Hadrianopolis somewhat to the south of Argyro Castro or Antigonea; and this opinion is confirmed by what Mr. Hughes observed in his Travels through Epirus. 'On the western side of the valley, (of Argyro Castro,) nearly opposite Libochovo, and at no great distance from the river Drino, the ruins of a small Roman theatre, with a few vestiges of other ancient foundations, were pointed out upon a spot designated by the name of Drinopolis, an evident corruption of Hadrianopolis.'" Cram.

HADRIATĬCUM, or HADRIĂCUM MARE, the sea which bounds the eastern coast of Italy, otherwise called Mare Superum, in reference to its position as regards the Italian peninsula. It derived its name from the Venetian Hadria. (Vid. Hadria.) "It was known to the Greeks by the name of Ἀδρίας, or Ἰόνιος κόλπος; but they seem to have understood by the name Ionicum Mare that portion of it which lies between the south of Italy, taken from the Iapygian promontory and Peloponnesus." Cram. "Its bed appears to be composed of marble and lime mixed with shells." Malte-Brun.

HADRUMĒTUM, a city of the Roman province in Africa, situated on the coast north of Leptis. According to D'Anville, its present condition is unknown; but a neighbouring place, mentioned in a subsequent age under the name of Cabar Susis, is existent in Susa. Shaw says that it still remains under the name of Hamamet, and is a place of importance. Sallust. Jug. p. 179, ed. Burnouf.

HEMŌNIA. Vid. Æmonia.

HÆMUS, a branch of the great European chain of mountains, of which the Alps form the principal range. It stretches its great belt round the north of Thrace and Macedonia, in a direction nearly parallel with the course of the Ægean; on the east terminating in the promontory of Hæmi extrema, now Emineh-Borun; and on the west joining mount Scardus, the connecting link between the Hæmus and the Illyrian range of mons Albius. "The modern name is Emineh Dagh, or Balkan. The ancients regarded this range of mountains as one of the highest with which they were acquainted. Polybius, however, thought it inferior in elevation to the Alps, in which he was doubtless correct. It was reported, that from its summit could be seen at once the Euxine, the Adriatic, the Danube, and the Alps; and it was in hopes of beholding this extensive prospect, that Philip, the last Macedonian king of that name, undertook the expedition which is described in Livy. Having set out from Stobi, and traversed the country of the Mædi, and the desert tract which lies beyond, he arrived on the seventh day at the foot of the mountain. He was three days in reaching the summit, after a difficult and toilsome march. The weather, however, appears to have been very unfavourable for the view, and, after sacrificing on the mountain, Philip and his retinue descended into the plain." Cram.

HALÆ, the last town of Bœotia, situated at the mouth of the river Platanius, which appears to have separated Bœotia from the Opuntians. "Plutarch informs us it was destroyed by Sylla in the war with Mithridates. Its site is now occupied by the large village of Alachi, about four miles to the south-east of Talanti." Cram.

HALES, or HALĒSUS, a river of Lydia, which empties into the Ægean Sea near Colophon. It was remarkable for the coldness of its waters. Plin.—Paus.

HALIACMON, a river of Macedonia, which empties into the Thermaicus Sinus 10 or 12 miles from Methone. It is "a large and rapid stream, descending from the chain of mountains to which Ptolemy gives the name of Canalovii. Scylax places it after Methone. The modern name of this river is Jnidje-Carasou, or Jenicora, according to Dr. Brown, who must have crossed it in its course through Elimea. Dr. Clarke calls it Inje-Mauro. Cæsar, in describing some military operations in the vicinity of this river, between a part of his army under Domitius and some troops of Pompey commanded by Scipio, states that it formed the line of demarcation between Macedonia and Thessaly." Cram.

HALIARTUS, a town of Bœotia, "situated, as Strabo reports, on the shore of the Copaic lake, and near the mouth of the Permessus, which flows from Helicon. The epithet of ποτιήεντα is attached to this city by Homer, from the numerous meadows and marshes in its vicinity on the side of Orchomenus. Pausanias affirms that Haliartus was the only Bœotian city which did not favour the Persians; for which reason its territory was ravaged with fire and sword by their army. In the war carried on against the Thebans by the Lacedæmonians, Lysander, who commanded a body of the latter, was slain in an engagement which took place under the walls of Haliartus, and was interred there, as we learn from Pausanias. Haliartus, having favoured the cause of Perseus, king of Macedon, was besieged by the Romans under the command of the prætor Lucretius, and, though obstinately defended, was taken by assault, sacked, and entirely destroyed, the inhabitants being sold, and their territory given up to the Athenians. 'The remains of Haliartus,' according to Dodwell, 'are situated about fifteen miles from Libadea, and at nearly an equal distance from Thebes. The place is now called Mikrokoura. The acropolis occupies a low and oblong hill, one side of which rises from a fine pastural plain, the other from the marshes where the canes grew with which the ancients made darts and musical pipes. Most of the walls which remain are probably posterior to the time of Homer, but prior to its capture by the Romans. There are also a few remains of the second and third styles of masonry. At the foot of the acropolis are some sepulchral kryptæ cut in the rock, similar to those at Delphi.' Sir. W. Gell says, 'The ruins of Haliartus lie just below the village of Mazi, on the road from Thebes to Lebadia. It stood on a rocky eminence between the foot of mount Libethrius, a branch of Helicon, and the lake, and in fact defended a narrow pass.'" Cram.

HALICARNASSUS, a town of Doris in Caria, situated on the southern side of the peninsula which lay between the Iasius and Ceramicus Sinus. "It was of Greek foundation, and became the residence of the kings of Caria; and was ornamented with a superb tomb, erected by Artemisia to king Mausolus, her husband. The birth of Herodotus, the most ancient of the Greek historians, and also of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and the defence made by this city when besieged by Alexander, are circumstances which contribute to its fame. On the spot that it occupied is a castle, named Bodroun, which appears to have been erected by the knights of Malta, whose possessions extended on the coasts of the continent as well as to the adjacent isles." D'Anville.

HALMYDESSUS, a town of Thrace, on the Euxine Sea south of Thynias. Mela, 2, c. 2.

HALŌNE, an island of Propontis, opposite Cyzicus, now Aloni.

HALONNESUS, an island at the bottom of the Sinus Thermaicus.

HĀLYS, now the Kizil-Ermak, or Red River. In regard to length, this may be considered one of the principal rivers of the lesser Asia, while the circumstances with which it is connected in history render it among the most celebrated. It formed the western boundary of the Lydian territory when, under Crœsus, the kingdom of Lydia was erected into one of the powerful nations of the earth. The Halys arose at its most distant source towards the borders of Armenia Minor, and flowed through the whole length of Cappadocia from east to west. On the borders of Phrygia it received the waters of its southern branch, which came from the Taurus mountains on the confines of Cilicia, between Lycaonia and Cataonia. Here was formed the great bend from which it inclines for the remainder of its course to the north-east, and passing through Galatia between the Tectosages and the Trocmi, and afterwards dividing Paphlagonia from Pontus, discharges itself into the Euxine by the Amisenus Sinus north of the town of Amisus. The passage of this river was fatal to Crœsus and the empire of the Lydians, as predicted in ambiguous terms by the oracle.

Χροισος Αλυν διαβας μεγαλην αρχην διαλυσει.
If Crœsus passes over the Halys, he shall destroy a great empire.

That empire was his own. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 56.—Curt. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 12.—Lucan. 3, v. 272.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.

Halyzia, a town of Epirus, near the Achelous, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians.

Hamæ, a town of Campania, near Cumæ. Liv. 23, c. 25.

Hammon. The temple of the Libyan Jove was called, together with the surrounding tract of habitable country, Hammonia, and the temple was known to antiquity as the temple of Jupiter Hammon. This sacred edifice, hardly less venerable now than revered in the ages in which its deity received a universal worship, was situated in one of the smaller Oases of the Libyan desert. This Oasis, called the Oasis of Siwah, the most northern of the four, is situate in lat. 29° 12′ N. and in long 26° 6′ E. and still bears the ruins of the oracle and shrine to which it owes its fame. This location will bring it within the district called Marmarica, between the Nobatæ and Garamantes on the south, the Egyptians on the east, and having on the west the extensive region of Libya interior. The antiquity of this famous oracle remounts to an impenetrable obscurity; and we rather conclude from the fables relating and referred to it, that, even in the time of its earliest chroniclers, its origin was wrapt in fable and in fiction, than attempt to deduce from them a history of its foundation and progress in notoriety and importance. Not only the surrounding countries of Africa, but the Italians and Greeks paid also to this oracle a deference and a respect unsurpassed by the veneration with which they consulted the oracular deities of Delphi and Dodona; and though, when the Romans, masters of the world, began to neglect all foreign auguries and prophecies for those of their Sybils and Etruscan diviners, the respect of this oracle diminished sensibly; yet even in the 5th century of our era it was not unusual to anticipate the fates by consultation of the Libyan Jupiter. In connexion with the temple of Hammon, the ancients also mentioned a fountain, beside which was a smaller temple or sanctuary. The peculiar properties of the waters of this fountain, or marsh as it is now represented, form likewise in their writings a matter of long disquisition, and the particular account of Herodotus has been confirmed by the discoveries of modern travellers. This was the Fons Solis, which at night was warmer than during the day, and which sent forth in the morning a vapour or steam, that, appearing to the ancients miraculous, is now understood to be but an indication and effect of the diminished temperature of the atmosphere. The extent of this little sheet of water is now about ninety by sixty feet, and its waters are remarkably transparent and pure, but its properties, peculiar as they were considered in antiquity, have ceased to be an object of admiration since philosophy has ascertained their cause, and observation has found them in numberless other wells or pools of the same or similar regions. It must be understood, that though the best authorities concur in fixing here the temple of Jupiter Hammon, there are many who assign it to some of the other Oases which lie scattered in the vast deserts of this barren continent.

Harma, a place near Phyle, in the vicinity of Athens. Some superstition was connected with this place, and it was usual, without any specific occasion, to despatch an embassy to the Delphic oracle, and to consult the Pythia whenever it was observed to lighten in the direction of this spot.

Harudes, a people of Germany. They have been assigned by modern writers to a variety of regions in the vicinity of the sources of the Rhine and the Danube; they seem, however, to have belonged to that district which lay between the countries of the Marcomanni and the Narisci, in the circle of Swabia. Cæs. G. 1, c. 31.

Hebrus, now Maritza, so called from the marshy ground through which it flows before precipitating itself into the Ægean Sea. This river, among the secondary streams of Europe one of the most considerable, takes its origin among the mountains that separated Thrace from the Danubian countries, a part of the Hæmus range, and after draining the greater portion of the ancient Thrace, Roumelia, it escapes through the only outlet by which the waters of this region are enabled to pass into the reservoir of the tribute paid by the eastern countries of Greece to the Mediterranean. The mouth of the Hebrus was near the city of Ænos. One great bend distinguishes the course of this river, which, from being directly south-east, abruptly turns to the south with a western inclination, and pierces the hills of Rhodope in its way to the Ægean. Exactly at this bend is situate the town of Adrianople. From the north the Tonzus, from the east the Agrianes, and from the west the Ardiscus, constitute the main branches of this important stream. The Hebrus was supposed to roll its waters upon golden sands. It received its name from Hebrus, son of Cassander, a king of Thrace, who was said to have drowned himself there. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 7.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 463.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 50.

Hecatæ Fanum, a celebrated temple, sacred to Hecate, at Stratonice in Caria. Strab. 14.

Hecatompŏlis, an epithet given to Crete, from the hundred cities which it once contained.

Hecatompȳlos, an epithet applied to Thebes in Egypt on account of its hundred gates. Ammian. 22, c. 16.——Also the capital of Parthia in the reign of the Arsacides. Ptol. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Plin. 6, c. 15 and 25. "Demegan," says D'Anville, "the principal city of a country named now Comis, and heretofore Comisene, is cited under the name of Hecaton-pylos, which, referring to the time of the Greek domination in these provinces, signifies the Hundred Gates; a figurative expression alluding to the numerous routes which diverge from it to the circumjacent country. And when it is found in Ptolemy that this extremity of Media was that called Parthia, having Hecatonpylos for its capital, it must be understood of the time when a people hitherto but inconsiderable had extended their limits far and wide by the prevailing fortune of their arms.

Hecatonnēsi, now Musco Nisi, or the Isles of Mice, a group of small islands lying between Lesbos and the coast of Æolia.

Hecŭbæ Sepulchrum, a promontory of Thrace.

Hedui, a people of Gaul, among the richest and most powerful of that nation. They were surrounded by the Lingones on the north, the Sequani on the east, the Arverni and Allobroges on the south, and the Senones and Bituriges upon the west, leaving to them a great part of the old dukedom of Burgundy and a portion of the provinces of Nivernois, Bourbonois, and Franche Compte. The Hedui or Ædui were always in the interests of Rome, and called by the senate, among the earliest of the Gallic people who received that protecting distinction, the friend of the Roman people. Their country, which is now planted with the vine, was once extremely fertile in grain, and served the Roman armies in their Gallic wars as an inexhaustible granary. So populous was this part of Gaul, that in the war excited by Vircingetorix against the Romans, the Ædui furnished to the former upwards of 35,000 fighting men. Their principal cities were Bibracte, Cabillonum, Matisco, Decetia, and Noviodunum ad Ligerim. On a later division of the Gallic provinces, the country of the Ædui was formed into the minor province of Lugdunensis Prima, or the First Lionois.

Hedylium, a place near mount Hedylius in Bœotia, not far from Chæronea, on the confines of Phocis. Near this spot the Bœotians, in the Social War, were defeated by the Phocians.

Helice. "In the vicinity of Bura formerly stood Helice, one of the chief cities of Achaia, and celebrated for the temple and worship of Neptune, thence surnamed Heliconius. It was here that the general meeting of the Ionians was convened, whilst yet in the possession of Ægialus; and the festival which then took place, is supposed to have resembled that of the Panionia, which they instituted afterwards in Asia Minor. A prodigious influx of the sea, caused by a violent earthquake, overwhelmed and completely destroyed Helice, two years before the battle of Leuctra, in the fourth year of the 101st Olympiad, or 373 B. C. The details of this catastrophe will be found in Pausanias and Ælian. It was said that some vestiges of the submerged city were to be seen long after the terrible event had taken place. Eratosthenes, as Strabo reports, beheld the site of this ancient town, and he was assured by mariners that the bronze statute of Neptune was still visible beneath the waters, holding an hippocampe or seahorse in his hand, and that it formed a dangerous shoal for their vessels. Heraclides of Pontus related, that this disaster, which took place in his time, occurred during the night; the town, and all that lay between it and the sea, a distance of twelve stadia, being inundated in an instant; 2000 workmen were afterwards sent by the Achæans to recover the dead bodies, but without success. The same writer affirmed, that this inundation was commonly attributed to divine vengeance, in consequence of the inhabitants of Helice having obstinately refused to deliver up the statue of Neptune and a model of the temple to the Ionians at the request of the latter, after they had settled in Asia Minor. Seneca affirms, that Callisthenes the philosopher, who was put to death by order of Alexander, wrote a voluminous work on the destruction of Bura and Helice. Pausanias informs us, that there was still a small village of the same name close to the sea, and forty stadia from Ægium." Cram.

Helicon mons. "Above Thisbe, in Bœotia, rises Helicon, now Palæovouni or Zagora, so famed in antiquity as the seat of Apollo and the Muses, and sung by poets of every age from the days of Orpheus to the present time. Pausanias ascribes the worship of the Muses to the Thracian Pieres, and in this respect his testimony is in unison with that of Strabo, who conceives that these were a tribe of the same people who once occupied Macedonian Pieria, and who transferred from thence the names of Libethra, Pimplea, and the Pierides, to the dells of Helicon. Strabo affirms that Helicon nearly equals in height mount Parnassus, and retains its snows during a great part of the year. Pausanias observes, that no mountain in Greece produces such a variety of plants and shrubs, though none of a poisonous nature; on the contrary, several have the property of counteracting the effects produced by the sting or bite of venomous reptiles. On the summit was the grove of the Muses, adorned with several statues, described by Pausanias, and a little below was the fountain of Aganippe. The source Hippocrene was about twenty stadia above the grove; it is said to have burst forth when Pegasus struck his hoof into the ground. These two springs supplied the small rivers named Olmius and Permessus, which, after uniting their waters, flowed into the Copaic lake near Haliartus. Pausanias calls the former Lemnus. Hesiod makes mention of these his favourite haunts in the opening of his Theogonia. The valleys of Helicon are described by Wheler as green and flowery in the spring; and enlivened by pleasing cascades and streams, and by fountains and wells of clear water." Cram.

Heliŏpŏlis, I. a city of Egypt, with a temple sacred to the sun. This place, which was celebrated as well for the worship of the ox Mnevis as of the sun, no longer existed in the time of Strabo. Its name, as given above, is a translation of the Coptic denomination of On, which signifies the sun. The site of this ancient city has given rise to a difference of opinion between able geographers. D'Anville says, "it was afterwards called by the Arabs Ain-shems, or the Fountain of the Sun; and it still preserves vestiges in a place called Matarea, or Cool Water." Matarea is not far removed from the position of the Persian station, Babylon, now forming a quarter of Old Cairo, and was therefore, according to D'Anville's account, without the Delta. Chaussard, on the other hand, places an inconsiderable city of the sun near Matarea, and fixes the greater Heliopolis within the Delta, near the apex, between the Sebennytic and Canopic branches of the Nile. In the city were large houses appropriated to the priests, who at first devoted themselves to astronomy, but afterwards abandoned this pursuit in favour of sacrificial worship. Apartments were shown in these houses which had been occupied by Plato and Eudoxus. The observatory of Eudoxus was in the vicinity of the town.——II. A town of Cœlosyria, in the valley called Aulon, between the parallel ridges of Libanus and Anti-Libanus. This city still preserves, under the name of Baalbek or Balbec, a magnificent temple, dedicated to the divinity, to which it owed its denomination both in the Syriac and Greek." D'Anville.

Helisson, I. "a small but rapid river, which rises in the eastern part of Arcadia, and after traversing Megalopolis falls into the Alpheus a little below the city."——II. A town of Arcadia, situated in the Mænalian plains, near the source of the Helisson. It was, at length, included in the Megalopolitan territory, and was taken by the Lacedæmonians in one of their wars with the Arcadians. Cram.

Hellespontus, now the Dardanelles, a narrow strait between Asia and Europe, near the Propontis, which received its name from Helle, who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. [Vid. Helle.] It is about sixty miles long, and, in the broadest parts, the Asiatic coast is about three miles distant from the European, and only half a mile in the narrowest, according to modern investigation; so that people can converse one with the other from the opposite shores. It is celebrated for the love and death of Leander, [Vid. Hero,] and for the bridge of boats which Xerxes built over it when he invaded Greece. Strab. 13.—Plin. 8, c. 32.—Herodot. 7, c. 34.—Polyb.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Ptol. 5, c. 2.—*Ovid. Hellopia Regio, a rich plain of Epirus, in which Dodona was situated, as Hesiod tells us in a beautiful passage of his poem called 'Ηοῖαι, transmitted to us by the scholiast of Sophocles. "This champaign country," according to Cramer, "would be that which surrounds Delvinakir and Deropuli, which modern travellers represent as extremely fertile and well cultivated. Dr. Holland says, 'the vale of Deropuli is luxuriantly fertile in every part of its extent; and the industry of a numerous population has been exerted in bringing it to a high state of culture.' A little below, he adds, 'this great vale is, perhaps, the most populous district in Albania.'" Cram.

Helôrum, and Helôrus, now Muri Ucci, a town and river of Sicily, whose swollen waters generally inundate the neighbouring country. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 698.—Ital. 11, v. 270.

Helos, a place of Laconia. "It was eighty stadia from Trinasus, on the left bank of the Eurotas, and not far from the mouth of that river. It was said to owe its origin to Helius the son of Perseus. The inhabitants of this town, having revolted against the Dorians and Heraclidæ, were reduced to slavery, and called Helots, which name was afterwards extended to the various people who were held in bondage by the Spartans." Not only the servile offices in which they were employed denoted their misery and slavery, but they were obliged to wear peculiar garments, which exposed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were instructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel masters often obliged them to drink to excess, to show the free-born citizens of Sparta the beastliness and disgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of stripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died slaves. In the Peloponnesian war these miserable slaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples and at public shows with garlands, and with every mark of festivity and triumph. This exultation did not continue long, and the sudden disappearance of the two thousand manumitted slaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. Thucyd. 4.—Pollux. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—*Arist. In Strabo's time it was only a village, and some years later Pausanias informs us it was in ruins. In Lapie's map the vestiges of Helos are placed at Tsyli, about five miles from the Eurotas; and Sir W. Gell observes that the marsh of Helos is to the east of the mouth of that river." Cram.

Helvetia, the eastern part of Celtica, surrounded in the time of Cæsar by the Rauraci, Tulingi, and Latobrigi upon the north, the Sarunetes on the east, the Lepontii, Seduni, and Nantuates on the south, and by the Sequani, who were separated from them by mount Jura on the west. Helvetia was at this period circumscribed within a narrow sphere between the Alps, the Jura mountains, the Lacus Lemanus, and the Lacus Brigantinus. Of the subdivisions of Helvetia very little remains to be observed, nor is it possible distinctly to define the limits and extent of the four principal cantons into which it is understood to have been divided. The Tigurinus, however, is received as the greatest, and the first, together with the Aventicus, whose principal city of Aventicum may pass for the capital of Helvetia. The Helvetii were among the most warlike of the Gallic tribes, and though there is little recorded history of their achievements, we know that they were long refractory, and that they with difficulty submitted to receive the yoke of their Roman conquerors. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, &c.—Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 67 and 69.

Helvii, a people of Gallia Provincia, separated by the mons Cebenna from the Velauni, and having on the south the Arecomaci. Thus situated, the Helvii must have occupied a portion of the department of Arverche, in which some vestiges are still to be found of their ancient capital, Alba Augusta, at a spot which, in the name of Alps, still shows some traces of its origin. This spot is in the immediate vicinity of Viviers. Plin. 3, c. 4.

HEPTAPŸLOS, a surname of Thebes in Bœotia, from its seven gates.

HERACLÉA, I. "situated between the Aciris and Liris, was founded by the Tarentini after the destruction of the ancient city of Siris, which stood at the mouth of the latter river, A. C. 428. This city is rendered remarkable in history as being the seat of the general council of the Greek states. Alexander of Epirus is said to have attempted to remove the assembly from the territory of the Tarentines, who had given him cause for displeasure, to that of Thurii. Antiquaries seem agreed in fixing the site of this town at Policoro, about three miles from the mouth of the river Aciris, now Agri, where considerable remains are yet visible."——II. A city in the territory of the Lyncestæ in Macedonia, "surnamed Lyncestis by Ptolemy, and which we know stood on the Egnatian Way, both from Polybius, as cited by Strabo, and also from the Itineraries. The editor of the French Strabo says, its ruins still retain the name of Erekli. Stephanus speaks of a town called Lyncus; which is probably the same as Heraclea, unless he has mistaken the name of the district for that of a town." Cram.——III. "The principal town of the Sinti was Heraclea, surnamed Sintice, by way of distinction, or Heraclea ex Sintiis. The same historian states, that Demetrius, the son of Philip, was here imprisoned and murdered. Heraclea is also mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy. Mannert thinks it is the same as the Heraclea built by Amyntas, brother of Philip, according to Steph. Byz. The Table Itinerary assigns a distance of fifty miles between Philippi and Heraclea Sintica: we know also from Hierocles that it was situated near the Strymon, as he terms it Heraclea Strymonis." Cram.——IV. A town in the territory of Trachis in Thessaly, built by a colony of Lacedæmonians, aided by the Trachinians. It was "distant about sixty stadia from Thermopylæ and twenty from the sea. Its distance from Trachin was only six stadia. The jealousy of the neighbouring Thessalian tribes led them frequently to take up arms against the rising colony, by which its prosperity was so much impaired, that the Lacedæmonians were more than once compelled to send reinforcements to its support. On one occasion the Heracleans were assisted by the Bœotians. A sedition having arisen within the city, it was quelled by Eripidas, a Lacedæmonian commander, who made war upon and expelled the Œtæans, who were the constant enemies of the Heracleans. These retired into Bœotia; and at their instigation the Bœotians seized upon Heraclea, and restored the Œtæans and Trachinians, who had also been ejected by the Lacedæmonians. Xenophon reports that the inhabitants of Heraclea were again defeated in a severe engagement with the Œtæans, in consequence of their having been deserted by their allies, the Achæans of Phthia. Several years after, the same historian relates, that this city was occupied by Jason of Pheræ, who caused the walls to be pulled down. Heraclea, however, again rose from its ruins, and became a flourishing city under the Ætolians, who sometimes held their general council within its walls. According to Livy, the city stood in a plain, but the Acropolis was on a hill of very difficult access. After the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylæ it was besieged by the Roman consul, Acilius Glabrio, who took it by assault. Sir W. Gell observed 'the vestiges of the city of Heraclea on a high flat, on the roots of mount Œta. Left of these, on a lofty rock, the citadel of Trachis, of which some of the walls are destroyed by the fall of the rock on which they were placed. Hence the views of the pass of Thermopylæ and the vale of the Sperchius are most magnificent.'" Cram.——V. A town in Thrace, situated on the Propontis, near the extremity of the Macrontichos. Its first name was Perinthus, which was changed to Heraclea, whence is derived the name Erekli, applied to the ruins that now occupy the site of the ancient city. "Byzantium, become Constantinople, caused the decay of Heraclea, whose see, notwithstanding, enjoys the pre-eminence of metropolitan in the province distinguished in Thrace by the title of Europa." D'Anville.——VI. PONTICA, a city of Bithynia, situated on the bend, which forms a gulf terminated on the north by the Acherusian Chersonese. According to Mela this city was founded by the Argive Hercules, who was said to have dragged Cerberus from hell through a cavern in the promontory at the extremity of the peninsula abovementioned. Strabo, on the other hand, says that the Milesians first founded Heraclea, while Xenophon makes it a colony of Megara. Mela, 1, 19.—Strab. 12.——VII. Another in Syria.——VIII. Another in Chersonesus Taurica.——IX. Another in Thrace, and three in Egypt, &c. There were no less than forty cities of that name in different parts of the world, all built in honour of Hercules, whence the name is derived.

HERACLÉUM, or HERACLÉA, a town of Macedonia, situated "five miles beyond Phila, and half way between Dium and Tempe. It probably stood on the site of Litochori, midway between the mouth of the Peneus and Standia, which occupies the site of Dium, and five miles from Platamona or Phila. Livy informs us it was built on a rock which overhung a river. Scylax describes Heracleum as the first town of Macedonia after crossing the Peneus; but we must remember that at this period Phila did not exist. Heracleum was taken in a remarkable manner by the Romans in the war with Perseus, as related by Livy. Having assailed the walls under cover of the manœuvre called testudo, they succeeded so well with the lower fortifications, that they were induced to employ the same means against the loftier and more difficult works; raising, therefore, the testudo to an elevation which overtopped the walls, the Romans drove the garrison from the ramparts and captured the town." Cram.

HERÆA, a town of Arcadia, "was placed on the slope of a hill rising gently above the right bank of the Alpheus, and near the frontier of Elis, which frequently disputed its possession with Arcadia. Before the Cleomenic war, this town had joined the Achæan league, but was then taken by the Ætolians and recaptured by Antigonus Doson, who restored it to the Achæans. In Strabo's time, Heræa was greatly reduced; but when Pausanias visited Arcadia it appears to have recovered from this state of decay, since he speaks of baths, and of plantations of myrtles and other trees along the Alpheus; he also mentions several temples, of which two were sacred to Bacchus and one to Pan. That of Juno was in ruins. Stephanus remarks that this town was also known by the name of Sologorgus. 'Its site is now occupied by the village of Agiani, which stands on a pretty eminence projecting from the hills which bound the vale of the Alpheus on the north. The city appears to have been very respectable, though from the soil being cultivated its remains are few; buildings have here existed of the Doric order, but the columns now on the spot do not exceed a diameter of eighteen inches.'" Cram.

Heræum, a temple and grove of Juno, situate between Argos and Mycenæ.

Herculaneum, a town of Campania, swallowed up with Pompeii, by an earthquake produced from an eruption of mount Vesuvius, August 24th, A. D. 79, in the reign of Titus. After being buried under the lava for more than 1600 years, these famous cities were discovered in the beginning of the present century; Herculaneum in 1713, about 24 feet under ground, by labourers digging for a well, and Pompeii, 40 years after, about 12 feet below the surface, and from the houses and the streets, which in a great measure remain still perfect, have been drawn busts, statues, manuscripts, paintings, and utensils, which do not a little contribute to enlarge our notions concerning the ancients, and develope many classical obscurities. The valuable antiquities, so miraculously recovered, are preserved in the museum of Portici, a small town in the neighbourhood, and the engravings, &c. ably taken from them, have been munificently presented to the different learned bodies of Europe. "Cluverius was right in his correction of the Tabula Theodosiana, which reckoned twelve miles between this place and Neapolis, instead of six, though he removed it too far from Portici when he assigned to it the position of Torre del Greco. Nothing is known respecting the origin of Herculaneum, except that fabulous accounts ascribed its foundation to Hercules on his return from Spain. It may be inferred, however, from a passage in Strabo, that this town was of great antiquity. At first it was only a fortress, which was successively occupied by the Osci, Tyrrheni, Pelasgi, Samnites, and lastly by the Romans. Being situated close to the sea, on elevated ground, it was exposed to the south-west wind, and from that circumstance was reckoned particularly healthy. We learn from Velleius Paterculus, that Herculaneum suffered considerably during the civil wars. This town is mentioned also by Mela and by Sisenna, a more ancient writer than any of the former; he is quoted by Nonius Marcellus. Ovid likewise notices it under the name of 'Urbem Herculeam.' It is probable that the subversion of this town was not sudden, but progressive, since Seneca mentions a partial demolition which it sustained from an earthquake." *Cramer.—Seneca. Nat. Hercyne, a river of Bœotia, which "took its rise near the town of Lebadea, in a cave, from whence issued two springs, called Lethe and Mnemosyne, which, uniting, formed the stream in question. It is now called the river of Libadia. 'The sacred fountain,' says Dodwell, 'issues from the rock by ten small spouts; the water is extremely cold and clear. On the opposite side of the channel is the source of the other fount, the water of which, though not warm, is of a much higher temperature than that of the other spring; it flows copiously from the rock. The two springs, blending their waters, pass under a modern bridge, and immediately form a rapid stream, the ancient Hercyne. In its way through the town it turns several mills; and, after a course of a few miles, enters the Copaic lake.'" Cram Hercynia silva, a forest of Germany, called by Ptolemy, Eratosthenes, and other Greek writers, Orcynium, "so vast, that it seemed to cover the whole country, whose ancient condition might well have merited the description that Tacitus has given of it, however inapplicable to its present state. We must add that Hercynia is a generic term, there being several places in Germany named der Hartz: and if there be found other names of forests, as that of Gabreta Silva, they are proper only to parts of this immense continuity of wood, which extended from the banks of the Rhine to the limits of Sarmatia and Dacia." (D'Anville.) Cæsar, in his description of this celebrated forest, says that its breadth was such that it was nine days' march across it; while its length had not yet been ascertained even by those who had travelled through it uninterruptedly for 60 days. He mentions that report assigned to it several species of animals no where else to be found. B. G. 6, 25.

Hercynii montes. These mountains received their name from the immense forest which is described in the article above, and which covered the sides and summits of that range of mountains which may be distinguished from the Alpine chain by the name of Hercynio-Carpathian mountains. We extract from Malte-Brun the following account of this range: "The great plain of the Danube, or the boundary of the Alpine range, is in several places so much confined, that the Alps appear to be connected with the Hercynio-Carpathian mountains in many parts of Austria. Although separated by the higher plains of Bavaria, the mountains of the Black Forest, near the sources of the Danube, connect the two ranges, and a junction is also marked by the falls of the Rhine. The Hercynio-Carpathian mountains are bounded on the west by the course of the Rhine, by the valley of the Danube on the south, and the Dniester on the east. From their northern declivities descend all the rivers which water the plains of Poland, Prussia, and northern Germany. The Hercynian and Carpathian mountains rise above the Sarmatian and Teutonic plains, but their summits cannot be compared with the majestic heights of the Alps. Considered in this point of view, they appear to be the appendage of a greater range, and to form the northern extremity of the Alps and the counterpart of the Appenines. But the great difference between the Hercynio-Carpathian chain and the Appenines, consists in the latter being very distinctly separated from the Alps by the deep valley of the Po, and the Adriatic, while the valley of the Danube is less excavated, and confined in its upper part, as has been already remarked, by the branches of the eastern Alps and the mountains of Bohemia. The mountains connected with the Alps on the west, are united with the Hercynian chain, not only by the Black Forest, but by the continuation of the Vosges in the neighbourhood of Bingen. There is a more obvious difference between the Appenines and the Hercynio-Carpathian range; the first are a continuous and regular chain, and the others, if correctly observed, seem to form a series of lofty plains, on which several small chains rise, and although their summits are evidently separated, all of them are supported on a common base. This table land, crowned with mountains, inclines to the north and the north-east. That fact cannot be disputed, it is proved by the course of the Vistula, the Oder, and the Elbe; but local irregularities are occasioned by several chains which rest on these elevated plains. Thus the Erze-Gebirge in Saxony terminated in rapid declivities towards Bohemia, and appear to interrupt the general inclination."

Herdonia, a town of Apulia, "now Ordona, stood on a branch of the Appian Way, and about twelve miles to the east of Æca. Livy states that this town witnessed the defeat of the Roman forces in two successive years, when they were commanded on both occasions by two prætors named Fulvius. After the last engagement, Hannibal is said to have removed the inhabitants of Herdonia from that place, and to have destroyed it by fire. It must, however, have risen afterwards from this state of ruin, since we find it mentioned as a colony by Frontinus, under the corrupt name of Ardona. Strabo calls it Cerdonia, and places it on the continuation of the Via Egnatia, between Canusium and Beneventum. It is also named by Ptolemy and Silius Italicus." Cram.

Hermæum, a promontory of Lemnos, noticed by Æschylus in the Agamemnon, and by Sophocles in the Philoctetes.

Hermiŏne, a town of Argolis, on its southern coast, nearly opposite the island Hydrea. "According to Herodotus it was founded by the Dryopes, whom Hercules and the Melians had expelled from the banks of the Sperchius and the valleys of Œta. It sent three ships to Salamis and 300 soldiers to Platæa. The Athenians ravaged the Hermionian territory during the Peloponnesian war. Xeno, tyrant of Hermione, after the capture of Acrocorinthus by Aratus, voluntarily relinquished his power, and joined the Achæan league. Pausanias describes this city as situated on a hill of moderate height, and surrounded by walls. It was embellished by numerous buildings, several of which contained statues worthy of notice. The temple of Venus Pontia is first mentioned by that ancient writer. The statue was of white marble, and colossal in its proportions. He also points out the temple of Bacchus Melanægis, in whose honour contests were yearly held in music, diving, and rowing; the temples of Diana, Iphigenia, and Vesta; and those of Apollo and Fortune. The statue of the latter was colossal, and of Parian marble. Two aqueducts supplied the town with water; one was of considerable antiquity, the other modern. The temple of Ceres, situated on the hill named Pron, was said to have been erected by Clymenus, son of Phoroneus, and his sister Chthonia. Its sanctuary afforded an inviolable refuge to suppliants, whence arose the proverb ἀνθ' Ἑρμιόνος, 'as safe an asylum as that of Hermione.' The vestibule was adorned with the effigies of the priestesses of the goddess. Opposite to this edifice was a temple of Clymenus, by which name Pausanias conceives Pluto to have been designated. Not far from thence was a cave supposed to communicate with the infernal regions. It was probably owing to this speedy descent to Orcus that the Hermionians, as Strabo informs us, omitted to put a piece of money in the mouths of their dead. This ancient city is noticed by Homer in the Catalogue. Lasus, an early poet of some note, said to have been the instructor of Pindar, was a native of Hermione. We are informed by Sir W. Gell, that the ruins of Hermione are to be seen on the promontory below Kastri, a town inhabited by Albanians nearly opposite to the island of Hydra. The walls remain, and many foundations of the temples. Pausanias affirms that Hermione originally stood at a distance of four stadia from the site it occupied in his day, and though the inhabitants had long removed to the new city, there yet remained several edifices to mark the spot. The temple of Neptune was close to the beach, and above it was that of Minerva, with the stadium of the Tyndaridæ. The grove of the Graces, the temples of Minerva, of the Sun, and of Isis and Serapis, also subsisted, and were still frequented by the Hermionians. The temple of Ceres Thermasia was placed at the extremity of the territory of the city towards Trœzene." Cram.

Hermiones, a people of Germany, whom Mela places in the remotest parts of that country, that is to say, along the Vistula, on the borders of Sarmatia. In Tacitus Herminones is generally read, for which Cluverius incorrectly substitutes Helleviones. The Helleviones and Hermiones were both distinct tribes of the Suevic family; although Pliny makes Hermiones, and not Suevi, the generic term. (For the position of the Hermiones according to the geography of Pliny, see Germania.) Tacitus distinguishes the Helleviones, under the name of Helvecones, from the Hermiones. Great confusion arises in relation to the barbarian nations, from the various forms under which their names are presented by different authors. Thus the same people are styled Hermiones, Hermechiones, Hermechii, Hormechii, and Herminones. Mela, 3, 3, 46. and Voss. ad loc.

HERMIONĪCUS SINUS, a bay on the southern coast of Argolis, which took its name from the city Hermione.

HERMON, a part of the range of mount Libanus, at the foot of which the Jordan takes its rise. The name itself means "the highest part of a mountain," and this ridge was the loftiest of the range to which it belonged. The Sidonians called it Sirion, while the Amorites styled it Shenir; both which names answer to the Latin lorica, "a breast-plate," referring, no doubt, to the natural defence which the mountain afforded to the country. In like manner we find a mountain in Magnesia called Θώραξ, which means "a breast-plate;" and a part of the Alps, which received the name of Brennus, derived from Bren or Bryn, the old German for "a helmet." Deuteronomy, 3, 9.—Rosenmüller, ad loc. —Heylin.

HERMOPŌLIS, a town of the Delta in Egypt, "with the qualification of Parva to distinguish it from one in the Heptanomis. It accords with the position of Demenhur."—"The position of Hermopolis Magna, or the Great City of Mercury, is well known to be that retained by Ashmunein; which, if a tradition of the country may be credited, owes this name to Ishmim, son of Mizraim, the ancestor of the Ægyptian nation." This city was in the Heptanomis, on the western bank of the Nile. D'Anville.

HERMUNDŪRI, a people of Germany, subdued by Aurelius. They were at the north of the Danube, and were considered by Tacitus as a tribe of the Suevi, but called, together with the Suevi, Hermiones by Pliny. The Hermunduri, as a reward for their fidelity to their Roman conquerors, were allowed peculiar commercial privileges, being permitted to cross the Danube, and trade in the Rhætian province. The Albis takes its rise in their territories. Tac. Germ. 41.—Plin. 4, c. 14.—Tacit. Ann. 13, extra.—Vell. 2, c. 106.

HERMUS, a river of Asia Minor, whose sands, according to the poets, were covered with gold. It flows near Sardis, and receives the waters of the Pactolus and Hyllus, after which it falls into the Smyrnæus Sinus, to the south of Smyrna. It gives the name of Hermi-Campi to the plains through which it flows between Smyrna and Sardis. It is now called Kedous or Sarabat. Virg. G. 2, v. 37.—Lucan. 3, v. 210.—Martial. 8, ep. 78.—Sil. 1, v. 159.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

HERNĪCI, a people of Italy, who possessed that portion of New Latium which bordered on the Æqui and Marsi before it was included within the Latin limits. "No description of the character of this small tract of country is equal to that which is conveyed by one line of Virgil:

Quique altum Præneste viri, quique arva Gabinæ
Junonis, gelidumque Anienem, et roscida rivis
Hernica saxa colunt. ÆN. vii. 682.

It was maintained by some authors, that the Hernici derived their name from the rocky nature of their country, herna, in the Sabine dialect signifying a rock. Others were of opinion that they were so called from Hernicus, a Pelasgic chief; and Macrobius thinks Virgil alluded to that origin when he describes this people as going to battle with one leg bare. The former etymology, however, is more probable, and would lead us also to infer, that the Hernici, as well as the Æqui and Marsi, were descended from the Sabines, or generally from the Oscan race. There is nothing in the history of this petty nation which possesses any peculiar interest, or distinguishes them from their equally hardy and warlike neighbours. It is merely an account of the same ineffectual struggle to resist the systematic and overwhelming preponderance of Rome, and of the same final submission to her transcendent genius and fortune. It may be remarked, that it was upon the occasion of a debate on the division of some lands conquered from the Hernici that the celebrated Agrarian law was first brought forward, A. U. C. 268. The last effort made by this people to assert their independence was about the year 447 U. C.; but it was neither long nor vigorous, though resolved upon unanimously by a general council of all their cities." Cram.

HEROŌPŌLIS, "from which one of the creeks of the Arabic gulf was called Heroōpolites, is the Pithom mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures as a city constructed by the Israelites, and the Patumos of the Arabic country of Egypt in Herodotus. And it may be added from concurrent circumstances, that the place of arms of vast extent, called Anaris by Josephus, where the shepherd kings held Egypt in subjection, was the site of Heroōpolis." (D'Anville.) It is probably now the village of Heron, of which Baudrand speaks. Chaussard.

HERTHÆ INSULA, an island of the Northern ocean, according to Tacitus; although it has been proposed to alter the reading in the passage of the Germany where this island is mentioned, by substituting in silva Baceni for the words in insula Oceani. This island was "consecrated to a religious ceremony in honour of Hertha, or the mother Earth. Though it be the opinion of many that this island is the same with Rugen, there is greater probability of recognising it in the name of Heilig-land, which signifies the Holy Isle. It is situated in the distance off the mouth of the Elbe, and of it only an eminence now remains, the sea having covered a shore much more spacious." D'Anville.—Tac. de mor. Germ. 40.

HERŪLI, a savage nation in the northern parts of Europe, who attacked the Roman power in its decline. "It is difficult in the dark forests of Germany and Poland to pursue the emigrations of the Heruli, a fierce people, who disdained the use of armour, and who condemned their widows and aged parents not to survive the loss of their husbands or the decay of their strength." (Gibbon.) "The Heruli, under the conduct of Odoacer, conquered Italy, whereof he was proclaimed king by the Romans themselves; but Odoacer being vanquished near Verona by Theodoric, king of the Goths, the Heruli had Piedmont allotted to them by the conqueror for their habitation. They had not held it long when it was subdued by the Lombards, of whose kingdom it remained a part till given by Aripert, the seventeenth king of the Lombards, to the church of Rome; affirmed by some to be the first temporal estate that ever the popes of Rome had possession of." *Heyl. name common both to Italy and Spain. It is derived from Hesper or Vesper, the setting sun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Hesperia, because it was situate at the setting sun, or in the west. The same name, for similar reasons, was applied to Spain by the Latins. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 634, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 34, v. 4, l. 1, od. 27, v. 28.—Sil. 7, v. 15.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 258.

Hesperidum Insulæ. The authors of the several ingenious attempts to define with accuracy the Hesperidum Insulæ, do not appear to have borne sufficiently in mind the nature of the investigation in which they were engaged, and an eager search for the real Hesperides would frequently induce the reader to forget that they were, after all, but a fabulous creation. The only inquiry ought to be as to the place or places contemplated by the various authors who have mentioned and referred to the Hesperides. Some have placed them in Magnesia, and some among the Hyperboreans. More frequently, however, they are assigned to Africa, but the query still remains as to the particular site. The Cyrenaica and Marmarica have also been considered the abode of these mythological personages, while many situate them in islands by the Straits of Gibraltar, or in some of the African islands in the Atlantic. Pliny and Pomponius Mela mention two, which do, indeed, appear to have borne this name, and are believed by modern writers to have been either the Fortunate Islands, or those called Cape de Verd. We may observe, that they were most frequently referred to as being in the vicinity of Mount Atlas, itself no less a subject of poetic embellishment. Vid. Hesperides, Part III.

Hesperis, a town of Cyrenaica, now Bernic or Bengazi, where most authors have placed the garden of the Hesperides. This town was afterwards called Berenice by the Greeks. Vess. ad Mel.

Hestiæa. Vid. Histiæa.

Hestiæotis, "according to Strabo, was that portion of Thessaly which lies near Pindus, and between that mountain and upper Macedonia. This description applies to the upper valley of the Peneus, and the lateral valleys which descend into it from the north and the west. The same writer elsewhere informs us, that, according to some authorities, this district was originally the country of the Dorians, who certainly are stated by Herodotus and others to have once occupied the regions of Pindus, but that afterwards it took the name of Hestiæotis from a district in Eubœa so called, whose inhabitants were transplanted into Thessaly by the Perrhæbi. The most northern part of Hestiæotis was possessed by the Æthices, a tribe of uncertain, but ancient origin, since they are mentioned by Homer, who states, that the Centaurs, expelled by Pirithous from mount Pelion, withdrew to the Æthices.

Ἥμενοι τῷ ὅτε φῶτας ἐτίσαντο λαχνήεντας

Strabo says they inhabited the Thessalian side of Pindus, near the source of the Peneus, but that their possession of the latter was disputed by the Tymphæi, who were contiguous to them on the Epirotic side of the mountain. Marsyas, a writer cited by Stephanus Byz. described the Æthices as a most daring race of barbarians, whose sole object was robbery and plunder." Cram.

Hetruria. "Of all the ancient nations of Italy, none appear to have such claims upon our notice as that of the Tuscans. Their celebrity at a time when Rome as yet had no existence; the superiority of their political institutions; their progress in navigation, commerce, and many other arts of civilized life, when the surrounding nations were to all appearance enveloped in ignorance and barbarism; are circumstances which, even in the present day, must arrest inquiry, and command alike the attention of the historian and philosopher. But so evident has the insufficiency of the historical information on the origin of the Tuscans appeared, that many antiquaries of celebrity in the last century, despairing of obtaining any clue to this search from the conflicting testimony of ancient writers, have not hesitated to quit altogether the beaten track of history, and to venture amidst the untrodden and alluring mazes of conjecture. The consequence of this mode of investigation was easy to be foreseen; system followed system, till there scarcely remained any nation of acknowledged antiquity, to which the honour of having colonized Etruria was not attributed. Thus it was supposed that the Tuscans might be descended from the Egyptians, the Canaanites, or the Phœnicians. Others again contended for their Celtic origin. Freret ascribed it to the Rhæti, Hervas to the ancient Cantabri; while some again gave up all hope of arriving at any certain conclusion in this puzzling question, and seemed to consider it as one of those historical problems which must for ever remain without a solution. The multiplicity of the opinions which have just been noticed, is the best proof of the little dependance that is to be placed on systems which trust for support to conjecture alone. There are three sources from which we may expect to derive information respecting the origin of the ancient Tuscans. 1st, The accounts of Greek writers. 2d, Those of the Romans. 3d, The existing national monuments discovered in Etruria. With respect to the Romans, it is well known that they concerned themselves but little about inquiries into the origin of nations, and received without much examination all the accounts even of the early population of Italy, which were transmitted to them by the Greeks, their masters in every species of literature; so that little original information can be derived from them in an inquiry which is to be traced considerably higher than the foundation of their city. The evidence which is supplied by the inscriptions and coins of Etruria, respecting the origin of its inhabitants, has hitherto done little towards settling the question; and since the age of these monuments, which had been greatly overrated, has been proved by able judges to be posterior to the commencement even of the Roman republic, we are obliged to seek among the historians and poets of Greece for the earliest records of Etruscan history. It is well known that the inhabitants of that country are always spoken of by the Greeks under the name of Tyrseni, or Tyrrheni, while the Romans designate them by that of Etrusci, or Tusci. This difference of nomenclature will be considered more fully hereafter; but it may be observed at present, that it seems too decided to allow of the supposition that either is a corruption of the other; whence we should be led to infer, that the Tyrrheni and Tusci were not originally the same people, even if history did not farther establish the fact. Who then were the Tyrrheni of the Greeks, and whence did that name originate? This is in fact the problem, on the solution of which the whole difficulty of the present question seems to hang. If we are to credit the famous Lydian tradition recorded by Herodotus, that ancient people ought to be considered as the parent stock of the Tyrrhenians. It is to be observed, that Herodotus simply delivers this account as he received it from the Lydians, without vouching for the truth of the remarkable event it was intended to record. But it would not be difficult to show that he himself gave credit to the legend, or at least saw no improbability in the facts which it related. He was well acquainted with the Tyrrheni and Umbri of Italy, and was therefore a competent judge of the truth or probability of the Lydian tale. But even allowing its improbability, it ought not for that reason merely to be rejected, since we should be led, a priori, to except in this matter something out of the common course, in order to account for the marked difference which originally existed between the Tuscans and the other ancient nations of Italy. But the greatest argument in its favour, after all, must be allowed to consist in the weight of testimony which can be collected in support of it from the writers of antiquity, especially those of Rome, who, with few exceptions, seem to concur in admitting the fact of the Lydian colony. In short, the presumption would appear so strong in favour of this popular account of the origin of the Tyrrheni, that we might consider the question to be decided, were not our attention called to the opposite side by some weighty objections, advanced long since by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and farther strongly urged by some modern critics of great learning and reputation. Dionysius seems to stand alone among the writers of antiquity, as invalidating the facts recorded by Herodotus; and though his own explanation of the origin of the Tyrrhenians is evidently inconsistent and unsatisfactory, still it must be owned that his arguments tend greatly to discredit the colony of the Lydian Tyrrhenus. But the objection which, after all, must be reckoned as most conclusive against the Lydian origin of the Tyrrheni, is the absence of all conformity in the important relations of customs, religion, and language, between the mother country and its pretended colony, which certainly would not have been the case, if a migration to such an extent as Herodotus reports had really taken place from one country to the other. There are, it is true, some exceptions to this general assertion of Dionysius, and some features of resemblance have been traced between the two nations; but they seem too faint and imperfect to throw much weight into the scale. It is remarked, that, divination and augury, which form so leading a distinction in the religion of Etruria, took their rise in Caria, acccording to Pliny; and we hear frequently in Herodotus of the diviners of Telmissus as having exercised their art at a very remote period. The superstitions of Phrygia are also frequently observable in the monuments of Etruria. The insignia of royalty, such as the curule chair and the purple robe, which the Romans borrowed from the Tuscans, are recognised by Dionysius of Halicarnassus himself, as Lydian badges of honour; and the eagle standards of Rome, also originally Tuscan, appear to have been common to the armies of Persia. The comic dancers of Etruria, called Ludii, were celebrated for their agility and grace, and according to Val. Maximus, who mentions their introduction at Rome, they derived this talent from the Curetes and Lydians. Lastly, it is singular enough that two customs peculiar to the Etruscans, as we discover from their monuments, should have been noticed by Herodotus as characteristic of the Lycians and Caunians in Asia Minor. The first is, that the Etruscans invariably describe their parentage and family with reference to the mother, and not the father. The other, that they admitted their wives to their feasts and banquets. These are all the points of similarity between the two nations which we have been able to trace or collect from the observations of others; and though they tend perhaps to establish a notion of a communication between Asia Minor and Etruria, we are far from thinking that they make out a case in favour of Lydia; for if they prove any thing, it is that the Carians, Lycians, and Phrygians, have as good a claim to the honour of colonizing Italy, as their neighbours the Lydians. It is a fact sufficiently established on good authority, that the Greeks were acquainted with a people whom they called Tyrrhenians, but whose geographical position was very different from that of their Italian namesakes. According to Herodotus, they occupied a district contiguous to that of the city of Cresthona on the Thracian border of Macedonia; and Stephanus Byz. mentions Æane and Elymnea as two of their towns in Macedonia. Thucydides has also noticed them in the Chalcidic region near Mount Athos, and describes them as the Tyrrheni, who once dwelt at Athens and in the island of Lemnos. From other sources we learn, that these Tyrrheni, or Pelasgi, as they are often called, had built for the Athenians the wall which surrounded their acropolis; but being afterwards driven out of Attica, are said to have retired to the islands of Lemnos and Imbros, after having expelled the descendants of the Argonauts. The father of Pythagoras is said to have been one of these Tyrrhenians. We hear, too, of the Tyrrhenians in the island of Lesbos; also about the Hellespont in the neighbourhood of Cyzicus, and on the shores of the Chersonese. Here then is sufficient evidence of the existence of the Tyrrheni as a people known to the Greeks under that specific appellation, though they are frequently designated by the generic name of Pelasgi; and if we admit that it was this people which at an early period migrated from Thrace and the north of Greece into Italy, there will be found, we apprehend, no better system for reconciling the various and contradictory opinions, which have been entertained on this point of history by many writers both in ancient and modern times. We are aware, however, that it will here be necessary to prove one important particular; namely, that the Tyrrheni spoken of in the passages just cited were an original people, and not, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus imagined, apparently on the authority of Hellanicus of Lesbos, a remnant of the Pelasgi; who, after leaving Italy, brought back with them into Greece the name of Tyrrhenians, as commemorative of their residence in the former country. But whatever may be the origin of that name used specifically, we cannot doubt that it was afterwards applied to tribes of different origins, as indicative of their wandering and unsettled habits. There can be no better argument for disproving the system of Dionysius, with regard to the Tyrrheni Pelasgi, than that which establishes the existence of this nation in the most distant period of the history of Greece, and much prior to the siege of Troy, about which time it is pretended they returned from Italy. Lastly, in proof of the antiquity of the Tyrrhenian name in Greece, we would cite the passage which Dionysius quotes from the Inachus of Sophocles, wherein the poet makes them contemporary with that prince. We must now hasten to the historical evidence, which establishes the fact of a migration of these Tyrrheni at a remote period into Italy. Dionysius has only acquainted us with the name of one of those many writers from whom he dissented on this point; but it is curious that this is the very author from whom he has taken most of his account of the adventures of the Pelasgi during their residence in Italy, that is, Myrsilus of Lesbos, an ancient historian, of whom little is otherwise known, and of whose sources of information no correct estimate can now be formed. From him we learn, that the people who colonized Italy were called Tyrrheni; that they were the same who built the Pelasgic wall at Athens; and that the Athenians gave them the nickname of Πελαργοι, or storks, on account of their propensity to migrate from their country, which, as we have seen, was originally Thrace, Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. There is, indeed, an obscurity in Dionysius's account of the Tyrrheni, which hardly admits of explanation; for he goes on to tell us, that the Pelasgi, after a long series of misfortunes, lost all their possessions in Italy, most of their towns falling into the hands of the Tyrrheni, who were their neighbours; and elsewhere we are informed, in order to account for the skill and practice in naval affairs for which the Pelasgi were distinguished, that they had acquired their experience from their residence among the Tyrrheni. But whence or how this people obtained their knowledge we are left to guess, since their position is so undetermined; and besides, Dionysius has never told us that the Pelasgi had resided with the Tyrrheni, but with the Aborigines. It is therefore pretty evident that Dionysius's system is untenable; his error must be attributed chiefly to his supposition that the Pelasgi and Tyrrheni were a different people. The name of Rasena, which he gives to the latter, appears to us to be corrupted from that of Tyrseni or Tyraseni. Another source of confusion in this part of Dionysius's antiquities, is his notion with respect to the Aborigines, whom he supposes to be the descendants of a pretended colony of Arcadians, afterwards called Œnotrians. All judicious critics and antiquaries seem agreed in rejecting this hypothesis; and that being the case, the Aborigines, who, according to Dionysius's own account, and the concurrent testimony of many ancient writers, lived in the same country with the Pelasgi, survived their disasters, and rose on the ruins of their power, must be the Etrusci, or Tusci of the Romans, a branch doubtless either of the Umbrian or Oscan race, if indeed these do not belong to the same primitive Italian stock. The analogy which subsists between the forms Tusci, Osci, and Volsci, would furnish a presumption in favour of the indigenous origin of the former; but that point seems abundantly established by the fundamental similarity of language which has been discovered to exist between the Etruscan and the other native dialects of Italy. Having thus far tried to explain the origin of the Tuscan people, it remains for us to see how far their improved civilization and political superiority can be traced to the settlements formed by the Tyrrhenians amongst them. The easiest and most obvious way by which the Tyrrheni, coming from Thrace and the north of Greece, may be supposed to have reached Italy, would be by the Danube, and then by the Save up to the Julian Alps and the head of the Adriatic. It is on this sea, doubtless, that history, however faint in its records of these transactions, places their first settlements, whether they reached it by land or in a fleet. Dionysius, on the authority of Hellanicus, says, that they arrived by sea at the mouth of the Spinetic branch of the Po. But Freret is of opinion that the Pelasgi reached Italy by land; this is a point however we would by no means insist upon: they were unquestionably a maritime people; and their first settlements, Hadria, Spina, and Ravenna, were sea-port towns. If we follow the plain thread of history, divested of the romantic circumstances which Dionysius has interwoven in his narrative of the transactions of the Pelasgi with the Aborigines, it will appear that the former gradually advanced from the Po into the country of the Umbri, who, being then at war with the Siculi, gladly received their assistance, and after the expulsion of the enemy, gave them settlements and lands in the newly acquired territory, which was Etruria Proper. According to the same historian, the migration of the Siculi took place about eighty years before the siege of Troy, which agrees nearly with the date assigned to the same event by Hellanicus. So that we shall not be very far from the mark, in assigning the date of about one hundred years before the Trojan war to the settlement of the Tyrrheni Pelasgi in Etruria. Here then they founded, with the assistance of the natives, their first twelve cities; and if we conceive this people bringing with them all the improvements in war, navigation, and general civilization, which Greece was then beginning to derive from her proximity to the east and to Egypt, into a country only inhabited, and that partially, by rude and savage clans, we shall easily form an idea of the great and rapid influence which they would exercise over the moral and political state of Italy. The Tyrrhenian pirates, who had hitherto infested the Ægean, would naturally retire, when that sea was protected by the navy of Minos, to the seas of Ita-

.y, to exercise there the habits which they had acquired from the Phœnicians, and which remained so long a characteristic of their nation. We learn from Strabo, that the Greeks did not venture to send colonies into Sicily till long after the fall of Troy, owing to the dread inspired by those formidable depredators. From the traditions preserved by Lycophron, it would appear that they formed settlements on almost every part of the coast washed by the Tyrrhenian sea. But it was in Etruria, properly so called, that the Tyrrheni laid the first foundation of this power, and established, under Tarchon their leader, a confederacy of twelve cities. The information which Strabo likewise supplies on this head is curious and important. He represents the Tuscans as being perpetually engaged in hostilities with the Umbri, from whom they were only separated by the Tiber; and we are led to infer, that the advantage rested decidedly with the former people, since he goes on to state that they gradually extended the confines of their territory, and finally possessed themselves of the plains watered by the Po. It is to this acquisition of dominion that Pliny probably refers, when he reports that the Tuscans wrested no less than three hundred cities from their Umbrian antagonists. In the prosecution of their successful career, the Tuscans, having arrived on the shores of the Adriatic, obtained possession also of the original Tyrrhenian settlements of Hadria and Spina, which the Tyrrheni, being too weak to defend them, abandoned, as Strabo relates, to the invaders, while Ravenna fell into the hands of the Umbri. It is in Etruria that we can best trace the influence of the Tyrrhenian colony, in changing the habits and improving the condition of its natives. It is to the Tyrrheni that we would ascribe that mixture of the religions of Greece and Italy which is known to have obtained in the Etruscan rites. Thus, with the deities peculiar to the country, such as Voltumna, Norcia, and the Dii Consentes, we find they worshipped Aplu, or the Pelasgic Apollo, Thurms, or Hermes, Juno, Minerva, and other divinities common to the Greeks. Of the influence of the Pelasgi on the language of Italy there seems no question, the fact being admitted by ancient as well as modern writers. We are inclined to think that the Tyrrheni introduced the Pelasgic characters in Etruria and Umbria, and likewise communicated them to the Oscans, whose characters are somewhat more rude and uncouth. Tacitus however seems to say, that letters were brought by Damaratus of Corinth, but Gori and Lanzi think, and it seems more natural so to interpret Tacitus, that Damaratus only improved the Etruscan alphabet by the addition of some letters. These are the principal points in which the effects of the Tyrrhenian colony are visible in improving and civilizing Etruria. With respect to particular customs, we are too little acquainted with the history of that country to distinguish what was indigenous and what borrowed; but it seems sufficient to know that they infused a spirit of enterprise and conquest in the nation into which they had been adopted; a spirit which long prevailed, and increased after the original Tyrrheni had removed or disappeared, as they are said to have done towards the period of the Trojan war. Commerce and the cultivation of the fine arts, for which this inventive people appear to have had a natural turn, would add to their refinement, and complete their superiority over the other comparatively barbarous tribes of Italy; circumstances which will account for their having been distinguished by the Greeks, from the days of Hesiod to those of Thucydides and Aristotle, when Rome was unknown, or was thought to be a Tyrrhenian city. Whether it was really so may be a matter of speculation, in which it will not be forgotten how much she borrowed from Etruria in the formation of her religious and political institutions, and in the detail of her civil and military economy. Had the Tuscans formed a regular and effective plan for securing their conquests and strengthening their confederacies, they would have been the masters of Italy, and perhaps of the world, instead of the Romans. But their enterprises after a certain period, seem to have been desultory, and their measures ill combined and ineffectual. A fatal want of internal union, which prevailed amongst their states, as Strabo judiciously observes, rendered them an easy conquest to their Gallic invaders in the north of Italy, and to the hardy Samnites in Campania; while Rome was aiming at the very centre of their power and existence those persevering and systematic attacks, which with her were never known to fail. The history of the Tuscans subsequently to the foundation of Rome is to be gleaned from Livy, and, at intervals, from short detached notices in the Greek historians and poets; but a rich field is left open to the antiquary, who would illustrate the annals of this interesting people from the monuments that are daily discovered in their country, which seems destined to be the seat of the arts and of good taste through a perpetuity of ages. If the books of Aristotle and Theophrastus on the civil institutions of the Tyrrheni, or even the history of the emperor Claudius, had been preserved to us, we should doubtless have been better acquainted with the causes of that ascendency which they are said to have once exercised over the whole of Italy. Etruria, considered as a Roman province, was separated from Liguria by the river Macra; from Cisalpine Gaul and Umbria, to the north and north-east, by the Appenines; from Umbria again, from the Sabines, and Latium, by the Tiber to the south-east and south." Cram.

HIBERNIA, and HYBERNIA, the ancient name of Ireland, situated to the west of Britain, from which it was separated by the Verginium Mare, in modern geography, the Irish Sea. Of its interior little was known to the ancients, as it was never subjected to the Roman rule. Its situation and size were, however, with tolerable accuracy, defined by Cæsar and Tacitus; but, with the exception of these, and of the appearance of its coast, very little was to be obtained from these writers, and much less from the other authors who pretended to treat of it. An account of the vicissitudes of this island, though we have reason to believe that it was early civilized, would not belong at least to the classic ages of antiquity; for only on the fall of the empire do its people begin to make their appearance in history. Still something may be conjectured of its early state, of the era at which it was first inhabited, and of the people by whom the first settlements were made. There is abundan. reason to presume, that the early population of Hibernia, like that of Britannia, was of Celtic origin; and among the few remains of that once extensively circulated tongue, the language of the Irish is still the most remarkable relic. But if this people were of the common Celtic stock, it is not easy to fix the era of their arrival in Hibernia, nor that of their subsequent expulsion from those parts in which the Scoti were found afterwards. When the Romans became sufficiently acquainted with this island to observe the divisions of the inhabitants, to mark their boundaries, and to assign them names, they entitled Lagenia that part which was afterwards denominated Leinster; to Meath they gave the name of Midia; that of Ultonia to Ulster; to Connaught that of Connaccia; and that of Momonia to Munster. The various appellations of this island were, according to the ancients, Hibernia, by which title it continues to be designated; Ierne, whence some deduce the name of Erin by which the natives denoted it; Iverna, a modification perhaps of Ierna, and Iris, the latter name being derived from the authority of Diodorus Siculus. In the language of the Britons, Ireland was called Yverdon. Referring to the Carthaginian settlement, the curious Bochart deduces the name from the Punic Ibernæ, signifying the most remote habitation; Ireland being for a long time considered the most western region of the world. We have not pretended to give an account of all the theories which have been founded and raised upon the origin, name, and history of the Hibernians. They belong to a period of history which is not embraced within the limits of a dictionary that professes to treat of the classic ages of antiquity. Camb. Brit.

Hierapŏlis, I. a town of Syria, on the west of the Euphrates and south of Zeugma. The name by which it was known to the natives in antiquity was Bambyce; and that of Hierapolis was conferred upon it by the Macedonians, after their conquest of the east, from the peculiar reverence which was there paid to the Syrian goddess Atargatis, as well by foreigners as by the inhabitants. Heylin gives the following description of her famous temple. from the great resort to which the name of Hierapolis was derived: "The temple was built by Stratonice, the wife of Seleucus, in the midst of the city, encompassed with a double wall about the height of 300 fathoms; the roof thereof was inlaid with gold, and made of such a fragrant wood, that the clothes of those who came thither retained the scent thereof for a long time after. Without the temple there were places enclosed for oxen and beasts of sacrifice; and not far off a lake, of 200 fathoms in depth, wherein they kept their sacred fishes, (Vid. Astarte and Derceto.) The priests attending here amounted in number to 300, besides many more subservient ministers." In eastern geography the name of the ancient Hierapolis is Menbigz. —II. A city of Phrygia, on the Meander, near the mouth of the Lycus and towards the borders of Lydia. According to D'Anville, the Lycus passed between this city and another at no great distance, called Laodicea. Hierapolis and its vicinity are called by the Turks "Bambuk-kalasi, or the castle of cotton, because the neighbouring rocks resembled that substance in their whiteness." D'Anville.

Hierapytna, a town in the island of Crete, on the coast of the Libyan Sea. It was almost directly south of Minoa, between which place and Hierapytna was the narrowest part of Crete. The antiquity of this town was very great, being referred to the early Corybantes, who, if not a fabulous race or caste, have their history at least obscured and enveloped in fable.

Hierosolyma. "As we approach the centre of Judæa," says a celebrated writer, "the sides of the mountain enlarge, and assume an aspect at once more grand and more barren; by little and little the vegetation languishes and dies; even mosses disappear; and a red and burning hue succeeds to the whiteness of the rocks. In the centre of the mountains there is an arid basin, enclosed on all sides with yellow pebble-covered summits, which afford a single opening to the east, through which the surface of the Dead Sea and the distant hills of Arabia present themselves to the eye. In the midst of this country of stones, encircled by a wall, we perceive extensive ruins, scanty cypresses, bushes of the aloe and the prickly pear; some Arabian huts, resembling white-washed sepulchres, are spread over this heap of ruins. This spot is Jerusalem." This touching description of the holy city, as it existed in the third century, has applied too nearly to its modern condition. Though peopled with 20 or 30,000 inhabitants, according to the varying estimates of travellers, this city is described by many who have visited it, as presenting to our view nothing but cabins resembling prisons rather than houses. Few cities have undergone so many revolutions as Jerusalem. Once the metropolis of the powerful kingdom of David and of Solomon, it had its temples built of the cedar of Lebanon, and ornamented with the gold of Ophir. After being laid waste by the Babylonian army, it was rebuilt in more than its original beauty under the Maccabees and the Herods. The Grecian architecture was now introduced, as is shown by the royal tombs on the north of the city. It then contained some hundred thousands of inhabitants; but in the year 70 of the Christian era it was visited by the signal vengeance of heaven, being razed to the foundation by the Roman Titus. Adrian built in its stead the city of Ælia Capitolina; but in the time of Constantine, the name of Jerusalem was restored, and has ever since been retained. Helen, this emperor's mother, adorned the holy city with several monuments. In the seventh century it fell under the power of the Persians and Arabians. The latter called it El-Kods, 'the holy,' and sometimes El-Sherif, 'the noble.' In 1098, the chevaliers of Christian Europe came to deliver it from the hands of the Mahometans. The throne of the Godfreys and of Baldwin imparted to it a momentary lustre, which was soon effaced by intestine discord. In 1187 Saladin replaced the crescent on the hills of Zion. Since that period, conquered at different times by the sultans of Damascus, of Bagdat, and of Egypt, it finally changed its masters, for the seventeenth time, by submitting in 1517 to the Turkish arms."

Hillevi̇̆nes. The only inhabitants of Scandinavia really known to the Romans were called Hilleviones, according to the relation of Pliny; and the later authority of Jornandes makes known the country of the same people, which he denominates Hallin. "That which is contiguous to the particular province of Skane is still called Halland." D'Anville.

Himĕra, I. now Fiume Salso, a considerable river of Sicily, rising in the mountains that run almost across the island from west to east. The source of the Himera was not far from that of the Monalus, which, running north, discharged itself into the Mare Inferum; while the Himera emptied into the Africum Mare. The two formed thus very nearly a division of the island into two.——II. Another river of the same name rose on the northern side of the mountains further towards the east, and emptied into the sea between the city of Himera and the Thermæ Himerenses.——III. A city of Sicily, built by the people of Zancle, and destroyed by the Carthaginians 240 years after. Strab. 6. It retains the name of Termini, derived from that of Thermæ, which it received from the baths in its vicinity.——The ancient name of the Eurotas.

Hippo Zarytas, I. a town of Africa Propria, to the east of Utica, and north-west of another Hippo, called, for the sake of distinction, Regius. The surname of Zarytas referred to its situation among a number of artificial canals, excavated in order to connect the waters of the sea with those of a large lake in the vicinity. Its modern name of Biserte is a corruption of that of Benzert, by which it is known in ancient geography.——II. The Hippo, surnamed Regius, belonged to Numidia, and, standing on the coast towards the borders of the Carthaginian territory, occupied the site on which the more modern Bona was built. The particular appellation, Regius, denotes the residence of the sovereign; and, in fact, we know that Hippo was a principal city, and perhaps a royal residence of the Numidian kings.

Hipponium, a town of Magna Græcia, belonging to the country of the Brutii. It is said to have been founded by the Epizephyrian Locri, and underwent the vicissitudes to which the other towns of Magna Græcia were also too frequently subject. In the time of Dionysius it fell into the hands of the Sicilians, by whose oppression it was greatly reduced; the Carthaginians, however, rebuilt it, from enmity to the islanders, by whom it had been subdued. It was again greatly harassed by Agathocles; but on the approach of the Brutii, by whose occupation all the country in which the Greeks had established themselves on the expulsion of the Aborigines, was again restored to the Italians, Hipponium became a part of their possessions. Receiving a Roman colony in the year of the city 560, it changed its name to that of Vibo Valentia, and rose to opulence and celebrity. "In the vicinity of Hipponium was a grove and meadow of singular beauty; also a building said to have been constructed by Gelon of Syracuse, called Amalthæa's horn. It was here probably that the women of the city and its vicinity assembled, as Strabo affirms, on certain festivals, to gather flowers, and twine garlands for their hair in honour of Proserpine, who had herself, as it was said, frequented this spot for the same purpose, and to whom a magnificent temple was here erected. Antiquaries and topographers are generally of opinion that the modern town of Monte Leone represents the ancient Hipponium, and they recognise its haven in the present harbour of Bivona." Cram.

Hippomolgi, a people of Scythia, who, as the name implies, lived upon the milk of horses. Hippocrates has given an account of their manner of living. De aqua et aer. 44.—Dionys. Perieg.

Hipponiates, a bay in the country of the Brutii, so called from the city of Hipponium, which stood upon its southern shore. It was directly opposite to the Scyllacius Sinus, and between these two bays was the narrowest part of Italy. Terina, which stood at about the same distance from the northern shore, communicated also its name to this bay, which was sometimes called also Terinæus Sinus; in modern geography the Golfo di Santa Eufemia.

Hippopŏdes, a people of Scythia, who had horses' feet. Dionys. Perieg.

Hira. Vid. Alexandria.

Hirpi, a people of Hetruria, in the vicinity of the mons Soracte. On the summit of this hill the Hirpii were accustomed to offer sacrifice to Apollo, and were on that account respected with a kind of sacred veneration, and exonerated from all the burthensome duties of other communities, such as the performance of military services, &c.

Hirpini, a people of Samnium, in the southern part. They are generally considered, though confessedly of Samnitic origin, to have formed an independent division of that race.

Hispālis, now Seville, an ancient and famous city of Hispania, in Bæturia, on the left bank of the Bætis, below Italica, and between that place and the Libystinus lacus. It was a town of Punic origin, as the name sufficiently denotes, and was twice colonized from Italy. On the arrival of the second colony in the time of Cæsar, Hispalis assumed the name of Julia Romulea or Romulensis, and was afterwards, though with its former name, invested with the dignity of a juridical Conventus upon the subdivision of the Farther Spain. The fortunes of this city were more remarkable in the years of the lower empire, and its commerce, on the discovery of America, was long the greatest source of revenue to the crown of Spain. When wrested from the Moors by the Spanish monarch Ferdinand the 2d of Castile, A. D. 1248, it was annexed to the dominions of that prince, and formed a separate realm in his dominions; so that to the title of king of Spain, was added that too of king of Seville. The reason of this was, that before the expulsion of the Moors, Seville had formed a kingdom by itself, and, as an independent state, had resisted the power of the Catholic arms.

Hispania, the most western country of Europe, lying between the Atlantic ocean and the Mediterranean. It forms, with Portugal, a peninsula of about 630 leagues in circumference. Various names were assigned to this country in antiquity; the Greeks denominated it Iberia, and knew but the portion which afterwards retained that name; the Latins called it Hesperia, from its situation towards the west; and the name of Hispania, which outlasted all, has reached the present day in that of Spain, Espagne, Spagna, &c. This title it probably received from its Carthaginian inhabitants. The whole country was divided between the Iberi and the Celtiberi, from whence the regions inhabited by those people were designated respectively Iberia and Celtiberia. After the second Punic war, the Durius, from its mouth to the borders of Leon, and thence a line to meet the Orospeda mons, together with that range, were taken as a dividing line, and formed the separation between Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior. It was not till the time of Augustus that the provinces Tarraconensis, Bætica, and Lusitania, were definitively marked as divisions of the whole peninsula. Hispania is separated from Africa by the narrow straits of Gibraltar, which, it is conjectured, did not always connect the waters of the inland sea with the vast expanse of the Atlantic. Of the geography of Hispania before the extension of the Roman dominion beyond the Pyrenees, or, at least, before the introduction of the Roman armies and arms, it is not possible to speak with any degree of certainty; but the accounts of Roman geographers, and perhaps also the geographical distribution of its Roman masters, refer in a great measure to the divisions of territory and the distinctions of races which they found on succeeding to the possessions of the Carthaginians in Spain. We look, therefore, on the Iberians as the first and proper inhabitants of the Spanish peninsula, and on the Celtiberi as a mixture of the Iberi and the Celts. Of the former we might treat theoretically at some length, but the authority of history is wanting to give them place in a work like this. For the early settlements of the Celtæ themselves we depend too much on conjecture; yet some authority, founded upon facts, there is to justify a brief inquiry as to the period, manner, and cause of their passage into the possessions of the people of Iberia. It is by no means a settled point that the Celtæ of Iberia were of the same line as those of Gaul; yet the best authorities of antiquity support that opinion. On the other hand, they are supposed by some to have been Illyrians, who, passing into Italy and along the coasts of the Mediterranean, were only so far connected with Gaul as they may have become, in passing along its sea-board from the Alps to the Pyrenees. The period of the Celtic establishment in Gaul may be, with some degree of plausibility, referred to a very celebrated era of antiquity; to that, namely, in which Sesac flourished in Egypt and Charilaus in Lacedæmonia, B. C. about 860 years, and near the time in which the affairs of Greece and Asia were receiving their first historical importance in the rhapsodies of Homer. The same calculation which fixes this epoch in the accounts of the Celtæ, supposes them to have entered from Aquitaine in Gaul, not long after their occupation of that country, and to have migrated slowly along the shores of the Atlantic, settling first the regions of Gallicia and Lusitania, and passing at a later period into Bætica. Firmly established in this part of the peninsula, and giving their name to the inhabitants, who were thence called Celtiberi, by the time that the Phœnicians arrived upon the southern coast the Celtæ had spread themselves over the whole country from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, and from beyond the Iberus to the Herculeum Fretum. The adventurous merchants of Phœnicia were long acquainted with that part of Hispania which lay nearest to their continent, before the extent of their knowledge was made known to the nations which might have emulated them in commercial enterprise: and for a long time after it became notorious that they had communication with the western parts of Europe, it was but vaguely conjectured that their intercourse was carried on with some distant region in the remotest west, or, as they expressed it, the limits of the world. The first settlement of this Asiatic people in Europe beyond the pillars of Hercules, appears to have been effected in the little island of Erythia, from whence they extended themselves, building their first great city, and founding their first great colony, at Gades, B. C. perhaps about 1000. This, to be sure, would make their arrival anterior to that of the Celts, and perhaps, though the Phœnicians certainly did not extend themselves over the peninsula so early as the former people, they may have effected this first colonization. It is more probable, however, that the account of Vell. Paterculus, on whose authority this date is principally assumed, may be erroneous. The dominion of these bold navigators and indefatigable traders was not established by conquest in any part of Spain, but introducing their arts, and in some measure their civilization, among the Celtiberians, and bartering with them on the most friendly terms, they contrived to gain an influence and to settle colonies without molestation through the greater part of what was afterwards called Bætica. While the Phœnicians were thus quietly founding colonies upon the Spanish coasts, the Carthaginians, themselves a Tyrian people and inheriting the commercial spirit of their fathers, with a more warlike character, appeared to dispute the possession of this rich territory. In a short time the Phœnicians lost their principal cities, and the Carthaginians established themselves in their stead, not as the tenants, but as the masters of the soil which they occupied. In the mean time these were not the only people who introduced, in this western corner of Europe, the manners and character of more eastern countries. The Rhodians, Samians, and Phocæans, founded also colonies in these distant regions, and mingled with the Iberian, Celtic, and Phœnician, the character and language of the Asiatic Greeks. The islanders of Zante at the same time laid the foundation of Saguntum, and the Phocæans of Marseilles erected the city of Ampurias, the Emporiæ of the Romans. These cities, beholding with jealousy the advances of the Carthaginians, had recourse to the alliance of Rome, and, as the allies of the Ampuritans, the Romans first displayed their ensigns beyond the Pyrenees. The various incidents of the war that followed belong to history, and we have here only to observe, that with this began the Roman dominion in Hispania. The natives did not, indeed, immediately submit to the rule of the friends whose assistance they had unadvisedly sought; but the Romans did not the less proceed to divide the whole peninsula into the Nearer and the Farther Spain, Hispania Citerior and Ulterior, the former extending from the Pyrenees to the head waters of the Tagus and the Anas, now the Guadiana and the Bætis, along the Orospeda mons to the Mediterranean. Under their native Lusitanian leader Viriatus, the inhabitants made an effort to regain their independence; but the destiny of Rome prevailed, and the valour and conduct of this unblemished patriot were exercised in vain. The magnificent attempt of Sertorius to re-establish the ancient liberty now perishing at Rome, in this far distant province, was frustrated by the treachery of one of his officers; three years of glorious resistance under the younger Pompey, were terminated by the victory of the Roman legions, whose numbers had overwhelmed the young warriors of Lusitania; and Spain had made her last stand for liberty. A partial rising in the north-west was easily but not cheaply quelled by the imperial forces, and nothing remained for the people of Hispania but submission and a hopeless peace. "Under Augustus, the ulterior province was again parted into two, Bætica and Lusitania; at the same time that the citerior assumed the name of Tarraconensis, from Tarraco, its metropolis. This Tarraconois occupied all the northern part from the foot of the Pyrenees to the mouth of the Durius, where Lusitania terminated; and the eastern, almost entire, to the confines of Bætica, which, deriving this name from the river Bætis, that traversed it during its whole course, extended from the north to the west along the bank of the river Anas, by which it was separated from Lusitania; whilst this last-mentioned province was continued thence to the ocean, between the mouths of the Anas and Durius. This division of Spain must be regarded as properly belonging to the principal and dominant state of ancient geography. It was not till about the age of Dioclesian and Constantine, when the number of provinces was multiplied by subdivisions, that the Tarraconois was dismembered into two new provinces; one towards the limits of Bætica, and adjacent to the Mediterranean, to which the city of Carthago nova communicated the name of Carthaginensis; the other on the ocean to the north of Lusitania, and to which the nation of Callaici or Callæci, in the angle of Spain which advances towards the north-east, has given the name Callæcia, still subsisting in that of Gallicia. Independently of this distinction of provinces, Spain under the Roman government was divided into jurisdictions, called Conventus, of which there are counted fourteen; each one formed of the union of several cities, who held their assizes in the principal city of the district. We proceed now to a particular description of each province." (D'Anville.) It is probable that Bætica was among the earliest inhabited, or at least among the first that received a foreign colony. The principal people by which it was inhabited were the following: 1st. The Turdetani, the most powerful of all, and so extensively spread throughout the province, that the name of Turdetania was sometimes applied to it instead of that of Bætica. Near to these in Bætica, and also in Lusitania, were the Turduli, confounded often with their more powerful neighbours. The southern coast of this province, the earliest that bent to the fortune of Rome, was occupied by the Bastuli, who, from their surname of Pæni, are thought to have been of Carthaginian origin, and later, therefore, in the peninsula than the other people mentioned above. The people who after the dissemination of the race of Celts throughout the country, still retained the name of Celtici in contradistinction to all the rest, resided near the Anas, between that river and the Tagus, on the coast. In Lusitania, the people from whom that province took its name, extended from the Tagus, also on the coast, to the Durius, and inland as far as the country of the Vettones, on the borders of Tarraconensis. In the western part of the latter dwelt the Callaici, a people, or perhaps a number of people, remarkable for their valour and unyielding love of liberty. The Artabri, who may have belonged to this confederacy, were, however, separately, a considerable nation inhabiting the district terminating in the promontory Artabro, Cape Finisterre. Eastward of these, between the Pyrenees and the coast, were the Astures, in the modern Asturias; and still farther in the same direction, and within the same mountains and the sea, were the Cantabri, composed of many smaller families, and all partaking of the character of the Celts, who first, upon their march from Gaul, pursued the line of coast which their posterity retained. Eastward of these people, and on the Spanish side of the Pyrenees, were settled the Vascones, who at a later period entered Gaul, and gave their name, then slightly modified, to Gascony. They extended to the banks of the Iberus or Ebro, in the country named in modern times Navarre. Still farther east, between the mountains, the river, and the coast, were the Illergetes, the Ceretani, the Indigetes, the Ausetani, the Laletani, the Cosetani, &c. in that country, the present inhabitants of which are designated Catalans. The Bastitani, Contestani, Edetani, and Oretani, with many other nations, occupied the rest of Tarraconensis as far as the borders of the province of Bætica. Among these deserving of peculiar notice, are the Carpentani and the Celtiberi, masters, according to Polybius, of 300 flourishing cities. A long repose succeeded the final extension of the imperial power over all the territories possessed by all these people; the wars of Rome with the barbarians, and the occupation of the provinces of the empire by the northern warriors, were the first interruption of the long tranquillity enjoyed by the subdued but not oppressed peninsula. The policy of the emperors used the ambition and rapacity of one barbarian horde as a defence against another; and the fierce people from the borders of the Baltic, and the forests of northern

Germany, who, under the name of Vandals, Sueves, and Alans, in the reign of Honorius endeavoured to force the farthest barriers of the provinces, were for a time repelled by the arms of the stipendiary Goths, who, about the same time, partly as tributaries and partly as conquerors, had established themselves in Catalonia. About the year 419, the Gothic leader having died, the Vandals rose again, and passing into Spain, affixed their name in that of Vandalusia, now Andalusia, to that part of Bætica which lay between the Marianus and Orospeda montes and the littoral of the Mediterranean. The wars that succeeded were almost without intermission, and left at last in possession of the Goths the whole of Spain except Galicia, which remained in the hands of the Suevi, together with the part of Lusitania between the Minius and the Dutrius, Asturia and a portion of the Tarraconensis forming afterwards a part of the kingdoms of Leon and of Old Castile. Till 712 the Goths retained possession of this country, engrafting on the various manners, customs, and languages of the different people by which it was populated, their own peculiar characteristics, when a new people, crossing over from Africa, put an end to their rule, and fixed a Moorish monarchy in Spain. The fall of this empire, and the expulsion of the Moors from Granada by the Catholic king Ferdinand, may be considered as the final establishment of the Spanish monarchy. The manner in which the country was first colonized, the numberless changes which it underwent, affecting radically the character of its various populations, have deprived the Spaniards of all national characteristics, and made the people as various as the climate and the soil. Galicia and the north bear yet the evidence of having entertained the bold and hardy children of the wild forests and frozen seas of Germany; while the sea-coast of the Mediterranean is covered with a population that yet betrays its Moorish origin. The following account of the rivers and mountains of Spain is taken from D'Anville: "On the side where it is not environed by the sea, it is enclosed by the Pyrenees, which separate it from Gaul. Iberus, the Ebro, is the most northern of its rivers. Durius, the Duero, (or, according to the Portuguese, Douro,) and the Tagus, or the Tajo which traverse the middle of this continent, shape their courses almost in a parallel direction towards the west. In the southern part Anas, or Guadi-Ana and Bætis, which, under the domination of the Maures in Spain, assumed the appellation of Guadi-al-Kibir, or the Great River, run more obliquely from the east towards the south. Sucro, or the Xucar, which empties itself into the Mediterranean; and Minius, or the Minho (which should be pronounced Migno,) having its mouth in the ocean northward of the Durius, may also be cited here; omitting at present the mention of other rivers, which will more properly be found in the detail of particular provinces. Among the mountains described by the ancients, that of Idubeda extends its name to a long chain, which, from the country of the Cantabrians towards the north, continues southward to that of the Celtiberians. Orospeda is a circle of mountains enveloping the sources of the Bætis: and what is now called Sierra Morena derives its name from Marianus mons, between Castile and Andalusia. This continent forms many promontories, of which three are sufficiently eminent to be distinguished here: Charidemum on the Mediterranean, now Cape Gata; Sacrum, and Artabrum or Nerium, on the ocean; the first of which has taken the name of St. Vincent, and the other that of Finisterre. And these are the features of nature most prominent and remarkable in this country." The precious metals, which, in the early ages the mountain regions of this peninsula so abundantly produced, have long disappeared; the mines have been exhausted, and nothing but the authority of the historian remains to give credibility to the relations of antiquity concerning the prodigious supplies of gold, &c. which not only the Phœnicians, but in much later days the Romans, drew from this affluent soil. Yet concurrent testimonies prove, that, on the first arrival of the Phœnicians, so abundant was the return of this first of all the metals which they obtained for their trifling wares, that their ships being insufficient for its transportation in freight, they were obliged to cast it into the form of anchors, and other necessary implements, to convey it across the waters. Bossi St. Spagn.

Histiæa, "one of the most considerable of the Eubœan cities, founded, as it is said, by an Athenian colony, in the district of Ellopia, which once communicated its name to the whole country. Scymnus of Chios, however, ascribes a Thessalian origin to this town. It fell into the hands of the Persians after the retreat of the Grecian fleet from Artemisium. But it did not remain long in their possession, and on the termination of the Persian war it became, with the rest of Eubœa, subject to Athens. In the attempt afterwards made to shake off the galling yoke of this power, Histiæa probably took a prominent part, if we may judge from the severity displayed towards its unfortunate inhabitants by Pericles, who expelled them from their possessions, and sent Athenian colonists to occupy the lands which they had evacuated. Strabo, on the authority of Theopompus, informs us, that the Histiæans withdrew on this occasion to Macedonia. From henceforth we find the name of their town changed to Oreus, which at first was that of a small place dependent on Histiæa, at the foot of mount Telethrius, and near the spot called Drymos on the banks of the river Callas. This city no longer existed in Pliny's time. Its ruins are still to be seen near the coast opposite to the cape Volo of Thessaly." Cram. Gr.

Histonium, "once the haunt of savage pirates, who, as Strabo reports, formed their dwellings from the wrecks of ships, and in other respects lived more like beasts of prey than civilized beings. This town is, however, afterwards enumerated by Frontinus among the colonies of Rome; and its ruins, which are still visible, attest that it was not wanting in splendour and extent." This place was in the country of the Frentani, north of the mouth of the Trinius. It is now called Vasta d'Ammone. Cram. It.

Histria, that part of Venetia which lay below the river Formio in the shape of a peninsula, between the waters of the Tergesticus

Sinus, the Adriatic, and the Flanaticus Sinus, or rather the river Arsia. Before the time of Augustus, Histria formed no part of Italy, which was terminated on the north-east by the Formio; but that emperor having extended the limits of Cisalpine Gaul, one of his Italian provinces, as far as the Arsia, of course included Histria in Italy. The Histrians were originally an Illyrian people, and like the other Illyrians, probably of Thracian origin. Ancient fable has rendered Histria more famous than it would have become from its political or historical importance; and the fiction of the Argonauts, with the tragic story that gave name to the Absyrtides, according to mythological traditions, has given it a frequent place in the pages of the first poets of antiquity.

Homole. "Mount Homole, the extreme point of Magnesia to the north, was probably a portion of the chain of Ossa; and celebrated by the poets as the abode of the ancient Centaurs and Lapithæ, and a favourite haunt of Pan.

Cen, duo nubigenæ quum vertice montis ab alto
Descendunt Centauri, Homolen Othrymque nivalem
Linquentes cursu rapido. Æn. 7, 674.

From Pausanias we learn that it was extremely fertile, and well supplied with springs and fountains. One of these were apparently the Libethrian fountain. Strabo says that mount Homole was near the mouth of the Peneus, and Apollonius describes it as close to the sea." Cram.

Homoloides, one of the seven gates of Thebes. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 252.

Homonada, now Ermenak, on the Calycadnus, among the Taurus mountains, and towards the borders of Isauria. This town of Cilicia Trachæa was situated in such a manner as to be almost impregnable; and the inhabitants, like all the other people of those regions, (Vid. Cilicia,) being greatly addicted to a predatory life, were enabled in these fastnesses to carry on in the surrounding country an harassing war of depredation with the greatest security.

Horestæ, a Caledonian people inhabiting the northern margin of the Frith of Tay, and extending perhaps to the southern bank of the Esk. D'Anville.

Horta, or Hortinum, a town of the Sabines, on the confluence of the Nar and the Tiber. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.

Horti, I. (Agrippæ.) Near to the Pantheon were the gardens and baths of Agrippa, bequeathed by that proprietary to the people of Rome. In these gardens was the collection of water upon which the emperor Nero entertained himself with sea-fights and aquatic sports. A part of this piece of water was called the Euripus.——II. Cæsaris. The celebrated gardens of Cæsar, bequeathed also by that destroyer of the people's rights to the people he had destroyed, were situate in the region called Transtyberina.

"Moreover he hath left you all his walks
His private arbours and new planted orchards
On this side Tiber; he hath left them you To walk abroad and recreate yourselves."

——III. Domitiæ. The gardens of Domitia, the aunt of Nero, were also in this region, in the Campus Vaticanus. Long afterwards the emperor Hadrian erected there a mausoleum for himself, which, the principal defence of modern Rome, has gained still more celebrity as the Castle of St. Angelo, the last resort of the Roman pontiffs in cases of sedition and attack, than as the proud structure intended to ennoble the worthless remains of a vain Roman emperor.——IV. Lamiæ. The gardens of Lamia, in which were deposited the last remains of Caligula, adjoined those of Mæcenas in the region called Esquilina.——V. Julii Martialis. These retreats, commemorated by the poet Martial, the nephew of the person to whom they belonged and whose name they bore, were situated on the side of the hill now known as the Monte Mario, in the region Transtyberina, among the ancient Romans the Clivus Cinnæ.——VI. Neronis. A little farther from the banks of the river were the gardens of Nero, and here the imperial executioner stood to delight in the torments inflicted by his orders on the persecuted disciples of the new religion of the Galilæans.——VII. Sallustii. In the region called Alta Semita, near the baths of Diocletian and the circus of Flora, were the famous gardens of Sallust. The brief remarks of Eustace on the gardens of Sallust, and on those of the Romans in general, will serve to give some notion of those elegant retreats of the ancient poet, philosopher, or sensualist. "The various villas that encircle modern Rome form one of its characteristic beauties, as well as one of the principal features of its resemblance to the ancient city, which seems to have been environed with gardens, and almost studded with groves and shady retirements. Thus Julius Cæsar had a spacious garden on the banks of the Tiber, at the foot of the Janiculum, which he bequeathed to the Roman people: Mæcenas enclosed, and converted into a pleasure-ground, a considerable part of the Esquiline hill, which before had been the common burial-place of the lower classes and the resort of thieves and vagabonds; an alteration which Horace mentions with complacency in his eighth satire. To these we may add the Horti Lucullani and Serviliani, incidently mentioned by Tacitus, and particularly the celebrated retreat of the historian Sallust, adorned with so much magnificence and luxury that it became the favourite resort of successive emperors. This garden occupied the extremities of the Viminal and Pincian hills, and enclosed in its precincts a palace, a temple, and a circus. The palace was consumed by fire on the fatal night when Alaric entered the city. The gardens of Lucullus are supposed to have bordered on those of Sallust, and with several other delicious retreats, which covered the summit and brow of the Pincian mount, gave it its ancient appellation of Collis Hortulorum. To the intermingled graces of town and country that adorned these fashionable mansions of the rich and luxurious Romans, Horace alludes, when, addressing Fuscus Aristius, he says

Nempe inter varias nutritur sylva columnas—

as in the verse immediately following

Laudaturque domus longos quæ prospicit agros.
Hor. Ep. 1, 10.

he evidently hints at the extensive views which might be enjoyed from the lofty apartments, erected expressly for the purpose of commanding a wide range of country."

Hostilia, a town on the Po. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 40.—Plin. 21, c. 12.

Hunni, a people of Sarmatia, who invaded the empire of Rome in the fifth century, and settled in Pannonia, to which they gave the name of Hungary. Of all the barbarian invaders of the Roman empire, there are none whose immediate origin is more obscure, or whose early progress is more unsatisfactorily traced, than that of the Huns. Two modes may be adopted in the investigation of their rise, which, leading at first to apparently different results, may yet perhaps be reconciled. The former of these observes the analogy, in customs, language, habits, and traditions, between the Hunni and other northern and north-eastern tribes; the latter argues from the reports, unsatisfactory and insufficient, that classic authors, or rather authors living after the classic ages, have handed down to us. The argument deduced from affinities of language join the population of Hungary to the Finnish tribes that dwelt about the Uralian countries; but this refers rather to the people who occupied the countries within which the later Huns, on their first arrival, fixed themselves, than to those Huns or Magiars themselves. The Huns of Asia, however, long before their passage towards Europe, had extended from the Chinese wall over a large portion of the northern parts of Asia, when the increase of the imperial power on the south, and the hostility of innumerable smaller nations that had swelled the Hunnish power within the first century of our era, reduced that haughty race to the alternative of servitude or emigration. While submission and subjection seemed to many preferable to the abandonment of their homes, large numbers resolved to follow their fortunes in the wide regions, both cultivated and uncultivated, that lay before them. One body, pushing their march towards the borders of the Persian empire, possessed themselves of the province of Sogdiana; while another, proceeding still further in the direction of Europe, established a temporary abode on the banks of the Volga, in the country named from them Great Hungary. "The Ouni," says Malte-Brun, "inhabited the northern shores of the Caspian Sea in the first century of the Christian era, and a hundred years afterwards they were settled on the banks of the Borysthenes. These people were in all probability the Huns who rendered themselves illustrious in the fourth and fifth centuries; they occupied the same countries, they were distinguished by the same names." To the same effect writes that soundest geographer, D'Anville, who adds that they were also still masters of their seats beside the Caspian as late as the close of the 5th century. "In the description," he continues, "that we have of the person of Attila, we recognize the features of the Calmucks who wander over the immense plains of Tartary, which extend from the north of the Caspian Sea to the frontier of China. For he was short of stature, with high shoulders, broad head, little eyes, flat nose, of swarthy tint, and almost without beard. Sabiri was a particular name to those Huns established at the foot of Caucasus." The crossing of the Volga by this people was the beginning of new contests, in which it was again to be engaged for many years, but always as a conqueror. The Alani were the first subdued by them, and the Hunnish ranks were swelled by immense numbers of the valiant Alani, who were suffered to unite with their conquerors. The Gothic empire of Hermanric, extending from the Baltic to the Euxine, next yielded to the Hunnish power; and these victorious tribes pursued the dying hordes, less valiant and less dreaded only than themselves, to beg protection within the still sheltering power of the Roman dominions. (Vid. Gothi.) This was the first appearance of the Turkish race in Europe, for it is evident that, though in their Finnish relations they are connected with the people of the north, in their Asiatic origin they belong to the Tartar race of the Altai, as do also the Turks, whose migrations are only of a later date. The Huns now spread themselves from the Volga to the Danube, committing depredations, and still the terror as well of the less savage barbarians as of the empire, but yet without a settled government. About the year 433 this government was established, the kingdom of Attila was spread over Germany, and Scythia, and a large division of the eastern empire was detached from the dominion of the emperor and added to the Hunnish monarch's throne, while his power was felt, if his authority and right were not acknowledged, by tribute, over all the region through which the earlier Huns had passed to the walls of the distant Chinese territory. But this extensive empire lasted only while its founder lived to rule and animate, and add to it; and the revival of the thrones of the Gepidæ and the Ostrogoths betokened the dissolution of the Hunnish dominion. The remains of this people, who had retreated to the narrow country of the Lesser Scythia, were soon after overwhelmed by new comers from the inexhaustible north. Thus were extinguished for a time the name and power of the Huns who had ventured within the pale of the empire; but an immense number had remained, or had since been born, of those that had been left in the forests of Sarmatia, and still continued, under the name of Bulgarians, to threaten the civilized inhabitants of the west. Meanwhile new revolutions in the centre of Asia were preparing new enemies for Europe; and the Avars, another horde of savages, descended from the same stock as the Huns, being driven by the oppressive power of the Tartars, who had now received the name of Turks, appeared to dispute with the Bulgarians and Slavonians the possessions of extensive countries in the European Sarmatia. In the wars of the Lombards and Gepidæ, these Avars combined with the former, and on the extermination of their enemies they transferred themselves to the milder seats which had thus been rendered destitute, and spread themselves in the provinces of Mœsia and Dacia, in the modern countries of Wallachia, Moldavia, Transylvania, and Hungary, on the farther side of the Danube. When Alboin, the Lombard king, evacuating

Pannonia, passed to the invasion and conquest of Italy, the Huns or Avars, transporting themselves over the Danube, effected the settlement of the province thus abandoned by their allies and friends. Here, for upwards of 200 years, they remained without any considerable interruption of their rule, when, after that lapse of time, the authority of the new empire of the west, revived in Charlemagne, was extended over this province of the former emperors. Such is a brief outline of the progress and settlement of the Huns and Avars in Europe, the later incursions of the Hungarians are yet to be traced and elucidated. It does not appear that the first invaders of Europe from the Tartar countries at any time forgot their distant homes and Asiatic origin, and the borders of Persia were inhabited by a race which, as well as the shepherds of the Volga, acknowledged an affinity with the descendants of the Huns of Attila. We have already seen a later branch of the same people, with the name of Turks, pursuing the march of their brethren from the confines of China, and driving before them the weaker but unconquerable Avars. The eastern name of these people seem to have been Magiars, and this also is the name of a portion of that people by whom the last barbarian conquests were effected in Hungary, and who still form a part, though not a large one, of the population of that country. The following is the Hungarian account of this migration and incursion, in which the scattered bodies of the former tribe, collecting from all parts of unciyilized Europe, united with the Magiars, forming what is called the Hungarian horde, to establish the kingdom of Hungary. "We learn from the old national songs of the Magiars that three countries are situated in the heart of Scythia, Dens or Dentu, Moger or Magar, and Bostard. The inhabitants of these regions are clothed in ermine; gold and silver are as common as iron, the channels of the rivers are covered with precious stones. Magog, the eastern neighbour of Gog, was a grandson of Japheth, and the first king of Scythia. According to a different tradition, Magor and Hunor, the first Scythian monarchs, left a hundred and eight descendants, the founders of as many tribes. Ethele or Attila was sprung from Japheth, and Ugek from Attila. The second migration of the Hungarians from Scythia took place under the son of Ugek or Almus, whose birth was foretold in a dream; the first happened in the time of Attila. A redundant population was the cause of these migrations. Two thousand men departed from every one of the 108 tribes, and the total number amounted to 216,000, who were divided into seven armies, each of which was made up of 30,857, warriors, commanded by seven princes or dukes, the Hetou Moger or the seven Magiars. The names of the leaders, which are still preserved, were Almus, Eleud, Kundu, Ound, Tosu, Tuba, and Tukutum. The Hungarians passed the Wolga near the town of Tulbora, and marched on Sousdal, which might have been the same as Susat, the ancient capital of Attila's empire. They removed from that place and settled in Lebedias, probably in the neighbourhood of Lebedian, a town in the government of Varonez (Woronesch.) They were invited from their new territory by king Arnolphus of Germany to combat Sviátopolk, king of Great Moravia. Duke Almus put himself at the head of an army, passed through the country of the Slavonians in Kiovia (Kiow,) defeated the troops that opposed him, and reached the confines of Hungary by the Russian principality of Lodomiria or Wladimir. Arpad, his son, crossed the Carpathian mountains, and invaded the country on the Upper Theiss, which is now protected by the fortress of Ungh-Var that was built in 884. But according to another account the Hungarians entered Transylvania in 862, and were driven from it in 889 by the Patzinakites or Petchenegues. These tribes, however, were not perhaps under the dominions of Arpad. Such is the history of the Hungarian migrations according to their own traditions, which unfortunately are disregarded and rejected by the monks, the only persons who could have preserved them entire. The three regions, Dentu, Mager, and Bostard, were Tenduck or Turfan, Great Hungary or the country of the Magiars, and Baschirs or Bushkursi, the Pascatir of Rubruquis. The first was ruled by kings of the Unghs, and the second was the earliest known country of the Magiars. It follows from these statements that the Hungarians must have occupied at one time a very extensive country, but the details are not for that reason incorrect; on the contrary, other facts, independently of the seven princes and the seven tribes, appear to corroborate them. When compared with the statements of different historians, and combined with our hypothesis concerning the Huns and Fins, the migrations of the Hungarians across Russia, then peopled by hordes of the same race, and their settlements in the Hunni-Var, cannot be thought improbable or fabulous. The epoch of the migration, which is said to have taken place before the year 800, may not be accurately known; but it may be maintained, without inquiring whether the early exploits of the Huns under Attila were confounded with the achievements of the Magiars, that the latter possessed Lebedias longer than is generally believed. The passages in Constantine Porphyrogenetes concerning the respective countries of the Mazares, Chazares, and Russians, in the early part of the tenth century, are very obscure; still, according to the text, and exclusive of every arbitrary correction, they prove, in our opinion, that the Magiars inhabited the banks of the Upper Don after the Ougres, whom the Byzantines confounded with the Turks, were settled in the Hunni-Var. As we cannot enter into the long discussions to which the subject might lead, it only remains for us to state briefly the causes or events by which the limits of Hungary have at different times been altered. The irruptions of the Hungarians into Germany and Italy were finally checked by the victories of Henry the 1st at Merseburg in 933, and of Otho the 1st at Augsburg in 955. The Hungarians were then a barbarous people, addicted to superstition and magic, like the Finns; eating horse-flesh at their religious feasts like the Scandinavians. The names of their divinities are now unknown." A summary of this latter invasion is given by the same writer in the following words: "The Hungarians entered the basin of the Theiss and the Danube by the plain now protected by

.he forts of Ungh-Var and Munkatsch; they invaded all the low country, and left the mountainous districts on the north and north-west to the Slovacks, once the subjects of the Moravian or Maravanian monarchy. They advanced on the south-west to the base of the Styrian and Croatian mountains, and met in these regions Slavonic tribes, the Wends and Croatians. The Hungarians were accustomed to a pastoral life, and possessed numerous flocks and herds, for which the large plains were well adapted. The same country had been successively subdued by the Pannonians, Sarmatians, Huns, and Awares; but several Hungarian tribes inhabited, probably at an early period, the mountains in the north-west of Transylvania, or the basin of the two Szamos, which was called Black Hungary in the year 1002, or at the time of its union with Hungary Proper. It has been seen that the Szecklers in the eastern part of Transylvania are a Hungarian or semi-Hungarian tribe, that have existed in their present country since the ninth century. The population of the whole nation, including the Cumanians and Jazyges, amounts to four millions, of whom nearly 500,000 are settled in Transylvania." Malte-Brun.

Hyampeia, one of the rocks, which, rising above the city of Delphi, belonged to Parnassus, and caused the mountain to receive the epithet of Διχορυφος. Between this summit and that called Naupleia was precipitated the fountain of Castaly; and from them also the criminals convicted of sacrilege were precipitated. The name of Phædriades was given to these summits when spoken of in connexion. Herodotus, 8, 39.—Diodor. Sic. 16, 523.—Soph. Ant. 1126.

Hyampolis, a city of Phocis, on the Cephisus, founded by the Hyanthes. Herodot. 8.

Hyanthes, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Bœotia, from king Hyas. Cadmus is sometimes called Hyanthius, because he is king of Bœotia. Ovid Met. 3, v. 147.

Hyantis, an ancient name of Bœotia.

Hybla, a mountain in Sicily, where thyme and odoriferous flowers of all sorts grew in abundance. It is famous for its honey. There is, at the foot of the mountain, a town, called, to distinguish it from others of the same name in the island, Magna.——Another Hybla, south of the former, and not far to the north of Syracuse, was called also Megaris. Paus. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43, l. 5, c. 25.—Sil. 14, v. 26.—Stat. 14, v. 201.—A city of Attica bears also the name of Hybla.

Hydaspes. This river, celebrated for the passage of Alexander before engaging with Porus, was known to the ancients by a variety of names; nor do the moderns recognise it by fewer designating appellations. Like many other of the head waters of the Indus, this river, a principal tributary of that famous stream, is created by the springs of the vast Himalah, and, flowing through the district of Cashmire, it is navigable for vessels of a great tonnage from the capital of that province to its confluence with the Acesines, with which it sends its waters to the Indus and the Arabian Sea. The modern name is Behut, but D'Anville calls it the Shantrou.

Hydraotes, a river of India, whose course is not accurately known, according to the jarring accounts of antiquity. If it be the same as the Persian Ravee or Rawi, it rose like the Hydaspes, in the Himalah mountains to the east of the sources of that river and of the Acesines, and running through that part of the anciently ill-defined India, or the modern Cashmire, Lahore, and Moollar, discharged itself at some distance below the junction of those rivers above their confluence with the great river which absorbed them all. Chaussard.

Hydruntum, and Hydrus, a city of Calabria, 50 miles south of Brundusium. As the distance from thence to Greece was only 60 miles, Pyrrhus, and afterwards Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, meditated the building here a bridge across the Adriatic. Though so favourably situated, Hydrus, now called Otranto, is but an insignificant town, scarce containing 3000 inhabitants. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic. 15, Att. 21, l. 16, ep. 5.—Lucan. 5, v. 375.

Hylas, a river of Bithynia. This river was connected with the fable of Hylas. Vid. Part III.

Hyle, a town of Bœotia, on the Hylice Palus, which derived its name from that of the town. This little spot, though inconsiderable in size and population, was of great antiquity, and is twice mentioned by Homer. The waters of the lake on which it stood were derived from the Copaic lake by one of its numerous subterranean passages; and on their banks, extending perhaps a distance of about five miles, the ruins of Hyle are still discernible.

Hylias, a river of Magna Græcia. "The river Hylias, which formed, as may be collected from Thucydides, the line of separation between the territories of Thurii and Crotona, answers according to Romanelli, to a rivulet named Calonato. The Greek historian informs us, that the Athenian troops which were sent to reinforce their army in Sicily, having landed at Thurii, marched along the coast till they arrived on the banks of the Hylias, where they were met by a deputation sent from Crotona to interdict their progress through the territory of that city."

Hylice Palus. Vid. Hyle.

Hyllus, a river of Lydia, flowing into the Hermus. It is called also Phryx and Phrygius. Liv. 37, c. 38.—Herodot. 1, c. 180.

Hymettus, a mountain of Attica, about 22 miles in circumference, and about two miles from Athens. "This celebrated mountain forms the southern portion of the considerable chain which, under the several names of Parnes, Pentelicus, and Brilessus, traverses nearly the whole of Attica from north-east to south-west. It was divided into two summits, one of which was Hymettus properly so called, the other, Anydros, or the dry Hymettus. The former is now Trelovouni, the latter, Lampro vouni. Hymettus was especially famous for its fragrant flowers and excellent honey. It produced also marbles much esteemed by the Romans, and, according to some accounts, contained silver mines. Herodotus affirms that the Pelasgi, who, in the course of their wanderings, had settled in Attica, occupied a district situated under mount Hymettus: from this, however, they were expelled, in consequence, as Hecateus affirmed, of the jealousy entertained by the Athenians on account of the superior skill exhibited by these strangers in the culture of land. Some ruins, indicative of the site of an ancient town, near the monastery of Syriani, at the foot of mount Trelo vouni, have been thought to correspond with this old settlement of the Pelasgi, apparently called Larissa. On the crest of the mountain stood a statue of Jupiter Hymettius, and the altars of Jupiter Pluvius and Apollo Providus. 'Hymettus,' says Dodwell, 'rises gently from the northern and southern extremities to its summit; its eastern and western sides are abrupt and rocky; its outline, as seen from Athens, is even and regular, but its sides are furrowed by the winter torrents, and its base is broken into many small insular hills of a conical shape. When viewed from Pentelikon, where its breadth only is seen, it resembles mount Vesuvius in its form. The rock of this mountain is in general composed of a calcareous yellow stone. On the western side, near the monastery of Kareas, is an ancient quarry of grey marble, which contains some fine masses of white marble; but it is so much mixed with strata of green mica, that it is not comparable to the Pentelic.' The honey of mount Hymettus is still in great estimation; the best is procured at the monasteries of Sirgiani and Kareas. Dodwell remarks that the Athenians use it in most of their dishes, and conceive that it renders them long-lived and healthy. The modern name of Hymettus is Trelo-vouni, or the Mad mountain. This singular appellation is accounted for from the circumstance of its having been translated from the Italian Monte Matto, which is nothing else than an unmeaning corruption of mons Hymettus. It appears from Horace's account to have been once covered with forests, if he is not rather alluding to the marble blocks cut from the mountain.

Hypæpa, or Ipepæ, now Berki, a town of Lydia, sacred to Venus, between mount Tmolus and the Caystrus. Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 152.

Hypānis, a river of European Scythia, now called Bog, which falls into the Borysthenes, and with it into the Euxine. Herodot. 4, c. 52, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 285.

Hypates, a river of Sicily, near Camarina. Ital. 14, v. 231.

Hypata, a town of Thessaly on the Sperchius, the chief city of the Œniones. The national councils of the Ætolians were frequently held in this place, which is said to have fallen into the possession of that people; and the magic art was thought to be practised there to a very great extent and with the greatest success. In the geography of the lower empire, this place was designated by the name of Neæ Patræ, and its ruins are even yet discoverable near the present Patragick. Liv. 41, c. 25.

Hyperbŏrei, a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, who were said to live to an incredible age, even to a thousand years, and in the enjoyment of all possible felicity. The sun was said to rise and set to them but once a year, and therefore perhaps they are placed by Virgil under the north pole. The word signifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the residence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings, they always sent them towards the south, and the people of Dodona were the first of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans is applied, in general, to all those who inhabit any cold climate. Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 17.—Mela, 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 240, l. 3, v. 169 and 381.—Herodot. 4, c. 13, &c.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 23, l. 4, c. 12.

Hyperea, and Hyperia, I. a fountain of Thessaly, with a town of the same name. Strab. 9.——II. Another in Messenia, in Peloponnesus. Flacc. 1, v. 375.

Hyphasis, called also Hypanis, according to the oriental geographers Beah or Biah, a river of India. To the south-east of the sources of the Hydaspes, Acesines, and Hydraotis, this river rose in the high mountains of Asia, between India and Scythia, and, after flowing through that ill-explored country which Alexander's conquests only reached, it fell into the Acesines, or, as some believed, into the Indus itself. The modern Lahore is watered on the east by this river, after it comes from Cashmire; and its waters on the south-eastern confines of the former district, taking a western bend, divide the provinces of Moultan, Beerkonair, and Daopatra. This is generally considered to have marked the limit of the conquests of the mad Macedonian.

Hypsa, now Belici, a river of Sicily, falling into the Crinisus, and then into the Mediterranean near Selinus. Ital. 14, v. 228.

Hyrcania, I. a country of Asia, bounded on the north by the Hyrcanian or Caspian Sea, on the east by Margiana, on the south by Parthia, and on the west by Atropatia or Atropatene, the northern part of Media. "Divided from Parthia by the interposition of Coronus, part of the main body of mount Taurus; the way through which, said by the Persians to be cut at one blow by the scymitar of Mortis Hali, their second Mahomet, is not above forty yards in breadth in the broadest parts of it; the hills on both sides towering to the very clouds; with small strength easily defended against mighty armies. It took the name of Hyrcania from Hyrcana, a large and spacious forest between it and Scythia: sometimes called Caspia also, from the Caspii, a chief people of it; of whom it is reported, that when their parents came to the age of 70 years, they used to shut them up and starve them, as being then no longer useful to the commonwealth. But both these names growing out of use, it is by Mercator called Dargument, by some late travellers Mezendram, and by some others Corcam." The ancient capital of the country was Hyrcania, now Jorjan or Corcan. Heyl. Cosm.——II. A town of Lydia, destroyed by a violent earthquake in the time of Tiberius. It was situated in the plain to the north of the Hermus, and received its name from a body of Hyrcanians, transported thither under the kings of Persia from the borders of the Caspian. Marmora probably occupies its site. D'Anville.

Hyrcānum mare, a large sea, called also Caspian. Vid. Caspium Mare.

Hyrium, or Uria, a town of Apulia, which gave name to the Sinus Urias. Its "position has not yet been clearly ascertained, partly from the circumstance of there being another town of the same name in Messapia, and partly from the situation assigned to it by Pliny, to the south of the promontory of Garganus, not agreeing with the topography of Strabo. Hence Cluverius and Cellarius were led to imagine that there were two distinct towns named Uria and Hyrium; the former situated to the south, the latter to the north of the Garganus. It must be observed, however, that Dionysius Periegetes, and Ptolemy mention only Hyrium, and therefore it is probable that the error has originated with Pliny. At any rate, we may safely place the Hyreium of Strabo at Rodi. Catullus probably alludes to this town in his address to Venus." Cram.

HYRIA, I. a borough of Bœotia, near Aulis, with a lake, river, and town, of the same name. ——II. or URIA, a town in the northern part of the Iapygian peninsula, "between Brindisi and Tarento, apparently of great antiquity, since its foundation is ascribed by Herodotus to some Cretans, who formed part of an expedition to avenge the death of Minos, who perished in Sicily, whither he went in pursuit of Dædalus. After the failure of this second enterprise, the remaining Cretans, as Herodotus relates, being wrecked on their return home near the shores of Iapygia, settled there, and founded the city of Hyria, together with other colonies; and from their intermixing with the natives of the country, these Cretans were henceforth called Iapygian Messapians. It was this circumstance probably which gave rise to the notion that the Iapygians were a colony of Crete. The same historian relates, that the Tarentines made several attempts to destroy these Cretan settlements, but that on one occasion, they, with their allies, the people of Rhegium, met with so signal an overthrow, that their loss in the field was greater than had ever before been experienced by any Grecian city. Strabo, in his description of Iapygia, does not fail to cite this passage of Herodotus, but he seems undetermined whether to recognise the town founded by the Cretans in that of Thyræi, or in that of Veretum. 'By the first, which he mentions as placed in the centre of the isthmus, and formerly the capital of the country, he seems to designate Oria; Veretum, it is well known, being situated near the sea, towards the extreme point of the peninsula. It is probable the word Thyræi is corrupt; for elsewhere Strabo calls it Uria, and describes it as standing on the Appian Way, between Brundusium and Tarentum. Reference is also made to Uria by Appian, and by Frontinus, who speaks of the Urianus ager; and it is likewise marked in the Table Itinerary." Cram.

HYRMINE, a town and promontory of Elis, the former of which had disappeared in Strabo's time, while the latter remained. It was near the port of Cyllene, and now bears the name of Cape Chiarenza. Cram.

HYSIE, a town of Bœotia, "at the foot of Cithæron, and to the east of Platæa, which appears at one time to have been included within the limits of Attica, since Herodotus terms it one of the border demi belonging to that province; elsewhere he leads us to infer that it was assigned to the Platæans by a special arrangement of the Athenians. Strabo affirms that it was founded by Nycteus, father of Antiope, in the Parasopian district. Pausanias expressly states that Hysiæ was a Bœotian town, but in his time it was in ruins. The vestiges of Hysiæ should be looked for near the village of Platania, said to be one mile from Platæa, according to Sir W. Gell." Cram.

I.

IALYSUS, a town of Rhodes, built by Ialysus, of whom Protogenes was making a beautiful painting when Demetrius Poliorcetes took Rhodes. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 9.—Plin. 35, c. 6.—Cic. 2, ad Attic. ep. 21.—Plut. in Dem.—Ælian. 12, c. 6.

JANICULUM, and JANICULARIUS MONS, one of the seven hills at Rome, joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel to protect the place against an invasion. This hill, which was on the opposite shore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Sublicius, the first ever built across that river, and perhaps in Italy. It was less inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the grossness of the air, though from its top the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city. It is famous for the burial of king Numa and the poet Italicus. Porsenna, king of Etruria, pitched his camp on mount Janiculum, and the senators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the resentment of Octavius. Liv. 1, c. 33, &c.—Dio. 47.—Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 246.—Virg. 8, v. 358.—Mart. 4, ep. 64, l. 7, ep. 16.

IAPYDES, or IAPODES, a people who occupied that part of the Illyrian coast to the south of Histria which intervened between Greece and Italy. Their territory extended from Histria on the north, along the shore of the Flanaticus Sinus and the Hadriatic to the south, a distance of 1000 stadia; although, from Virgil's expression, Iapydis arva Timavi, we would infer that it once reached as far north at least as the Timavus. The Iapydes were reduced by Augustus. Cram.—Strab. 7, 315.—Appian. Illyr. 18.

IAPYGES. Vid. Iapygia.

IAPYGIA, a name given by the Greeks to the peninsula, which may be termed the heel of the boot, to which Italy has been likened. The Iapygian peninsula was washed on the east and south by the Ionian Sea, and on the west by the gulf of Tarentum. It included within its limits the territories of the Sallentines, Calabrians, Tarentines, and Messapians. The Iapyges unquestionably deserve to be classed among the earliest tribes of Italy, and settled in the country before the date of the first Grecian colony that migrated to the Italian peninsula. The language of this people, if we may place confidence in an old inscription found near Otranto, seems to be compounded of Greek and Oscan. Herod. 7, 170.—Thucyd. 7, 33.—Pausan. 10, 10.—Lanzi, t. 3, p. 620.—Cram.

IAPYGIUM, or SALLENTINUM PROMONTORIUM, the promontory in which the Iapygian peninsula terminates towards the south. "When the art of navigation was yet in its infancy, this great headland presented a conspicuous landmark to mariners bound from the ports of Greece to Sicily, of which they always availed themselves. The fleets of Athens, after having circumnavigated the Peloponnese, are represented on this passage as usually making for Corcyra, from whence they steered straight across to the promontory, and then coasted along the south of Italy for the remainder of their voyage. There seems indeed to have been a sort of haven here, capable of affording shelter to vessels in tempestuous weather. Strabo describes this celebrated point of land, now called Capo di Leuca, as defining, together with the Ceraunian mountains, the line of separation between the Adriatic and the Ionian seas, whilst it formed, with the opposite cape of Lacinium, the entrance to the Tarentine gulf; the distance in both cases being 700 stadia." Cram.

Iapygum Tria Promontoria, three capes in the Brutian territory, south of the Lacinian promontory, now called Capo delle Castella, Capo Rizzulo, and Capo della Nave. Cramer.

Iasus, an island with a town of the same name, on the coast of Caria, now Assem Calasi. The bay adjoining was called Iasius Sinus. Plin. 5, c. 28.—Liv. 32, c. 33, l. 37, c. 17.

Iaxartes, now Dar-Syria, a river of Asia, confounded by the historians of Alexander with the Tanais. According to the ancient geographers the Iaxartes and Oxus both emptied into the Caspian Sea. The sea of Aral was not known by them to be distinct from the Caspian; and the latter was extended to the east so as to enclose within its waters those of the former. Malte-Brun.

Iazĭges, "a Sarmatic nation, who were surnamed Metanastæ, which denotes them to have been removed or driven from their native seats. We find other Iaziges also on the Palus Mæotis. Of the Iaziges it is remarkable that, notwithstanding the revolutions which Hungary has sustained, they are still known in the environs of a place about the height of Buda, whose name of Iaz-Berin signifies the Fountain of the Iaziges." D'Anville.—Tacit. A. 12, c. 29.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 191.—Pont. 4, el. 7, v. 9.

Ibēria, a country situated on the Caucasian isthmus, midway between the Euxine and Caspian seas. On the west it was separated from Colchis by a ridge of mountains which branch off from the chain of Caucasus in a southerly direction; to the north the Caucasian range formed a natural barrier against the incursions of the barbarian hordes of Scythia and Sarmatia; on the east Albania intervened between Iberia and the Caspian; and a common boundary marked the limits of Iberia on the south, and of Armenia on the north. The Caucasian isthmus is at present occupied by innumerable tribes, partly indigenous, and partly remnants of the numerous migrating bodies that have passed through this region at different periods in their progress towards the west, or perhaps roving parties from the country north of Caucasus, which have forced their way through the passages of that range. Of the native races the Georgians are peculiarly deserving of notice, since they occupy the whole extent of country included within the boundaries of the ancient Colchis and Iberia. The Georgians may be divided into, 1. Georgians, properly so called. 2. Imeritians. 3. Gurians. 4. Mingrelians. 5. Suanes. Ancient Iberia answers to the territory now occupied by the Imeritians and Georgians, properly so called. Imeritia is derived from Iberia or Iveria, a term under which the native writers comprehend the four kingdoms of Hartueli, Imeritia, Mingrelia, and Guria; and therefore more extensive than the Iberia of antiquity, as above described. The Imeritians occupy that part of Iberia which was contiguous to Colchis. They join the Georgians on the north-west, and speak the Georgian dialect. "The indolence of the inhabitants allows the rich gifts of the soil to perish in a most useless manner. It was here that, in old times, the Rione or Phasis had 600 bridges over it; and where there was a continual transfer of merchandise, that united this river in some measure to the Cyrus, and consequently the Caspian to the Black Sea; it is now only crossed in boats of the hollowed trunks of trees. Georgia, properly so called, which the Russians call Grusia and the Persians Gurgistan, is south-east of Imeritia. It probably derived its name from that of the river Cyrus, which waters the great valley of Georgia, and is now known as the Kur or Kor. Hence the more correct form of the name of the province would be Kurgia or Korgia. The Georgians, or rather the Iberians, a native people of Caucasus, speak a language radically different from all other known languages, and in which, in the twelfth century, a great many historical and poetical works were composed. They imagine, however, that they are descended from a common stock with the Armenians." Malte-Brun. "Iberia was not subjected to the Medes or Persians; nor could it have been well known in the west, before the Roman arms, under the conduct of Pompey, penetrated through Albania to the Caspian Sea, or till the affairs of Armenia occasioned discord with the kings of Iberia." D'Anville.—*Plut. in Luc. Ibērus, I. a river of Spain, now called Ebro, which, after the conclusion of the Punic war, separated the Roman from the Carthaginian possessions in that country. It takes its rise in the territories of the Cantabri, above Juliobriga, and near the apex of the triangle whose sides are formed by the Pyrenees and the range of mount Idubeda, while its base is represented by the line of the coast from the mouth of the Turia to the Pyrenæan promontory. The course of the river divides the country within these limits into two nearly equal sections. Lucan. 4, v. 335.—Plin. 3, c. 3. Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 50.——II. A river of Iberia in Asia, flowing from mount Caucasus into the Cyrus. Strab. 3.

Icăria, I. a small island in the Ægean Sea, between Chio, Samos, and Myconus, where the body of Icarus was thrown by the waves, and buried by Hercules. Ptol. 5, c. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strabo, 10 & 14.——II. A demus of Athens, probably in the vicinity of mount Icarius, which was situated to the north-west of Athens. Here, according to Athenæus, tragedies, or rather farces, were first performed in the time of vintage. Icaria belonged to the tribes of Ægeus. Cram.—Plin. 4, 7.—Steph. Byz.

Icēni, an ancient people of Britannia, who occupied that part of the island which, under the Saxon heptarchy, was included within East Anglia, answering in the present time to Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire. Ptolemy gives this people the name of Simeni, and Cæsar that of Cenimagni. The Greek translator of Cæsar uses the form Cenimani, from which Vossius thinks that the proper reading is Cenomani, and that the British nation was of the same family as the Gallic tribe of that name. Their chief city, or rather fortified place, was Venta Icenorum, now Caster, near Norwich in Norfolk. In the reign of Claudius the Iceni rebelled against the Romans, but were defeated in a decisive engagement by Ostorius Scapula. Afterwards Prasutagus, their king, in the vain hope of conciliating the favour of the Romans, made the emperor Nero his heir. The characteristic selfishness of the Roman provincial officers exhibited itself with more than usual atrocity in their treatment of Boadicea and her daughters. This heroic queen exacted ample atonement from her enemies, but was at last obliged to yield to the skill of Suetonis Paulinus. Camden.—Cæsar. Lem. ed.

Iconium, now Konieh, "the metropolis of Lycaonia when a Roman province; a place of great strength and consequence, situated advantageously in the mountains for defence and safety, and therefore chosen for the seat of the Turkish kings of Lesser Asia, at such time as they were most distressed by the western Christians; who, under the command and presence of the emperor Conrade, did in vain besiege it; forced to depart thence with great loss, both of men and honour. Afterwards made the seat royal of the Aladine kings, the former race being extinguished by the Tartars; and finally, of the kings of the house of Caraman, whose kingdom, called the kingdom of Caramania, contained all the south parts of the Lesser Asia, that is to say, part of the province of Caria, all Lycia, Pamphylia, Isauria, Cilicia, Pisidia, and this Lycaonia." Heyl. Cosm.

Ida, I. a celebrated mountain, or more properly a ridge of mountains in Troas, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Troy. The abundance of its waters became the source of many rivers, and particularly of the Simois, Scamander, Æsepus, Granicus, &c. It was on mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. It was covered with green wood, and the elevation of its top opened a fine extensive view of the Hellespont and the adjacent countries, from which reason the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. Strab. 13.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—*Homer. A mountain of Crete, the highest in the island, where it is reported that Jupiter was educated by the Corybantes, who on that account were called Idæi. Strab. 10.

Idalium, a town of the island Cyprus, "near a mount of the same name, so called by accident. For Chalcenor, the founder of it, being told by oracle that he should seat himself and build a city where he first saw the rising sun: one of his followers, seeing the sun begin to rise, cried out ἰὸν ἅλιον, that is to say, 'behold the sun,' which omen taken by Chalcenor, he here built this city. But whether this were so or not, (as for my part I build not much upon it,) certain it is that Venus had here another temple, neighboured by the Idalian groves, so memorized and chanted by the ancient poets. *Heyl. Idistavisus, a plain, now Hastenbach, where Germanicus defeated Arminius, near Oldendorp on the Weser in Westphalia. Tacit. A. 2, c. 16.

Idubeda, a mountain in Spain, which branches off from the Cantabrian range, holds a southeasterly course towards that part of the Mediterranean coast where stood the city of Saguntum, north of the mouth of the Turia. The Iberus, which rises near the junction of the Idubeda and the Cantabrian branch of the Pyrenees, waters the country intervening between the two ranges.

Idūmēa, or the Land of Edom, was a country of Palestine, bounded on the east and south by Arabia Petræa, on the north by Judæa, and on the west by the Mediterranean. It derived its name, according to some writers, from the Idumæi, a people of Arabia, but more probably from Edom, or Esau, who, having left Canaan to his brother Jacob, migrated to mount Seir, or the land of Seir, and thence expelled the Horites, its first inhabitants. "The country toward the sea-side very fat and fruitful; but where it bendeth towards Arabia, exceeding mountainous and barren. Heretofore it afforded balm, not now; but still it hath some store of palm-trees, for which it was much celebrated by some writers of ancient times; as Arbusto palmarum dives Idume, in the poet Lucan. Sandy, and full of vast deserts, for which, and for the want of water, it is thought unconquerable. The people anciently rude and barbarous, and in love with tumults. Professed enemies of the Jews, till conquered by them: and when compelled by Hyrcanus to the Jewish religion, they were at best but false friends; and in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, did them more mischief than the Romans. At this time subject to the Turk, and differ not much in life and custom from the wild Arabians." Heyl. Cosm.

Jericho, a city of Palestine, besieged and taken by the Romans under Vespasian and Titus. Jericho was in the tribe of Benjamin; it was levelled to the ground by Joshua, by the sound of horns, and a curse pronounced on him who should rebuild it. Notwithstanding the penalty to be inflicted on the builder, Hiel of

IGILIUM, now Giglio, an island of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Tuscany. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cæs. B. C. 1, c. 34.

IGUVIUM, a town of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, "to the south of Tifernum, and at the foot of the main chain of the Appenines. It is now Eugubbio, or more commonly Gubio, and was a municipal town; and, as it would seem, from the importance attached to its possession by Cæsar when he invaded Italy, of some consequence. (Civ. Bell. 1, 12.) Some critics have supposed that the mons Gyngynus of Strabo was to be referred to Iguvium. But this city has acquired greater celebrity in modern times from the discovery of some interesting monuments in its vicinity in the year 1440. These consist of several bronze tables covered with inscriptions, some of which are in Umbrian, others in Latin, characters. They have been the subject of many a learned dissertation and comment nearly from the time of their first appearance; but it was not till Lanzi had made his able and successful researches into the ancient dialects of Italy, that any clear notion could be formed of their contents. Bourguet, and after him, Gori and Bardetti, considered them as prayers offered up by the Pelasgi during those distresses into which they are said to have fallen on the decline of their power in Italy. Buonarotti, in his supplement to Dempster, thought they were articles of treaty agreed upon by some of the confederate states of Umbria; while Maffei and Passeri conceived them to be statutes, or private acts of donations. But Lanzi has satisfactorily proved, I think, that they relate entirely to the sacrificial and augural rites of certain Umbrian communities. Their names are mentioned in the Tables, which thus serve to illustrate the ancient topography of a district otherwise very little known. They are Clavernia, Curiatis, Pieratis, Talenatis, Museialis, Juviscana, Casilatis, Perasnania. The first of these answers to Chiaserna, a village near Gubio. The second refers to the Curiati of Pliny. Museiatis to Museia, Casilatis to Casilo, both hamlets in the vicinity of Gubio. Juviscana relates probably to that town. The Tarsinates Tuscom and Tarsinates Trifor are two other tribes, which have not been hitherto satisfactorily accounted for. There is little doubt that these different tribes formed a confederacy; a fact which is confirmed by Cicero, who talks of the Iguvinates as having made a league, and mentions them as being allied to the Romans. It appears also that they resorted to the temple of Jupiter Apenninus, to sacrifice, as the Etruscans did to the temple of Voltumna and the Latins to the Alban mount. The priests are called Frates Aterii, and the ceremonies described indicate a powerful and wealthy nation; since in one of the Tables a sacrifice is specified which amounts to a hecatomb. The temple here alluded to is marked in the Table of Peutinger under the name of Jupiter Penninus. We know that it possessed an oracle, from the fact of its having being consulted by the emperor Claudius. It is also noticed by Claudian. D'Anville tells us that some vestiges of this ancient edifice are still to be seen on Monte Sant' Ubaldo. The Eugubian Tables are particularly important to the philologist, as they are calculated to throw great light on the formation of the Latin language, and may enable us to connect it with perhaps the oldest of the ancient dialects of Italy. According to Lanzi, the language in which these Tables are written is full of archaisms and Æolic forms, and bears great affinity to the Etruscan dialect." Cram.

ILBA. Vid. Æthalia.

ILERCAONES, and ILERCAONENSES, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea at the mouth of the Iberus, between the Edetani and Tarraco. Ptolemy calls them Ilercaones, Livy Ilercaonenses, and Cæsar Illurgavonenses or Illergavonenses, which some manuscripts, dropping the first syllable, have converted into Lurgavonenses. Ptolemy assigns to them the city of Dertosa; and an inscription on a coin of Tiberius seems to confirm Ptolemy's account, although it is true that different interpretations have been given to this inscription, which is as follows; M. H. I. ILLERGAVONIA DERTOSA, that is, Municipium, Hibera, Julia, Illergavonia, Dertosa. Vaillant reads Illergavonia Dertosanorum, and supposes that, besides Dertosa, there was a city named Illergavonia, which belonged to the people of Dertosa. This supposition, however, is not justified by fact. Dertosa is nowhere mentioned as possessing an adjacent territory, and Ptolemy expressly declares that it belonged to the Ilercaones. Consequently it seems more consistent to make Illergavonia a gentilitious adjective, and to consider Illergavonia Dertosa as equivalent to Dertosa Illergavonensium. It has been objected to this, that Dortosa is known to have been a colony; but M. may represent Magna; or we may suppose that Dertosa was at first a Municipium, and that when it received a colony it was indifferently styled Colonia and Municipium. The H. in the inscription refers to its situation on the Iberus, and the I. to its having received a colony from Julius Cæsar. Cæs. B. C. 1, 60, Lem. ed.—Liv. 22, 21.

ILISSUS. "The Ilissus, from which Athens was principally supplied with water, is a small brook rising to the north-east of the town, and losing itself, after a course of a few miles, in the marshes to the south of the city. Every one is acquainted with the beautiful passage in which Plato alludes to it in the Phædrus, from which it appears then to have been a perennial stream; whereas now it is almost always dry, its waters being either drawn off to irrigate the neighbouring gardens, or to supply the artificial fountains of Athens." Cram.

Illyricum, Illyris, and Illyria. "The name of Illyrians appears to have been common to the numerous tribes which were anciently in possession of the countries situated to the west of Macedonia, and which extended along the coast of the Adriatic from the confines of Istria and Italy to the borders of Epirus. Still further north, and more inland, we find them occupying the great valleys of the Save and Drave, which were only terminated by the junction of those streams with the Danube. This large tract of country, under the Roman emperors, constituted the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. Antiquity has thrown but little light on the origin of the Illyrians; nor are we acquainted with the language and customs of the barbarous hordes of which the great body of the nation was composed. It appears evident that they were a totally different race from the Celts, as Strabo carefully distinguishes them from the Gallic tribes which were incorporated with them. It may not be amiss to observe in this place, that the Illyrians are not unlikely to have contributed to the early population of Italy. The Liburni, who are undoubtedly a part of this nation, had formed settlements on the Italian shore of the Adriatic at a very remote period. It may be here also remarked, that the Veneti, according to the most probable account, were Illyrians. But, though so widely dispersed, this great nation is but little noticed in history until the Romans made war upon it, in consequence of some acts of piracy committed on their traders. Previous to that time we hear occasionally of the Illyrians as connected with the affairs of Macedonia; for instance, in the expedition undertaken by Perdiccas in conjunction with Brasidas against the Lyncestæ, which failed principally from the support afforded to the latter by a powerful body of Illyrian troops. They were frequently engaged in hostilities with the princes of Macedon, to whom their warlike spirit rendered them formidable neighbours. This was more especially the case whilst under the government of Bardylis, who is known to have been a powerful and renowned chief, though we are not precisely acquainted with the extent of his dominions, nor over what tribes he presided. Philip at length gained a decisive victory over this king, who lost his life in the action, and thus a decided check was given to the rising power of the Illyrians. Alexander was likewise successful in a war waged against Clytus the son of Bardylis, and Glaucias king of the Taulantii. The Illyrians, however, still asserted their independence against the kings of Macedon, and were not subdued till they were involved in the common fate of nations by the victorious arms of the Romans. The conquest of Illyria led the way to the first interference of Rome in the affairs of Greece; and Polybius, from that circumstance, has entered at some length into the account of the events which then took place. He informs us, that about this period, 520 U. C. the Illyrians on the coast had become formidable, from their maritime power and the extent of their expeditions and depredations. They were governed by Agron, son of Pleuratus, whose forces had obtained several victories over the Ætolians Epirots, and Achæans. On his death the empire devolved upon his queen Teuta, a woman of an active and daring mind, who openly sanctioned, and even encouraged, the acts of violence committed by her subjects. Among those who suffered from these lawless pirates were some traders of Italy, on whose account satisfaction was demanded by the Roman senate. So far, however, from making any concession, Teuta proceeded to a still greater outrage, by causing one of the Roman deputies to be put to death. The senate was not slow in avenging these injuries; a powerful armament was fitted out under the command of two consuls, who speedily reduced the principal fortresses held by Teuta, and compelled that haughty queen to sue for peace. At a still later period, the Illyrians, under their king Gentius, were again engaged in a war with the Romans, if the act of taking possession of an unresisting country may be so termed. Gentius had been accused of favouring the cause of Perseus of Macedon, and of being secretly in league with him; his territory was therefore invaded by the prætor Anicius, and in thirty days it was subjugated by the Roman army. Illyria then became a Roman province, and was divided into three portions. So widely were the frontiers of Illyricum extended under the Roman emperors, that they were made to comprise the great districts of Noricum, Pannonia, and Mœsia." Cram.

Imaus, a large mountain of Scythia, which is a part of mount Taurus. It divides Scythia, which is generally called Intra Imaum and Extra Imaum. It extends, according to some, as far as the boundaries of the eastern ocean. The Imaus is now called Altaï in that part which divided Scythia into two parts. In a part of its course it answered to the Himalah mountains. This range is described by a celebrated geographer as follows: "That part which forms the northern boundary of India, is a continuation of the same range with that to the west of the Indus, known among the Afghâns under the name of Hindoo Coosh. To the east of that river, it increases in height, and assumes a character of additional grandeur, both from that circumstance and from its great extent in every direction. It forms, in fact, one of the sublimest features in the structure of the old continent and of the globe. Here a long range of summits, covered with perpetual snow, presents itself to the Hindoo, who has in all ages raised towards it an eye of religious veneration. All the names by which it is distinguished are derived from the Sanscrit term Hem, signifying snow. Hence have arisen the names Imaus and Emodus among the ancients, and the Himalah, Himadri, Himachal, and Himalaya, of the moderns. This old Indian root also brings to mind the Hemus of Thrace, the Hymettus of Attica, the Mons Imæus of Italy, and the different mountains called Himmel in Saxony, Jutland, and other countries. The river Indus passed through a series of narrow defiles in lat. 55°, which scarcely offer any interruption to the mountain chain. The direction of the mountain is eastward, as far as the north-east point of the valley of Cashmere; from this point, its direction is to the south-east, extending along the sources of all the rivers which run across the Punjab to fall into the Indus, with the exception of the Sutledge, which, like the Indus itself, rises on the north side of the range, and takes its passage across its breadth. Pursuing the same direction, the Himalah mountains cross the heads of the Jumna, the Ganges, and their numerous tributary rivers. Farther east they seem to be penetrated by several rivers as the Gunduk, the Arum, the Teesta, the Cosi, and the Brahmapootra. It is only of late that the height of the Himalah mountains on the north of India has been appreciated. In 1802 Col. Crawford made some measurements, which gave a much greater altitude to these mountains than had been ever before suspected; and Col. Colebrooke, from the plains of Rohilcund, made a series of observations, which gave a height of 22,000 feet. Lieut. Webb, in his journey to the source of the Ganges, executed measurements on the peak of Jamunavatari, which gave upwards of 25,000 feet. The same officer, in a subsequent journey, confirms his former observations. The line of perpetual snow does not begin till at least 17,000 feet above the level of the sea. The banks of the Sutledge, at an elevation of 15,000 feet, afforded pasturage for cattle, and yielded excellent crops of Oos or mountain wheat. This mild temperature, at so great an elevation, is confined to the northern side of the Himalah. At Kedar-nath and other points on the southern side, perpetual snow commences not much higher than 12,000 feet. The following are the heights of some of the peaks which have been ascertained; Dhawalagivri, or the White Mountain, near the sources of the Gunduk river, above the level of the sea, 26,862; Jamootri, 25,500; Dhaiboon, seen from Catmandoo, 24,768. Through this stupendous chain there are different passes, but all of them laborious to travel, and some highly dangerous. One of the most practicable is that which, in its upper part, follows the bed of the river Sutledge." Malte-Brun.—Plin. 6, c. 17.—Strab. 1.

Inachia, a name given to Peloponnesus, from the river Inachus.

Inachus, I. "The river Inachus flowed at the foot of the acropolis of Argos, and emptied itself into the bay of Nauplia. Its real source was in mount Lyrceius, on the confines of Arcadia; but the poets, who delighted in fiction, imagined it to be a branch of the Inachus of Amphilochia, which, after mingling with the Achelous, passed under ground, and re-appeared in Argolis. Pausanias states that the Inachus derived its source from mount Artemisium. Dodwell says, 'that the bed of this river is a short way to the north-east of Argos. It is usually dry, but supplied with casual floods after hard rains, and the melting of snow on the surrounding mountains.' It rises about ten miles from Argos, at a place called Mushi, in the way to Tripoli in Arcadia. In the winter it sometimes descends from the mountains in a rolling mass, when it does considerable damage to the town. It is now called Xeria, which means dry." Cram.——II. Another river in the Amphilocian district of Acarnania. Cramer gives the following account of it: "There were phenomena connected with the description given by ancient geographers of its course, which have led to a doubt of its real existence. It is from Strabo more especially that we collect this information. Speaking of the sub-marine passage of the Alpheus, and its pretended junctions with the waters of Arethusa, he says a similar fable was related of the Inachus, which, flowing from mount Lacmon in the chain of Pindus, united its waters with the Achelous, and passing under the sea, finally reached Argos in Peloponnesus. Such was the account of Sophocles. Strabo, however, regards this as an invention of the poets, and says that Hecatæus was better informed on the subject when he affirmed that the Inachus of the Amphilochians was a different river from that of the Peloponnesian Argos. According to this ancient geographical writer the former stream flowed from mount Lacmus; whence also the Æas, or Aous, derived its source, and fell into the Achelous, having, like the Amphilochian Argos, received its appellation from Amphilochus. This account is sufficiently intelligible: and in order to identify the Inachus of Hecatæus with the modern river which corresponds with it, we have only to search in modern maps for a stream which rises close to the Aous or Voioussa, and, flowing south, joins the Achelous in the territory of the ancient Amphilochi. Now this description answers precisely to that of a river which is commonly looked upon as the Achelous itself, but which we are persuaded is in fact the Inachus, since it agrees so well with the account given by Hecatæus; and it should be observed, that Thucydides places the source of the Achelous in that part of Pindus which belonged to the Dolopes, a Thessalian people, who occupied, as we have seen, the south-eastern portion of the chain. Modern maps, indeed, point out a river coming from this direction, and uniting with the Inachus, which, though a more considerable stream, was not regarded as the main branch of the river. Strabo elsewhere repeats what he has said of the junction of the Inachus and Achelous. But in another passage he quotes a writer whose report of the Inachus differed materially, since he represented it as traversing the district of Amphilochia, and falling into the gulf. This was the statement made by Ephorus; and it has led some modern geographers and critics, in order to reconcile these two contradictory accounts, to suppose that there was a stream which, branching off from the Achelous, fell into the Ambracian gulf near Argos; which is more particularly the hypothesis of D'Anville; but modern travellers assures us that there is no such river near the ruins of Argos, and in fact it is impossible that any stream should there separate from the Achelous, on account of the Amphilochian mountains which divide the valley of that river from the gulf of Arta. Mannert considers the small river Krikeli to be the representative of the Inachus; but this is a mere torrent, which descends from the mountains above the gulf, and can have no connexion with mount Lacmus or the Achelous. All ancient authorities agree in deriving the Inachus from the chain of Pindus. Aristotle said that the Inachus and Achelous both flowed from that ridge of mountains. So persuaded am I, on the authority of Hecatæus, that the Inachus ought to be considered as a branch of the Achelous, that I would venture to alter the words Ἴναχον δὲ, τὸν διὰ τῆς χώρας βέοντα ποταμὸν εἰς τὸν κέλπαν, in the passage which Strabo cites from Ephorus, into Ἴναχον δὲ, τὸν διὰ τῆς χώρας βέοντα ποταμὸν εἰς τὸν Ἀχελῷον." Cram.

INARUS, a town of Egypt, in whose neighbourhood the town of Naucratis was built by the Milesians.

INDIA, the most celebrated and opulent of all the countries of Asia, bounded on one side by the Indus, from which it derives its name. Bacchus was the first who conquered it. In more recent ages, part of it was tributary to the power of Persia. Alexander invaded it; but his conquest was checked by the valour of Porus, one of the kings of the country, and the Macedonian warrior was unwilling, or afraid, to engage another. Semiramis also extended her empire far in India. The Romans knew little of the country, yet their power was so universally dreaded, that the Indians paid homage by their ambassadors to the emperors Antoninus, Trajan, &c. India is divided into several provinces. There is an India extra Gangem, an India intra Gangem, and an India propria; but these divisions are not particularly noticed by the ancients, who, even in the age of Augustus, gave the name of Indians to the Æthiopian nations. "In riches, population, and importance, India exceeds one of the great divisions of the world. Here a nation, a language, and a religion, distinguished for the most venerable antiquity, permanently maintain their ground amidst the fall of many successive empires. Under the classical appellation of India, the ancients, and most of the moderns, have comprised three great regions of southern Asia. The first is that which is watered by the Indus, the Ganges, and their tributaries, called at present Indostan, in the strictest acceptation of this term. On the south of the river Nerbuddah begins that large triangular region sometimes called by Europeans the peninsula on this side of the Ganges, and by the Indians the Deccan, or 'country of the south.' To this the island of Ceylon, and the Maldives, though separated by an arm of the sea, form natural appendages. The other peninsular projection, which comprehends the Birman empire, the kingdoms of Tonquin, Cochin-China, Cambodia, Laos, Siam, and Malacca, has at present no general name in universal use. Sometimes it is vaguely denominated 'the peninsula beyond the Ganges.' Several geographers have called it 'external India.' It is to these countries that the Sanscrit names of Djamboo-Dwyp, or the 'peninsula of the tree of life,' has been applied: also that of Medhiami or Media-bhumi, 'the middle dwelling,' and Bharatkand, or the 'kingdom of the Bharat dynasty.' The country is too extensive to have received one general name in the indigenous languages. But from the river which waters its western boundary having the name of Sind or Hind, which, like the name Nyl-Ab, is derived from its blue colour, the adjoining country received among the Persians the name of Hindoostan, and the inhabitants were called Hindoos. From the Persian language these names passed into the Syrian, Chaldee, and Hebrew: they were imitated in the appellations given by the Greeks and Romans; but in the writings of the Indians, the name Sindhoostan denotes exclusively the countries on the river Sind. The oriental writers subsequent to the Mahometan era have admitted a distinction between the name Sindh, taken in the acceptation now mentioned, and Hind, which they apply to the countries situated on the Ganges. This application of terms is equally foreign to the national geography of the Indians, with the appellation of Gentoos, which the English apply to the Hindoos, and which comes from the Portuguese term Gentios, signifying Gentiles or Pagans. The natural boundaries of India, on the north, are the Himalah mountains, (the Imaus and Comdus of the ancients,) which separate Bengal, Oude, Delhi Lahore, and Cashmere from Thibet. On the Indian side of the loftiest range, a stripe of mountainous but inhabited country intervenes between Thibet and the respective countries now mentioned, but these are considered as belonging to Indostan. On the east the river Brahmapootra seems to be the natural boundary. On the south, Indostan is bounded by the ocean. On the west, the river Indus is, in the opinion of some learned men, its proper limit, although the oriental geographers, finding that many Indians live in Baloochistan and Mekran, often include these countries in their Sinde or Sindistan. The former is that which we shall adopt, and which seems to be conformable to the nomenclature of the natives on both sides of the river. We are not yet in possession of exact data for determining the superficial extent of all India. The Indian, Arabian, and Persian authors, differ considerably in their calculations on this point; a circumstance which partly depends on the uncertainty of the lineal road measures, especially the coss or mile, which is subject to great variations in the different provinces. The European travellers are also discordant in their estimates. Tiefenthaler rates the whole superficial extent of India at 155,250 square geographical miles, although he supposes the peninsula to be of equal breadth through its whole extent. Pennant is guilty of the same error: but he thinks that India does not extend so far to the north as geographers have believed, and he rates the whole surface of that country at nearly 173,800 square French leagues. Major Rennel contents himself with saying that Indostan Proper is equal to France, Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, Switzerland, Italy, and the Netherlands: and he compares the size of the Deccan to that of the British isles, Spain, and European Turkey, united, which would amount to 120,000 square leagues; 66,780 for upper Indostan, and 53,076 for the Deccan. Mr. Hamilton makes it 1,280,000 British square miles. All the mountains of these regions, and the mass of elevated land included by them, are called in Hindoo mythology by the names, Meroo, Soomeroo, and Kailassam; names so renowned in the east, that their fame reached the Greek and Roman authors. These names designate the Indian Olympus, the native dwelling of gods and of men. These mountains and elevated plains, rich in the precious metals, furnished, in the time of Herodotus and of Ctesias, that quantity of native gold and of auriferous sand which gave rise to the fables concerning pismires which industriously amassed stores of this precious metal, and fountains from which it bubbled up. These golden mountains of the Indians bear an equivalent name among the Mongols and the Chinese." Malte-Brun.—Diod. 1.—Strab. 1, &c.—Mela, 3, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 28.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Justin. 1, c. 2, l. 12, c. 7.

INDUS. "The sources of this river have not yet been fully explored. But our information extends higher in its course than it did a few years ago. We have been enabled, at least, to correct the error of mistaking this river or some of its eastern tributaries, for the source of the Ganges, an error which we find adopted in the construction of maps till a very recent period. The commencement of this river is fixed, by the most probable conjecture, in the northern declivity of the Cailas branch of the Himalah mountains, about lat. 31° 30′ N. and long. 80° 30′ E. not far from the town of Gortop in the Undes, a territory now under the dominion of China, and within a few miles of the lake Rawanshead and the sources of the river Sutledge. It is supposed to flow for 400 miles in a north north-west direction, then assuming a south-west course, comes to Drass, a town of Little Thibet; here it is seventy yards broad, and excessively rapid, and it receives another large branch, called the Ladak river, which flows past the town of Ladak. It is only below Drass that its course is known with certainty, the difficult and desolate nature of the country having checked inquiries in its higher parts. From Drass, the Indus pursues its solitary course for above 200 miles, through a rude and mountainous country to Mullai, where it receives the Abasseen, penetrates the highest Hindoo Coosh range, passes for fifty miles through the lower parallel ranges, to Torbaila, where it enters the valley of Chuch, spreading and forming innumerable islands. About forty miles lower down, it receives the Caubul river from the west, and soon after rushes through a narrow opening into the midst of the Soliman range of mountains. Its stream is extremely turbulent, and sounds like a stormy sea. When its volume is increased by the melting of the snow, a tremendous whirlpool is created, and the noise is heard to a great distance. Here boats are frequently sunk or dashed to pieces. There are two black rocks in this part of the river, named Jellalia and Kemalia, which are pointed out by the inhabitants as the transformed bodies of the two sons of Peeree Taruk, (the Apostle of Darkness) founder of the Rooshenia sect, who were thrown into the river by Akhoond, the oppenent of their father. At the town of Attock, the river, after having been widely spread over a plain, becomes contracted to 260 yards, but is much more deep and rapid. When its floods are highest it rises to the top of a bastion about thirty-seven feet high. At Neelab, fifteen miles below Attock, it becomes still narrower. From this it winds among the hills to Calabag, passes through the salt range in a clear, deep, and placid stream, and then pursues a southerly course to the ocean, without any interruption, or confinement from hills. It expands into various channels, which separate and meet again. Below Attock it receives the Tve and other brooks from the west. At Kaggawala, the Koorum, a stream of considerable magnitude from the Soliman mountains, falls into it. The only one to the south of this point which it receives, is the Arul, which supplies very little water, being mostly drawn off for irrigation in the north of Damaun. At Kaheree, the Indus, when at its lowest, is 1000 yards in breadth, and rather shallow, being diminished by the separation of some branches from it. At Mittenda it receives the Punjnud, formed by the union of five large tributaries. This immense stream previously flows parallel to the Indus for seventy miles; at Ooch, which is fifty miles up, the distance across, from the Indus to the Punjnud, is not more more than ten miles. In July and August, this whole space is completely flooded. The most of the villages contained in it are temporary erections, a few only being situated on spots artificially elevated. The whole country which it traverses is of the same description, all the way to Hyderabad, the capital of Sinde. On the left bank are some considerable towns and villages, with canals for agricultural purposes. Though the Indus gives off lateral streams as it approaches the sea, it does not form a Delta exactly analogous to that of Egypt. Its waters enter the sea in one volume, the lateral streams being absorbed by the sand without reaching the ocean. It gives off an easterly branch called the Fullalee, but this returns its waters to the Indus at a lower point, forming in its circuit the island on which Hyderabad stands. From the sea to Hyderabad, the breadth of the Indus is generally about a mile, varying in depth from two to five fathoms. The tides are not perceptible in this river higher up than sixty or sixty-five miles from the sea. The land near the mouth does not possess the fertility of the Delta of the Nile or the Ganges. The dry parts exhibit only short underwood, and the remainder arid sands, putrid salt swamps, or shallow lakes. From the sea to Lahore, a distance of 760 geographical miles, the Indus and its tributary the Ravey are navigable for vessels of 200 tons. In the time of Aurengzebe, a considerable trade was carried on by means of this navigation, but from the political state of the country it has long ceased. From Attock to Moultan, this river is called by the natives the Attock, and further down it has the name of Soor, or Shoor; but among the Asiatics, it is generally known by the name of Sinde. Though one of the largest rivers in the world, the Indus has never obtained such a reputation for sanctity as many inferior streams in Indostan, a circumstance which may proceed from the barren and uninteresting character of the country through which it flows. The five eastern tributaries which by their union form the Punjnud, are celebrated for having been the scene of some events conspicuous in history. The most northerly is the Jylum, or Hydaspes, the Bahut of Abul Fazel, which takes its rise in the mountains on the south-east side of the valley of Cashmere, where it is called the Vedusta. The Chenab, or Acesines, the second tributary, and the largest of the five, arises in the Himalah mountains, near the south-east corner of Cashmere, in the Alpine district of Kishtewar. The Ravey, or Hydraotes is the third of the Punjab rivers. It issues from the mountainous district of Lahore, but its sources have not been explored. This and the fifth, or Sutledge, meet before either has proceeded more than a fifth part of the diameter of the Punjab country; and their united stream flows the rest of the distance to complete the conflux called the Punjnud. The Sutledge rises in the Undes to the north of the great Himalah range, within the territory claimed by the Chinese; proceeds almost due west; then gradually bends to the south in crossing the subordinate mountains. It is the Hesudrus of Pliny, the Zaradrus of Ptolemy, and the Serangese of Arrian. The union of all the five rivers into one before they reach the Indus, was a point in geography maintained by Ptolemy; but, owing to the obscurity of modern accounts, prompted by the splittings of the Indus, and the frequent approximation of streams running in parallel courses, we had been taught to correct this as a specimen of that author's deficiency of information, till very recent and more minute inquiries have re-established that questioned point, and along with it the merited credit of the ancient geographer." Malte-Brun.

INDUSTRIA, a town of Liguria, situated on the right bank of the Po, above Forum Fulvii, Valenza. Its "position was for a long time a matter of conjecture to geographers and antiquaries; Cluverius and many others fixing it at Casal, till the discovery of its ruins at Monteu di Po, near the fortress of Verrua, put an end to this uncertainty. We are informed by Pliny, that the Ligurian name of this city was Bodincomagus, Bodencus being the appellation of the Po in that language, and signifying 'something which is unfathomable.' Here, in fact, that river becomes sufficiently deep to be navigable." Cram.

INFERUM MARE. Vid. Tyrrhenum Mare.

INŌPUS, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants suppose to be the Nile, coming from Egypt under the sea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plut. 2, c. 103. —Flacc. 5, v. 105.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 4.

INSŪBRES. "Next in order to the Lævi and Libicii, are the Insubres, in Greek Ἰσομβροι, the most numerous as well as most powerful tribe of the Cisalpine Gauls, according to Polybius. It would appear indeed from Ptolemy, that their dominion extended at one time over the Libicii; but their territory, properly speaking, seems to have been defined by the rivers Ticinus and Addua. The Insubres took a very active part in the Gallic wars against the Romans, and zealously co-operated with Hannibal in his invasion of Italy. They are stated by Livy to have founded their capital Mediolanum, now Milano, on their first arrival in Italy, and to have given it that name from a place so called in the territory of the Ædui in Gaul." Cram.

INTEMELIUM Vid. Albium Intemelium, or Albintemelium.

INTERAMNA, I. a town of Umbria, on the Flaminian Way, in the valley of the Nar, "so called from its being situated between two branches of that river. Hence also the inhabitants of this city were known as the Interamnates Nartes, to distinguish them from those of Interamna on the Liris, a city of New Latium. If an ancient inscription cited by Cluverius be genuine, Interamna, now represented by the well-known town of Terni, was founded in the reign of Numa, or about eighty years after Rome. It is noted afterwards as one of the most distinguished cities of municipal rank in Italy. This circumstance, however, did not save it from the calamities of civil war, during the disastrous struggle between Sylla and Marius. The plains around Interamna, which were watered by the Nar, are represented as the most productive in Italy; and Pliny assures us, that the meadows were cut four times in the year. We also find this city mentioned by Strabo." Cram. Eustace, in his "Classical Tour," thus speaks of the present condition of Interamna: "This ancient town retains no traces of its former splendour, if it ever was splendid, though it may boast of some tolerable palaces, and, what is superior to all palaces, a charming situation. The ruins of the amphitheatre in the episcopal garden consist of one deep dark vault, and scarcely merit a visit. Over the gate is an inscription, informing the traveller that this colony gave birth to Tacitus the historian, and to the emperors Tacitus and Florian: few country towns can boast of three such natives."——II. ——PRÆTUTIANA, a city of Picenum, which Ptolemy assigns to the Prætutii, "which in consequence was usually called Prætutiana, to distinguish it from three other cities of the same name in other parts of Italy. From a passage in Frontinus it may be collected, that this city was first a municipium, and afterwards a Roman colony. Its modern name is Teramo, situated between the small rivers Viziola and Turdino. The remains of antiquity which have been discovered here, prove the importance of this ancient city." Cram.——III. A town of Latium on the Liris, "distinguished by the addition of ad Lirim from two other cities of the same name, one in Umbria and the other in Picenum. According to Livy, it was colonized A. U. C. 440, and defended itself successfully against the Samnites, who made an attack upon it soon after. Interamna is mentioned again by the same historian, when describing Hannibal's march from Capua towards Rome. We find its name subsequently among those of the refractory colonies of that war. Pliny informs us, that the Interamnates were surnamed Lirinates and Succasini. In the following passage of Silius Italicus,

. . . . . Arpinas, accila pube Venafro
Commovet.

I would propose reading, 'Ac Lirinatum dextris.' Cluverius imagined that Ponte Corvo occupied the site of Interamna; but its situation agrees more nearly with that of a place called Terame Castrum, in old records, and the name of which is evidently a corruption of Interamna. Antiquaries assert that considerable ruins are still visible on this spot." Cram.

Iolchos. "Iolcos was a city of great antiquity, and celebrated in the heroic age as the birth-place of Jason and his ancestors. It was situated at the foot of mount Pelion, according to Pindar, and near the small river Anaurus, in which Jason is said to have lost his sandal. Strabo affirms that civil dissensions and tyrannical government hastened the downfall of Iolcos, which was once a powerful city; but its ruin was finally completed by the foundation of Demetrias in its immediate vicinity. In his time the town no longer existed, but the neighbouring shore still retained the name of Iolcos." Cram.

IonES. Less is known with certainty of the Ionians than of any other Grecian nation. This is owing to their great antiquity, and to their having ceased to exist in Greece as a distinct people, before the period at which fable gave place to history. They were, as is generally believed, of the Hellenic family. The Hellenes, who, according to Malte-Brun, formed part of the Pelasgo-Hellenic branch of the Pelasgian race, were divided into four nations: 1. The Achæi or Achivi, in other words, the inhabitants of the banks of rivers. 2. The Iones or Iaones, archers, or shooters of darts. 3. Dores or Dorians, men armed with spears. 4. Æoli or Æolians, wanderers. The account generally given of the origin of these nations is as follows: Hellen, son of Deucalion, had three sons, Dorus, Æolus, and Xuthus; of whom Dorus and Æolus gave their names respectively to the Dorians and Æolians. Xuthus, having migrated to Attica, married the daughter of Erechtheus, by whom he had two sons, Achæus and Ion, who led colonies to the Peloponnesus. Achæus settled in Laconia, and gave his name to the Achæans, who were afterwards dispossessed by the Heraclidæ, and removed to Ægialea, from them called Achaia. Ion established himself on the shore of the Corinthian gulf, between Sicyonia and Elis, and from him the people were called Iones. Whether Ægialea was called Ionia or not, is uncertain. Upon the return of the Heraclidæ, the Achæans either expelled the Ionians from their possessions, or else the latter were incorporated with the former under the name of Achæans. Ion returned to Athens, and opposed Eumolpus and the Thracians. He gave his name to the Athenians, but did not succeed to the throne. In the reign of Melanthus, the Ionians returned to Attica, and were afterwards led by Neleus and Androclus, sons of Codrus, to Asia Minor, where they seized the central and most beautiful portion of the Asiatic coast. The above is the account of the Grecians themselves; we subjoin another, tracing the Iones to Javan. It is in the words of Archbishop Potter. "The primitive Athenians were named Iones and Iaones, and hence it came to pass that there was a very near affinity between the Attic and old Ionic dialect, as Eustathius observes. And though the Athenians thought fit to lay aside their ancient name, yet it was not altogether out of use in Theseus's reign, as appears from the pillar erected by him in the isthmus, to show the bounds of the Athenians on the one side, and the Peloponnesians on the other; on the east side of which was this inscription:

This is not Peloponnesus, but Ionia.

And on the south side this:

This is not Ionia, but Peloponnesus.

This name is thought to have been given them from Javan, which bears a near resemblance to Ἰάων· and much nearer, if (as grammarians tell us) the ancient Greeks pronounced the letter α broad, like the diphthong αυ, as in our English word all; and so Sir George Wheeler reports the modern Greeks do at this day. This Javan was the fourth son of Japheth, and is said to have come into Greece after the confusion of Babel, and seated himself in Attica. And this report receiveth no small confirmation from the divine writings, where the name of Javan is in several places put for Greece. Two instances we have in Daniel; 'And when I am gone forth, behold the Prince of Græcia shall come.' And again, 'He shall stir up all against the realms of Græcia.' Where, though the vulgar translations render it not Javan, yet that is the word in the original. And again in Isaiah, 'And I will send those that escape of them to the nations in the sea in Italy, and in Greece;' where the Tigurine version, with that of Geneva, retains the Hebrew words, and uses the names of Tubal and Javan, instead of Italy and Greece. But the Grecians themselves having no knowledge of their true ancestors, make this name to be of much later date, and derive it from Ion the son of Xuthus." The Ionic dialect is divided by Malte-Brun into, "1. Ancient Ionian, or the Hellenic, polished by commercial nations, (language of Homer, classical in epic poetry.) 2. Asiatic Ionian, still more polished; (language of Herodotus.) 3. European Ionian, more energetic than the others. The Attic dialect forms its principal branch, (the language of orators and tragedians.")

Ionia, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the west by the Ægean and Icarian seas, on the south by Caria, and on the east by Lydia and part of Caria. It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or subjects of Ion. Ionia was divided into 12 small states, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. These twelve states were, Priene, Miletus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Ephesus, Lebedos, Teos, Phocæa, Erythræ, Smyrna, and the capitals of Samos and Chios. The inhabitants of Ionia built a temple about the centre of their territory on the coast, in a sacred grove of mount Mycale, dedicated to Neptune, called Pan Ionium, from the concourse of people that flock there from every part of Ionia. After they had enjoyed for some time their freedom and independence, they were made tributary to the power of Lydia by Crœsus. The Athenians assisted them to shake off the slavery of the Asiatic monarchs; but they soon forgot their duty and relation to their mother country, and joined Xerxes when he invaded Greece.

They were delivered from the Persian yoke by Alexander, and restored to their original independence. They were reduced by the Romans under the dictator Sylla. Ionia has been always celebrated for the salubrity of the climate, the fruitfulness of the ground, and the genius of its inhabitants. Herodot. 1, c. 6 and 28.—Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 2, &c. Paus. 7, c. 1.——An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia, because it was for some time the residence of the Ionians.

Iōnium mare, a part of the Mediterranean Sea, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. The more northern portion, corresponding to the Adriatic, was denominated Ionium Sinus. That part of the Ægean Sea which lies on the coasts of Ionia in Asia, is called the Sea of Ionia, and not the Ionian Sea. Strab. 7, &c.—Dionys. Perieg.

Iōpe, and Joppa, now Jafa, a famous town of Palestine, about forty miles from the capital of Judæa, and remarkable for a sea-port much frequented, though very dangerous, on account of the great rocks that lie before it. Strab. 16, &c. —Propert. 2, el. 28, v. 51. "This," says D'Anville, "was the ordinary place of debarkation for Jerusalem," but it is now an absolute ruin. In sacred history Joppa is even more celebrated than in profane, and if the bones of the sea-monster which, but for the intervention of Perseus, would have destroyed Andromeda, were shown in ancient times to the travellers of Greece and Rome, the verses of whose poets had made that fable illustrious, we can find no less interest and satisfaction in contemplating the spot from which Jonas embarked for Tarshish, where the miracles of Simon Peter were performed, and where he was instructed in a vision to extend the benefit of the gospel to the Gentile world. Before this city the fleet of the Syrians was destroyed by Judas Maccabæus, while that hero presided over the affairs of Judæa; and two other conflicts, in the last of which it was destroyed by the Romans, have given to this place an inauspicious celebrity.

Jordānes, now called Jordan, a river of Palestine. It rose in Upper Galilee, on the borders of Cœlo-Syria, and emptied into the Dead Sea at its northern extremity. The mountain in which it had its springs was the celebrated Hermon, but the exact spot is considered still exceedingly doubtful. The rise of this river from the fountains Jor and Dan, near the city of Cæsarea Philippi on the south of the Paneas mons, admits of no question but these fountains were themselves pretended to come from the other side of this natural bulwark by a subterranean passage from mount Phiala. A curious description of this river, justified by collation with ancient authorities, and corroborated by recent investigation, is given by Heylin in the following words: "A river of more fame than length, breadth, or depth, running from north to south almost in a straight line to the Dead Sea, where it endeth its course, not navigably deep, nor above ten yards in breadth where broadest. Passing along it maketh two lakes, the one in Upper Galilee, by the ancients called Samachonitis, dry for the most part in summer, and then covered with shrubs and sedge, not mentioned in Scripture; the other in the Lower Galilee, about a hundred furlongs in length, and forty in breadth, called the sea of Galilee from the country, the Lake of Tiberias from a city of that name on the bank thereof, and for the like cause called also the Lake of Genezareth. Through this lake the river passes with so swift a course that it preserves its waters distinct both in colour and in taste." After leaving the lake Tiberias, the Jordan flows along the western side of the Campus Magnus, having on the opposite side as it approaches the lake Asphaltites the plains of Jericho. It is now, according to D'Anville, the Nahr-el-Arden, and is the only stream in those regions deserving the appellation of a river.

Ios, now Nio, an island in the Myrtoan Sea, at the south of Naxos, celebrated, as some say, for the tomb of Homer and the birth of his mother. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Ipsus, a place of Phrygia, celebrated for a battle which was fought there about 301 years before the Christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated. Plut. in Demetr.

Ira, a city of Messenia, which Agamemnon promised to Achilles if he would resume his arms to fight against the Trojans. This place is famous in history as having supported a siege of eleven years against the Lacedæmonians. Its capture, B. C. 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Homer. Il. 9, v, 150 and 292. —Strab. 7. Vid. Abia.

Iresus, a delightful spot in Libya, near Cyrene, near which Battus fixed his residence. The Egyptians were once defeated there by the inhabitants of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 158, &c.

Iris, a river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the borders of Armenia Minor. From the centre of the province to which it belongs, after having flowed north-west till it receives the branch called the Scylax, it runs almost directly north, and empties into the Amisenus Sinus on the side opposite the mouths of the Halys. Not far from the coast it is joined by the Lycus, whose waters it conveys to the Euxinus Pontus. D'Anville gives the Jekil-Ermark for its modern name.

Is, and Æiopolis, now Hit. This was a town on the borders of Mesopotamia, on a river of the same name, falling into the Euphrates to the north of Babylon, and at the western extremity of the Murus Semiramidis. We find it related by Herodotus, that the walls of Babylon were cemented with bitumen furnished from this town, and the concurrent accounts of the quantity of that material furnished by this river would seem to justify the relation.

Isar, and Isara, I. the Isore, a river of Gaul, where Fabius routed the Allobroges. It rises at the east of Savoy, and falls into the Rhone near Valence. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 399.——II. Another, called the Oyse, which falls into the Seine below Paris.

Isaura, (æ, or orum,) the chief town of Isauria, destroyed in the war undertaken by the Romans against the robbers and pirates of Isauria and of Cilicia Aspera. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Isauria, a country of Asia Minor, near mount

Taurus, whose inhabitants were bold and warlike. The Romans made war against them and conquered them. Flor. 3, c. 6.—Strab.—Cic. 15. Fam. 2. It is not easy to distinguish precisely between the territories of Pisidia and Isauria, but it may be said, that so far as a distinction can be made, Isauria lay upon the north and bordered upon Phrygia. As it lay exactly among the hills of the Taurus chain of mountains, it could not be watered by any streams of consequence; and, indeed, all its waters must have been mere fountains and springs. The same elevated range divided it from Pamphylia on the south. Another branch of this great Asiatic mountain ridge separated Isauria from Cilicia, though, as has been observed in the article Cilicia, the rugged district of that country adjoining Isauria assumed its name in the geography of the eastern empire.

Ismărus, (Ismăra, plur.) a rugged mountain of Thrace, covered with vines and olives, near the Hebrus, with a town of the same name. Its wines are excellent. The word Ismarius is indiscriminately used for Thracian. Homer. Od. 9.—Virg. G. 2, v. 37. Æn. 10, v. 351.

Ismēnias, a river of Bœotia, falling into the Euripus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Ismenius. A youth was yearly chosen by the Bœotians to be the priest of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Paus. 9, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab. 9.

Issedones, a people of Asia, extending over the region called Serica. Their history is connected with that of China, and consequently very slightly with that of classic times and classic countries. As they dwelt beyond the Imaus, and were known therefore even by name but imperfectly, we can say but little of them, except that one of their principal towns, named Issedon, was surnamed Serica, and the other Scythia; the former being now called Lop, and the latter Hara Shar, in English the Black Town.

Issus, now Aisse, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Persians under Darius their king, in October, B. C. 333, in consequence of which it was called Nicopolis. In this battle the Persians lost, in the field of battle, 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse; and the Macedonians only 300 foot and 150 horse, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Persian army, according to Justin, consisted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horse; and 61,000 of the former and 10,000 of the latter were left dead on the spot, and 40,000 were taken prisoners. The loss of the Macedonians, as he farther adds, was no more than 130 foot and 150 horse. According to Curtius, the Persians slain amounted to 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse; and those of Alexander to 32 foot and 150 horse killed, and 504 wounded. This spot is likewise famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A. D. 194. Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 9. Curt. 3, c. 7.—Arrian.—Diod. 17.—Cic. 5, Att. 20. Fam. 2, ep. 10.

Isthmus, a small neck of land which joins one country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. Nero attempted to cut it across, and make a communication between the two seas, but in vain. It is now called Hexamili. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 101.

Italia. "Without entering minutely into the examination of the several appellations which Italy appears to have borne in distant ages, it may be stated generally, that the name of Hesperia was first given to it by the Greeks on account of its relative position to their country, and that with those of Ausonia and Saturnia it is more commonly met with in the poets. The name of Œnotria, derived from the ancient race of the Œnotri, seems also to have been early in use among the Greeks, but it was applied by them to that southern portion of Italy only with which they were then acquainted. That of Italia is thought to have been deduced from Italus, a chief of the Œnotri, or Siculi. Others again sought the origin of the name in the Greek word ἰταλὸς, or the Latin vitulus, which corresponds with it. But whatever circumstance may have given rise to it, we are told that this also was only at first a partial denomination, applied originally to that southern extremity of the boot which is confined between the gulfs of St. Eufhemia and Squillace, anciently Lameticus, and Scylleticus Sinus. It is well known, however, that in process of time it superseded every other appellation, and finally extended itself over the whole peninsula. This is generally allowed to have taken place in the reign of Augustus, and we may therefore fix upon that period as the most convenient for defining the ancient boundaries of Italy. At that time it appears that the Maritime Alps, or that part of the chain which dips into the Gulf of Genoa, the ancient Mare Ligusticum, formed its extreme boundary to the north-west. The same great chain sweeping round to the head of the Adriatic, was considered as constituting, as it does now, its northern termination. The city of Tergeste, now Trieste, had been reckoned the farthest point to the north-east, till the province of Histria was included by Augustus within the limits of Italy, which were then removed in that direction to the little river Arsa, l'Arsa. The sea that bounded the western coast of Italy bore the several names of Mare Inferum, Tyrrhenum, and Etruscum; while those of Mare Superum, Hadriaticum or Hadriacum, were attached to the eastern or Adriatic sea. Ancient geographers appear to have entertained different ideas of the figure of Italy. Polybius considered it in its general form as being like a triangle, of which the two seas meeting at the promontory of Cocynthus, Capo di Stilo, as the vertex, formed the sides, and the Alps the base. But Strabo is more exact in his delineation, and observes, that its shape bears more resemblance to a quadrilateral than a triangular figure, with its outline rather irregular than rectilineal. Pliny describes it in shape as similar to an elongated oak leaf, and terminating in a crescent, the horns of which would be the promontories of Leucopetra, Capo dell' Armi, and Lacinium, Capo delle Colonne. According to Pliny, the length of Italy from Augusta Prætoria, Aosta, at the foot of the Alps, to Rhegium, the other extremity, was 1020 miles; but this distance was to be estimated not in a direct line, but by the great road which passed through Rome and Capua. The real geographical distance, according to the best maps, would scarcely furnish 600 modern Italian miles, of sixty to the degree; which are equal to about 700 ancient Roman miles. The same writer estimates its breadth from the Varus to the Arsia at 410 miles; between the mouths of the Tiber and Aternus at 136 miles; in the narrowest part, between the Sinus Scylacius, Golfo di Squillace, and Sinus Terinæus, Golfo di S. Eufemia, at 20 miles. The little lake of Cutiliæ, near Reate, Rieti, in the Sabine country, was considered as the umbilicus or centre of Italy. No writer is so eloquent and enthusiastic in the praises of Italy as Dionysius of Halicarnassus: and we regret being obliged to give only a summary of the passage, instead of presenting it to the reader in the historian's own warm and animated language. 'Comparing Italy with other countries, he finds none which unite so many important advantages. The fertile fields of Campania bear three crops in the year. The wines of Tuscany, Alba, and Falernus are excellent, and require little trouble to grow them. The olives of the Sabines, of Daunia, and Messapia, are inferior to none. Rich pastures feed innumerable herds and flocks, of oxen and horses, of sheep and goats. Its mountains are clothed with the finest timber, and contain quarries of the choicest marbles and other kinds of stone, together with metallic veins of every sort. Navigable rivers afford a constant communication between all its parts. Its forests swarm with game of every description. Warm springs abound throughout; and besides all these advantages, the climate is the most mild and temperate, in every season of the year, that can be imagined.' The origin of the first inhabitants of Italy, is a question on which it is proper to state that we know but little. The information we derive on this point from the writers of antiquity is so scanty, and withal so confused, that it can scarcely be expected we should, in the present day, arrive at any clear notions on the subject; even though it is allowed that in some respects we are better qualified than the ancients for investigating the matter, from being acquainted with the manner in which the earth was first divided and peopled; a knowledge which we derive from the earliest as well as most authentic records in existence. Ryckius, in an elaborate dissertation, has been diligent in collecting all that antiquity has transmitted to us on the subject; but there is too little discrimination of what is fabulous from what is historical in his work, to allow of its being considered in any other light than as useful for reference only. Freret, a learned French academician, who seems to have directed his researches more particularly to remote and obscure points of history and chronology, has been at much pains to elucidate the question now before us; the result of his investigation, or rather say his system, is given in the Mémoires de l'Académie. He conceives that Italy was altogether peopled by land, and therefore rejects all the early colonies which, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, came by sea. He distinguishes three migrations of three separate nations; the Illyrians, Iberians, and Celts. There are some ingenious ideas in his scheme, but it is generally too bold and conjectural, and wants the support of history in so many points, that his opinions cannot be allowed to have much weight in deciding the question. Pelloutier, Bardetti, and Durandi, have endeavoured to deduce the origin of all the earliest nations of Italy from a Celtic stock. Other writers again, such as Maffei, Mazzochi, and Guarnacci, have imagined that the first settlements were immediately formed from the east. Where historical records fail, the analysis of language is the only clue, it must be allowed, which can enable us to trace the origin of ancient nations with any probability of success; but when the results are so much at variance with each other, as in the case of the writers above mentioned, much doubt must of necessity attach to the process by which those results have been obtained. The knowledge of the ancient languages of Italy, of which the Latin must be considered as a dialect only, though it became the prevailing one, is comparatively of recent date. The Etruscan alphabet, the characters of which are the same as that of the Umbrian and Oscan dialects, had not been identified and made out with certainty till within the last fifty years; for the inscribed monuments of these people being rare and scanty, it has been a work of time as well as of great industry and sagacity, to draw any well-established conclusion from them. These two last qualities are eminently displayed in the learned work of Lanzi on the Etruscan and other ancient dialects of Italy; and it is but a small part of the praise due to him to say, that in his essay he has done more towards making us acquainted with this curious branch of ancient philology, than all the writers who had preceded him taken collectively. Though Lanzi himself declines entering into the discussion immediately under our consideration, it may be inferred from his researches, that as the Greek language in its most ancient form appears to enter largely not only into the composition of the Latin language, this being a fact which has always been acknowledged, but also into that of the other Italian dialects, the first settlers of Italy and those of Greece were the same race; that as the latter country became more populous, its numerous tribes extended themselves along the shores of Epirus and Illyrium, till they reached the head of the Adriatic, and poured into Italy. We must however admit, that other nations of a different race soon penetrated into Italy from other quarters, and, by intermixing with its first inhabitants, communicated to the ancient language of that country that heterogeneous character by which it is essentially distinguished from the vernacular tongue of Greece. It is chiefly on these two principles, supported however by the testimony of antiquity, that we venture to ground the following system respecting the origin of the early population of Italy. The Umbri appear to have the best claim to the title of its aboriginal inhabitants. They probably came from the eastern parts of Europe, and having reached Italy, gradually extended themselves along the ridge of the Appenines to its southern extremity. Considering the Umbri as the aborigines of Italy, we are inclined to derive from them the Opici, or Osci, and Œnotri, who are known to have existed with them in that country before the siege of Troy. Nearly contemporary with the Umbri were the Sicani, Siculi, and Ligures, who all came from the west, and along the coast of the Mediterranean in the order in which they are here placed. The interval of time which intervened between these three colonies is unknown, but there is this distinction to be made between them:—the Sicani were supposed to be Iberians; the Siculi were probably Celto-Ligurians; the Ligures, properly so called, were certainly Celts. The Sicani having been gradually propelled towards the south of Italy by the nations which followed, are known to have passed at a very remote period into Sicily, which from them obtained the name of Sicania. That a small part of their race remained in Italy is however probable; and it is not impossible that the ancient Aurunci and Ausones, who are otherwise unaccounted for, may have been a remnant of this very early migration. The Siculi are known to have occupied Tuscany and part of Latium for a long time, but being also driven south first by the Umbri aided by the Tyrrheni Pelasgi, and successively by the Opici and Œnotri, they also crossed over into Sicily, to which they communicated their name. This event is said to have happened about eighty years before the siege of Troy. The Ligures occupied the shores of the Gulf of Genoa as far as the Arno, and peopled a great part of Piedmont, where they remained undisturbed till they were subjugated by the Romans. After the departure of the Siculi, considerable changes appear to have taken place. The Tyrrheni Pelasgi, who came probably from the north of Greece, and assisted the Umbri in their wars with the Siculi, occupied the country from which this latter people had been expelled, in conjunction with the Umbri, and together with them formed the nation of the Etrusci or Tusci. About the same period the Opici, or Osci, who seem to have occupied the central region of Italy, extended themselves largely both west and east. In the first direction they formed the several communities distinguished by the name of Latins, Rutuli, Volsci, Campani, and Sidicini. In the central districts they constituted the Sabine nation, from whom were descended the Picentes, as well as the Æqui, Marsi, Hernici, Peligni, Vestini, and Marrucini. From the Opici again, in conjunction with the Liburni, an Illyrian nation who had very early formed settlements on the eastern coast of Italy, we must derive the Apuli and Daunii, Peucetii and Pœdiculi, Calabri, Iapyges, and Messapii. The Greeks, who formed numerous settlements in the south of Italy after the siege of Troy, found these several people and the Œnotri, still further south, in possession of the country. But the Œnotrian name disappeared, together with its subdivisions into the Leutarnii, Chones, and Itali; when the Samnite nation, which derived its origin from the Sabines, had propagated the Oscan stock to the extremity of the peninsula, under the various denominations of Hirpini, Pentri, Caraceni, Frentani, and subsequently of the Leucani and Brutii. In the north of Italy the following settlements are considered as posterior to the siege of Troy. 1st, That of the Veneti, an Illyrian nation who fixed themselves between the river Adige and the Adriatic. 2d, That of the Gauls, a Celtic race, who crossed the Alps; and, having expelled the Tuscans from the plains of Lombardy, gave to the country which they occupied the name of Cisalpine Gaul. These, with several Alpine tribes of uncertain origin, are all the inhabitants of ancient Italy to whom distinct denominations are assigned in history. We are informed by Pliny, that after Augustus had extended the frontiers of Italy to the Maritime Alps and the river Arsia, he divided that country into eleven regions: viz. 1. Campania, including also Latium. 2. Apulia, to which was annexed part of Samnium. 3. Lucania and Brutium. 4. Samnium, together with the country of the Sabines, Marsi, Æqui, &c. 5. Picenum. 6. Umbria. 7. Etruria. 8. Flaminia, extending from the Appenines to the Po. 9. Liguria. 10. Venetia containing Histria and the country of the Carni. 11. Transpadana, comprehending what remained between Venetia and the Alps. This division, though not to be overlooked, is too seldom noticed to be of much utility. The following distribution has been adopted, we believe, by most geographical writers, and will be found much more convenient for the purposes of history. 1. Liguria. 2. Gallia Cisalpina. 3. Venetia, including the Carni and Histria. 4. Etruria. 5. Umbria and Picenum. 6. the Sabini, Æqui, Marsi, Peligni, Vestini, Marrucini. 7. Roma. 8. Latium. 9. Campania. 10. Samnium and the Frentani. 11. Apulia, including Daunia and Messapia, or Iapygia. 12. Lucania. 13. Brutii." Cram. Il.

ITALICA, a town of Bætica, belonging to the Turdetani, on the Bætis, between Hispalis and Ilerda, the birth-place of Trajan and Hadrian, now Sevilla la Vrieja, in Andalusia. Italica was founded by Scipio, about A. U. C. 654, and Augustus afterwards conferred on it the honours and privileges of a municipium.

ITHACA, a celebrated island in the Ionian Sea, on the western parts of Greece, with a city of the same name, famous for being part of the kingdom of Ulysses. It is very rocky and mountainous, measures about 25 miles in circumference, and is known by the name of Isola del Compare, or Theachi. Homer. Il. 2, v. 139. —Od. 1, v. 186, l. 4, v. 601, l. 9, v. 20.—Strab. 1 and 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7. "Ithaca, now Theaki, lies directly south of Leucadia, from which it is distant about six miles. The extent of this celebrated island, as given by ancient authorities, does not correspond with modern computation. Dicæarchus describes it as narrow, and measuring 80 stadia, meaning, probably in length, but Strabo affirms, in circumference; which is very wide of the truth, since it is not less than 30 miles in circuit, and, according to Pliny, only twenty-five. Its length is nearly 17 miles, but its breadth not more than 4. The highest and most remarkable mountain in the island is that so often alluded to under the name of Neritus. According to Mr. Dodwell the modern name is Anoi, which means lofty; he observes also, that the forests spoken of by Homer have disappeared; it is at present bare and barren, producing nothing but stunted evergreens and aromatic plants. It is evident from several passages in the Odyssey, that there was a city named Ithaca, probably the capital of the island, and the residence of Ulysses, which was apparently placed on a rugged height. Its ruins are generally identified with those crowning the summit of the hill of Aito; 'Part of the walls which surrounded the acropolis are said to remain; and two long walls on the north and south sides are carried down the hill towards the bay of Aitos. In this intermediate space was the city. These walls are in the second style of early military architecture, composed of well-joined irregular polygons, like the walls of the Cyclopian cities of Argos and Mycenæ. The whole was built upon terraces, owing to the rapid declivity of the hill.' The port called by Homer Phorcys, and which he describes so accurately, is now known by the name of Port Molo. The present population of the island amounts to about 8000 souls. It produces only corn sufficient to maintain the inhabitants half the year." Cram.

Ithŏme, a town of Messenia, which surrendered, after ten years' siege, to Lacedæmon, 724 years before the Christian era. Jupiter was called Ithomates, from a temple which he had there, where games were also celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oaken crown. Paus. 4, c. 32.—*Stat. Ituræa, a province of Syria on the confines of Arabia. It lay between the Trachonitis and Auranitis, which constituted the border region between these countries, and had on the east the mountain of Hermon, which separated it, in part from Batanea and Palestine.

Judæa, a part of Palestine, extending from the borders of the stony Arabia along the Dead Sea upon the east, and the country of the Philistines, which lay on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the west. On the north it had Samaria, and it contained within these limits the early tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and Simeon. After the return from Babylon the name of Judæa was first given to this country, extending for the most part over the former kingdoms of Judah and Israel. The ruins of its former distinguished cities still appear; the cities themselves have for the greater part perished. Joppa, Gaza, and Jerusalem, however, remain, and the natural richness of the soil yet marks the Promised Land. Judæa constituted the kingdom of Herod under the protection of Rome, and was at last absorbed in one of the three Palestines into which all the surrounding country was divided, about the beginning of the fifth century of our era. Even before, though the limits as given above were recognised in the authority secured to Herod, the friend of the Romans, it was not acknowledged, apart from Palestine, in the provincial distribution of the empire.

Juliomăgus, a city of Gaul, now Angers in Anjou. Its modern name is derived from the name of the people whose capital it was in ancient times. Those people were the Andes or Andecavi, who dwelt about the confluence of the Liger and the Meduana, the Loire and the Maienne.

Juliopŏlis. Vid. Gordium.

Jŭlis, a town of the island of Cos, which gave birth to Simonides, &c. The walls of this city were all marble, and there are now some pieces remaining entire, above 12 feet in height, as the monuments of its ancient splendour. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Junōnis Promontorium, now Cape Trafalgar. It is on the Atlantic side of the Straits of Gibraltar, which may be considered to commence from this point. Voss. ad Mel.

Labeātis Palus, a lake in Dalmatia, towards the borders of Illyria. It received the waters of the Oriundus and the Clausula from the north and east, and discharged its own through the Barbana into the Hadriaticum Mare west of the mouth of the Drinus. At its southern extremity was Scodra, Scutari, the name of which is sometimes given to the lake. The people living in its vicinity were called Labeates. Liv. 44, c. 31, l. 45, c. 26.

Labĭcum, now Colonna, a town of Italy, called also, Lavicum, between Gabii and Tusculum, which became a Roman colony about four centuries B. C. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 796.—Liv. 2, c. 39. l. 4, c. 47.

Labotas, a river near Antioch in Syria. Strab. 16.

Labron, a part of Italy on the Mediterranean, supposed to be Leghorn. Cic. 2, ad fra 6.

Lăcēdæmon, a noble city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, called also Sparta, and now known by the name of Misitra. It has been severally known by the name of Lelegia, from the Leleges, the first inhabitants of the country, or from Lelex, one of their kings; and Œbalia, from Œbalus, the sixth king from Eurotas. It was also called Hecatompolis, from the hundred cities which the whole province once contained. Lelex is supposed to have been the first king. His descendants, thirteen in number, reigned successively after him, till the reign of the sons of Orestes, when the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, about 80 years after the Trojan war. Procles and Eurysthenes, the descendants of the Heraclidæ, enjoyed the crown together, and after them it was decreed that the two families should always sit on the throne together. Vid. Eurysthenes. These two brothers began to reign B. C. 1102; their successors in the family of Procles were called Proclidæ, and afterwards Eurypontidæ, and those of Eurysthenes, Eurysthenidæ, and afterwards Agidæ. The successors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous, 1060 B. C. after his father had reigned 42 years: Eurypon, 1028: Prytanis, 1021: Eunomus, 986: Polydectes, 907: Lycurgus, 898: Charilaus, 873: Nicander, 809: Theopompus, 770; Zeuxidamus, 723: Anaxidamus, 690: Archidamus, 651: Agasicles, 605: Ariston, 564: Demaratus, 526: Leotychides, 491: Achidamus, 469: Agis, 427: Agesilaus, 397: Archidamus, 361: Agis 2d, 338: Eudamidas, 330: Archidamus, 295: Ecdamidas 2d, 268: Agis, 244: Archidamus, 230: Euclidas, 225: Lycurgus, 219:—The successors of Eurysthenes were Agis, 1059: Echestratus, 1058: Labotas, 1023: Doryssus, 986: Agesilaus, 957: Archelaus, 913: Teleclus, 853: Alcamenes, 813: Polydorus, 776: Eurycrates, 724: Anaxander, 687: Eurycrates 2d, 664: Leon, 607: Anaxandrides, 563: Cleomenes, 530: Leonidas, 491: Plistarchus, under guardianship of Pausanias, 480: Plistoanax, 466: Pausanias, 408: Agesipolis, 397: Cleombrotus, 380: Agesipolis 2d, 371: Cleomenes 2d, 370: Aretus or Areus, 309: Acrotatus, 265: Areus 2d, 264: Leonidas, 257: Cleombrotus, 243: Leonidas restored, 241: Cleomenes, 235: Agesipolis, 219. Under the two last kings, Lycurgus and Agesipolis, the monarchical power was abolished, though Machanidas, the tyrant, made himself absolute, B. C. 210, and Nabis, 206, for fourteen years. In the year 191 B. C. Lacedæmon joined the Achæan league, and about three years after the walls were demolished by order of Philopœmen. The territories of Laconia shared the fate of the Achæan confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B. C. and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themselves illustrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honour and liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labour, and their laws commanded them to make war their profession. They never applied themselves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left every thing else to the care of their slaves. Vid. Helotæ. They hardened their body by stripes and manly exercises; and accustomed themselves to undergo hardships, and even to die without fear or regret. From their valour in the field, and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by all the neighbouring princes, and their assistance was severally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyreneans, &c. As to domestic manners, the Lacedæmonians as widely differed from their neighbours as in political concerns, and their noblest women were not ashamed to appear on the stage hired for money. In the affairs of Greece, the interest of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful, and obtained the superiority for 500 years. Their jealousy of the power and greatness of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori, who had the power of imprisoning the kings themselves if guilty of misdemeanors. Vid. Ephori. The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the honour and reverence which they pay to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta are promiscuously applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reserved for the suburbs, or rather the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of distinction was originally observed, but in process of time it was totally lost, and both appellatives were soon synonymous and indiscriminately applied to the city and country. Vid. Sparta, Laconia. The place where the city stood is now called Paleo Chori, (the old town,) and the new one erected on its ruins at some distance on the west, is called Misatra. Liv. 34, c. 33, l. 45, c. 28.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1.—Paus. 3.—Justin. 2, 3, &c.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—Diod.—Mela, 2.

LACIDES, a village near Athens, which derived its name from Lacius, an Athenian hero, whose exploits are unknown. Here Zephyrus had an altar sacred to him, and likewise Ceres and Proserpine a temple. Paus. 1, c. 37.

LACINIUM, a promontory of Magna Græcia, now cape Colonna, the southern boundary of Tarentum in Italy, where Juno Lacinia had a temple held in great veneration. It received its name from Lacinius, a famous robber killed there by Hercules. Liv. 24, c. 3, l. 27, c. 5, l. 30, c. 20.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 522.

LACOBRIGA, now Lagos, on the bay of Lagos, near the Sacrum Promontorium, now Cape St. Vincent. It was in this city of Lusitania that Metellus besieged the rebel hero Sertorius.

LACONIA, LACONICA, and LACEDÆMON. "The little river Pamisus, and the chain of Taygetus, formed the Laconian limits on the side of Messenia. Towards Arcadia the boundaries were marked by the chain of mountains which gave rise on the northern side to the Alpheus, and on the southern to the Eurotas. A continuation of the same ridge served to separate the Spartan territory from the small district of Cynuria, which originally belonged to the Argives, but became afterwards a constant cause of contention between the two states. From the tradition collected by Pausanias, it appears that the Leleges were generally regarded as the first inhabitants of Laconia. It is to this ancient race that he traces the foundation of Sparta, and the origin of its earliest sovereigns; but he has not informed us by what revolution the Tyndaridæ, who were the last princes of the first Laconian dynasty, made way for the house of Pelops in the person of Menelaus, son-in-law, it is true, of Tyndareus, but who could not have succeeded to the crown in right of his wife. We must probably seek for an explanation of this fact in the power and influence obtained by Pelops and Atreus at this early period over nearly the whole peninsula. Thus, while Agamemnon reigned over Argos and Mycene, the domination of his brother Menelaus extended over the whole of Laconia and a great portion of Messenia. Homer, as Strabo observes, employs the name of Lacedæmon to denote both the city and the country of which it was the capital; but when the word Sparta is used, it is always with reference to the town. Menelaus was succeeded by Orestes, and Orestes by his son Tisamenus. It was during the reign of the latter that the Dorians and Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus, and introduced great and permanent political changes throughout the whole peninsula. Laconia being conquered by the invading army, Tisamenus, with the Achæans, withdrew to the Ægialus, then occupied by the Ionians. In the division which took place of the conquered territory, Argos was assigned to Temenus, Mes-senia to Cresphontes, and Laconia to Aristodemus; but the latter dying before the partition had been carried into effect, it was adjudged that his two sons Eurysthenes and Procles should be joint heirs of the possessions allotted to their father; and they thus became the progenitors of a double line of kings, who reigned at Sparta for several generations with equal power and authority. According to Ephorus, as cited by Strabo, Eurysthenes and Procles divided Laconia into six portions, which were governed by deputies, they themselves residing at Sparta. The inhabitants of this city, called Spartiatæ, enjoyed peculiar rights and privileges. Next to these were the Perioeci, or inhabitants of the country, who, though in some respects subject to the Spartan citizens, were yet governed by the same laws, and were equally eligible to the different offices of the state. The third class consisted of slaves named Helots, who, having been at first tributary, were, in consequence of their revolt, reduced to slavery, after an obstinate contest, called the war of the Helots. This name was said to be derived from Helos, a Laconian town, which was foremost in the rebellion. The Helots being considered as public slaves, their places of abode were regulated by the state, and certain duties imposed upon them. The laws relative to this unfortunate class of men are ascribed to Agis son of Eurysthenes. The first important change introduced by Lycurgus in the Spartan constitution was the creation of a senate, consisting of twenty-eight members, who, being in all matters of deliberation possessed of equal authority with the kings, proved an effectual check against any infringement of the laws on their part, and preserved a just balance in the state, by supporting the crown against the encroachments of the people, and protecting the latter against any undue influence of the regal power. It was also enacted that the people should be occasionally summoned, and have the power of deciding upon any question proposed to them. No measure, however could originate with them; they had only the right of approving or rejecting what was submitted to them by the senate and two kings. But, as danger was to be apprehended from various attempts subsequently made by the people to extend their rights in these meetings, it was at length ordained, that, if the latter endeavoured to alter any law, the kings and senate should dissolve the assembly, and annul the amendment. With a view of counterbalancing the great power thus committed to the legislative assembly, and which might degenerate into oligarchy, five annual magistrates were appointed, named Ephori, whose office it was, like that of the tribunes at Rome, to watch over the interests of the people, and protect them against the influence of the aristocracy. Lycurgus, in order to banish wealth and luxury from the state, made a new division of lands, by which the income and possessions of all were rendered equal. He divided the territory of Sparta into 9000 portions, and the remainder of Laconia into 30,000, of which one lot was assigned to each citizen and inhabitant. These parcels of land were supposed to produce seventy medimni of grain for a man and twelve for a woman, besides a sufficient quantity of wine and oil. The more effectually to banish the love of riches, the Spartan lawgiver prohibited the use of gold and silver, and allowed only iron money, affixing even to this the lowest value. He also instituted public repasts termed Phiditia, where all the citizens partook in common of such frugal fare as the law directed. The kings even were not exempted from this regulation, but eat with the other citizens; the only distinction observed with respect to them being that of having a double portion of food. The Spartan custom of eating in public appears to have been borrowed from the Cretans, who called these repasts Andria. At the age of seven all the Spartan children, by the laws of Lycurgus, were enrolled in companies, and educated agreeably to his rules of discipline and exercise, which were strictly enforced. These varied according to the ages of the boys, but were not entirely remitted even after they had attained to manhood. For it was a maxim with Lycurgus that no man should live for himself, but for his country. Every Spartan therefore was regarded as a soldier, and the city itself resembled a great camp, where every one had a fixed allowance, and was required to perform regular service. In order that they might have more leisure to devote themselves to martial pursuits, they were forbidden to exercise any mechanical arts or trades, which, together with the labours of agriculture, devolved on the Helots. The condition of these ill-fated men cannot even now be considered without feelings of commiseration for their sufferings, and execration and horror at the conduct of their oppressors. Aristotle has recorded, that when the Ephori entered upon their office they began by declaring war against the Helots, who were then liable to be attacked and murdered without any form of justice whatsoever. Sometimes indeed the Spartan youths armed with daggers were ordered to place themselves in ambuscade, to surprise and put to death any of these unfortunate wretches whom they might chance to meet. These criptia, as they were called, took place most commonly at night; but the unhappy objects of this barbarous exercise were frequently assailed by day, and butchered whilst working in the fields. The two reigning houses of Lacedæmon took the name of Agidæ and Euripontidæ from Agis and Eurypon, sons of Eurysthenes and Procles, the first Heraclid sovereigns; since, as Ephorus asserted, these were looked upon as having succeeded to the throne in their own right, whilst their fathers obtained the crown by foreign aid. Sparta was already the first power of Greece, when Crœsus was induced by the counsels of an oracle to court its alliance; but the succours, which were to have been sent to the Lydian monarch, were stopped by the news of the siege and capture of Sardis. But for the unexampled instance of devotion in their country's cause, displayed by Leonidas and his 300 companions, the Lacedæmonian character would not have been distinguished in history for its energy or patriotic zeal during the Persian conflict; since tardiness and superstition prevented their sharing in the glories of the field of Marathon: the want also of energy and talent in their commander Eurybiades would no doubt have brought Greece to the verge of destruction, had not the wisdom and vigour of Themistocles interposed, to counteract the effects of his weak and vacillating disposition. The battle of Platæa, it is true, was won by a Spartan general, and it cannot be denied that the valour and firmness of the Lacedæmonian troops contributed mainly to the success of that memorable day; but yet how mean and contemptible appears the procrastination of the Spartan government in taking the field, when compared with the heroic zeal and devotion of the Athenians; notwithstanding the strength and resources of the former were as yet unimpaired, whilst the latter were without a country, and destitute of every thing but their arms, and courage to employ them against the common enemy. After the battle of Mycale, which freed the island and colonies from the Persian yoke, and the capture of Sestos, whereby the Hellespont was opened to the Grecian fleet, the Lacedæmonians abandoned the conduct of the war to the Athenians. The rapid advance of the Athenians towards universal domination proved too late the error they had been guilty of in withdrawing from the command of the Persian war before its termination; and the Spartan government gladly made the wrongs sustained by the Corinthians in the affairs of Corcyra and Potidæa a pretext for a rupture with Athens." With this began the Peloponnesian war, which terminated in the ruin of Athens, and which was hardly less pernicious to Laconia herself and to the rest of Greece. War followed war with varying success for many years, and terminated only in the loss of liberty to all, and the extension of the Macedonian name and power over the free states of Greece. To this succeeded the Roman authority, and the passage of empire across the Ionian and Adriatic seas from Macedon to Rome. "Under the domination of Rome, the inhabitants of Laconia enjoyed a greater degree of freedom than was allowed to the other provinces of Greece, being, says Strabo, rather regarded as allies than as subjects. A considerable part of the nation, consisting of several maritime towns around Sparta, was dignified with the title of Eleutherolacones, conferred upon it by Augustus, together with other privileges, for the zeal which its inhabitants had early testified in favour of the Romans. Laconia, from its rugged and mountainous character, was naturally barren and difficult of culture; such, in short, as Euripides described in one of his lost plays. The epithet of κητοέστας, applied by Homer to this country, has been supposed by some to refer to its great extent compared with the other states of Peloponnesus, but by others to the number of its valleys. Laconia could boast at one time of possessing one hundred cities, but the greater part of these were probably like the demi of Attica, not larger than villages. The whole population of the country, including the Helots, who constituted by far the most numerous class, being in the proportion of 5 to 1, may be estimated at 270,000 souls." Cram.

Læstrygones, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. (Vid. Antiphetes.) They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who, however, does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their capital. A colony of them, as some suppose, passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formiæ, whence the epithet of Læstrygonia is often used for that of *Formiana. Lampsacus, and Lampsacum, now Lamsaki, a town of Asia Minor, on the borders of the Propontis at the north of Abydos. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, of which he was reckoned by some the founder. His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery, and exhibited scenes of the most unnatural lust; and hence the epithet Lampsacius is used to express immodesty and wantonness. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, or, more properly, for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes. Vid. Anaximenes. It was formerly called Pityusa, and received the name of Lampsacus from Lampsace, a daughter of Mandron, a king of Phrygia, who gave information to some Phoceans who dwelt there, that the rest of the inhabitants had conspired against their lives. This timely information saved them from destruction. The city afterwards bore the name of their preserver. The wine of Lampsacus was famous, and therefore a tribute of wine was granted from the city by Xerxes to maintain the table of Themistocles. Mela, 1. c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Paus. 9, c. 31.—Herodot. 5, c. 117.—*C. Lancia. Three towns of ancient Hispania were known by the name of Lancia. One of these was a principal city of the Astures in Tarraconensis, between the Durius and the coast. The other places of this name belonged to Lusitania. Of these, the one called Oppidana was situate between the western bank of the Cuda and the springs of the Munda, (Mondego,) and is supposed to be the modern a-Guarda; and that called Transcuda, from its position also on the Cuda, may be Ciudad Rodrigo. D'Anville.

Langobardi, by corruption Lombards, one of the most celebrated of the northern barbarian hordes by which the Roman empire was overthrown. The original seats of this people it is difficult to describe, from the lateness of the period at which they became known, and from their various migrations during the era at which they first present themselves to history. Their Scandinavian origin has been supported and denied, and authorities of the highest character reject on the one hand, and advocate on the other, their connexion with the Germanic race. However the truth may be in relation to their earliest settlements, the Langobardi were settled in Germany when their relation to Roman history begins, and whatever differences characterized them, may be considered as distinctions of a tribe rather than of a race. In the reign of Augustus we find this people between the Oder and the Elbe; and by the year 500 of our era, they had approached the Danube and the provinces of the empire, or, in other words, the confines of civilization. Their particular province appears to have been at this period, and for some time afterwards, a part of the modern duchy of Brandenburgh. Few in number, they made up in courage and ferocity for their numerical inferiority; and in all the wars and changes of the barbarians, they maintained their fierce independence. Even when migrating before the new and potent multitude of those who, continually pressing on the confines of Europe, impelled the north upon the centre and the centre upon the south, they appear rather to have left their seats for more auspicious countries, and not to have felt the pressure of a foreign force. In their wars with the larger tribes they were invariably successful, and, though scarcely known until the time of Trajan, and then but merely named, by the time of Justinian they were sufficiently known and respected to be invited within the pale of the empire. At the suggestion of this emperor they crossed the Danube, and prepared for the reduction of the provinces of Noricum and Pannonia. With the Avars they conquered the Gepidæ, and after occupying Pannonia for some time, they formally determined the conquest of Italy. Other barbarians had broken the barriers which the vanity of the Romans had placed as the limits of their empire, and as a bulwark, with the authority of their name, against hostile encroachment; but the desire of booty had been with them the governing principle. Alboinus, king of the Lombards, aspired to the crown of Italy, and passing, on the invitation of Narses, the resistance of the Alps, he appeared at the head of a vast and heterogeneous collection of barbarous tribes between the mountains and the Po. The conquests of this savage hero changed again the name of all the north of Italy; and as its Gallic invaders had imparted to it their name, which during all the ages of the Roman rule it bore, so from this successful attempt of the Longobardi, the name of Lombardy, assigned to the conquests of Alboinus, has remained to them through all the changes of twelve hundred years, and marks the limits of his victories. The Lombards from the north spread quickly over Italy; and the tributary, or, as we perhaps should say, the feudal dukes, established even in Campania the name and power of the Lombard race. In the middle ages three powers arose to claim supremacy in Italy; the pope, as guardian of the ecclesiastical interest; the exarch of Ravenna, to whom were intrusted the interests of the eastern emperors; and the Lombard kings, who boldly claimed to be considered kings of Italy. The conflict between these powers was long and warm; the Lombards for a time appeared to prevail, but the entreaties of the church obtained an ally in the once redoubted Franks, and raised up a new claimant to dominion in Italy. The arms of Charlemagne were matched against those of Desiderius, the last king of the Lombards, and the new empire of the west, established by the Frank monarch, was founded on the subjugation of the Lombards and the subversion of the Lombard throne. Thus ended, 774, the history of this people, who, after having lived the wild life of a Nomadic tribe, and causing terror even to the savage inhabitants of the northern forests, succeeded in giving a new throne and a new name to Italy. From this time the name of Lombard implies merely that the people bearing it belong to Upper Italy, and conveys no longer the notion of a barbarous character or a peculiar race; and this corrupt appellation becomes less objectionable than that original name of Longobardi, which denoted the bearded ferocity of the German foresters. Sacchi Origine de' Longobard.

Lanŭvium, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple, which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whose consuls, on first entering upon office, offered sacrifices to the goddess. The statue of the goddess was covered with a goat's skin, and armed with a buckler and spear, and wore shoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. *Cic. pro Mur. de Nat. Laŏdĭcĕa, I. a city of Asia, on the borders of Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia, celebrated for its commerce, and the fine soft and black wool of its sheep. It was originally called Diospolis, and afterwards Rhoas. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 12.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—Cic. 5, Att. 15. pro Flacc. According to the Roman distribution of the Asiatic provinces under Constantine, this was a town of Phrygia, but attributed by Ptolemy to Lydia. It stood on the Lycus, at its confluence with the Azopus, and but a short distance from the place at which it emptied into the Mæander, and might with almost equal propriety be assigned to Lydia or Phrygia. The due observance of the distribution of the provinces into Juridical Conventus, &c. in the order of time, will avoid a great part of the ambiguity arising from the circumstance of one town's being variously assigned to different provinces. As the seat of the imperial court for its district, Laodicea superseded Hierapolis as the capital. Its ancient name is still partly preserved in that of Ladik, though the Turks denominate it Eski. Hisar, or the Old Castle.——II. Another of Lycaonia, surnamed Combusta, now Jurekian Ladik, to the north-west of Iconium.——III. Another, surnamed Libani, from its situation among the mountains of that name. It stood between the rivers Orontes and Eleutherus, west of Emessa.——IV. A city of the same name upon the coast lay opposite the eastern extremity of the island of Cyprus, and from its situation was entitled ad Mare. The name is still extant, though slightly changed, in Ladikieh. There were other towns upon which this appellation was bestowed, in honour, generally, of the mothers, wives, and daughters of the Syrian kings.

Laodicene, a province of Syria, which receives its name from Laodicea, its capital.

Laphystium, a mountain in Bœotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Laphystius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter saved by sending them a golden ram, whence the surname and the homage paid to the god. Paus. 9, c. 34.

Larinum, or Larina, now Larino, a town of the Frentani, near the Tifernus before it falls into the Adriatic. The inhabitants were called Larinates. Ital. 15, v. 565.—Cic. Clu. 63, 4. Att. 12, l. 7, ep. 13.—Liv. 22, c. 18, l. 27, c. 40. —Cæs. C. 1, c. 23.

Larissa, I. "Larissa, which still retains its name and position, was one of the most ancient and flourishing towns of Thessaly, though it is not mentioned by Homer, unless indeed the Argos Pelasgicum of that poet is to be identified with it, and this notion would not be entirely groundless, if, as Strabo informs us, there was once a city named Argos close to Larissa. The same geographer has enumerated all the ancient towns of the latter name; and we may collect from his researches that it was peculiar to the Pelasgi, since all the countries in which it was found had been at different periods occupied by that people. Steph. Byz. says that Larissa of Thessaly, situated on the Peneus, owed its origin to Acrisius. This town was placed in that most fertile part of the province which had formerly been occupied by the Perrhæbi, who were partly expelled by the Larisseans, while the remainder were kept in close subjection, and rendered tributary. This state of things is said by Strabo to have continued till the time of Philip, who seems to have taken the government of Thessaly into his own hands. According to Aristotle the constitution of this city was democratical. Its magistrates were elected by the people, and considered themselves as dependant on their favour. This fact will account for the support which the Athenians derived from the republic of Larissa during the Peloponnesian war. The Aleuadæ, mentioned by Herodotus as princes of Thessaly at the time of the Persian invasion, were natives of this city. Larissa was occupied by the Romans soon after the battle of Cynoscephalæ, Philip having abandoned the place, and destroyed all the royal papers which were kept there. Larissa was attacked by Antiochus in the first war he waged against the Romans; but the siege was raised on the approach of some troops despatched by the latter for the relief of the place. Diodorus informs us that its citadel was a place of great strength. Though the territory of this city was extremely rich and fertile, it was subject to great losses, caused by the inundations of the Peneus. Dr. Clarke states that he could discover no ruins at Larissa; but that the inhabitants give the name of Old Larissa to a Palæo-Castro, which is situated upon some very high rocks at four hours distance towards the east. Dr. Holland and Mr. Dodwell are however of opinion that the modern Larissa stands upon the remains of the ancient city." ——II. Another, surnamed Cremaste, "so called from the steepness of its situation was also named Pelasgia, as we are assured by Strabo. The latter appellation might indeed lead to the supposition that it was the Pelasgic Argos of Homer.

Nunc super Argos arant.

Larissa Cremaste was in the dominion of Achilles; and it is probable from that circumstance that Virgil gives him the title of Larissæus. At a much later period we find this town occupied by Demetrius Poliorcetes when at war with Cassander. It was taken by Apustius, a Roman commander in the Macedonian war, and was again besieged by the Romans in the war with Perseus, when it was entered by the consul Licinius Crassus on being deserted by the inhabitants. Its ruins are thus described by Mr. Dodwell: 'In three quarters of an hour' (from the village of Gradista) 'we arrived at the remains of an ancient city, at the foot of a steep hill, covered with bushes. The walls are built up the side of the hill, to the summit of which we arrived in twenty minutes; the construction is of the third style, and finely built with large masses. There is reason to suppose that these are the remains of Larissa Cremaste, the capital of the kingdom of Achilles; and I conceive there is an error in the text of Strabo respecting its distance from Echinus; for twenty stadia I should propose to substitute one hundred and twenty; which, calculating something less than thirty stadia an hour, corresponds with four hours and a half, which it took us to perform the journey. Its situation is remarkably strong; and its lofty and impending aspect merits the name of Cremaste.' Sir W. Gell says, 'the form of Larissa was like that of many very ancient Grecian cities, a triangle with a citadel at its highest point. The acropolis, in which are the fragments of a Doric temple, is connected with a branch of Othrys by a narrow isthmus, over which water was conducted to the city. It is accessible on horseback on the side nearest Makalla; and from it is seen the magnificent prospect of the Maliac gulf, the whole range of Œta, and over it Parnassus.' Beyond is Alope, ascribed by Homer to Achilles, and which according to Steph. Byz. stood between Larissa Cremaste and Echinus. It is probably the same as the Alitrope noticed by Scylax, and retains its name on the shore of the Melian gulf below Makalla." Cram.——III. A town of Syria on the Orontes between Epiphania and Apamea. Its modern name, according to D'Anville, is Shizar.——IV. The ruins of a city in Assyria, on the Tigris, above the mouth of the Zabus, indicated to the ten thousand the site of an ancient city named Larissa, supposed to have been destroyed by the Medes.

Larissus, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing from mount Scollis, and forming the boundary of Achaia and Elis.

Larius lacus, a celebrated piece of water in Cisalpine Gaul, now Lago di Como. On the borders of this division of Italia and of Rhætia the river Addua spread itself into a lake which, receiving at the same time tributary streams from the Alps, became one of the most beautiful and celebrated sheets of water in ancient Italy, and has lost none of its celebrity in modern times and with its modern name. Here Pliny had two villas, and the fountain of which he speaks yet bears the name of the naturalist. The lake and its surrounding country are thus described in the Classical Tour. "The lake of Como, or the Larian (for so it is still called, not unfrequently even by the common people) retains its ancient dimensions unaltered, and is fifty miles in length, from three to six in breadth, and from forty to six hundred feet in depth. Its form is serpentine, and its banks are indented with frequent creeks and harbours; it is subject to sudden squalls, and sometimes, even when calm, to swells violent and unexpected; both are equally dangerous. The latter are more frequently experienced in the branch of the lake that terminates at Como than in the other parts, because it has no emissary or outlet, such as the Adda forms at Lecco. The mountains that border the lake are by no means either barren or naked; their lower regions are generally covered with olives, vines, and orchards; the middle is encircled with groves of chesnut of great height and expansion, and the upper regions are either downs, or forests of pine and fir, with the exception of certain very elevated ridges, which are necessarily either naked or covered with snow. Their sides are seldom formed of one continued steep, but usually interrupted by fields and levels extending in some places into wide plains, which supply abundant space for every kind of cultivation. These fertile plains are generally at one third, and sometimes at two thirds, of the total elevation. On or near these levels are most of the towns and villages that so beautifully diversify the sides of the mountains. But cultivation is not the only source of the riches of the Larian territory: various mines of iron, lead, and copper, are now, as they were anciently, spread over its surface, and daily opened in the bowels of its mountains; besides quarries of marbles, which supply Milan, and all the neighbouring cities with the materials and the ornaments of their most magnificent churches." Eustace.

Latini, the inhabitants of Latium. Vid. Latium.

Latium. "The name of Latium was at first given to that portion of Italy only which extends from the mouth of the Tiber to the Circæan promontory, a distance of about fifty miles along the coast: but subsequently this last boundary was removed to the river Liris, now Garigliano, whence arose the distinction of Latium Antiquum and Novum. At a still later period, the southern boundary of Latium was extended from the Liris to the mouth of the river Vulturnus and the Massic hills. Latium Antiquum may be considered as bounded to the north by the Anio and the Tiber, the Latins being separated from the Sabines by the former river, and from the Tuscans by the latter; to the east and south-east by the river Ufens and the Volscian mountains, and to the west by the Tyrrhenian Sea. Even in this narrow territory it will be observed that many tribes are included which were not originally incorporated into the Latin confederacy, and consequently did not offer sacrifice in common on the Alban mount, nor meet in the general assembly held at the source of the Aqua Ferentina. The earliest records of Italian history, as we are assured by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, represented the plains of Latium as first inhabited by the Siculi, a people of obscure origin, but who would be entitled to our notice from the circumstance above mentioned, even had they not acquired additional historical importance from their subsequent migration to the celebrated island from thence named Sicily. It has been questioned, however, and apparently on sufficient grounds, whether the statement of Dionysius, in regard to the first possession of Latium by the Siculi, be correct; for on their arrival in Sicily they are said to have found that island already occupied by the Sicani, who, as Thucydides relates, came originally from the banks of the river Sicanus in Spain, having been driven from their country by the Ligurians; and as it is not probable that this people crossed over directly from Spain to Sicily, we must admit, with Freret, that they likewise traversed Italy, and having gradually advanced towards the extremity of that country, finally passed into the adjacent island. It is plain, however, from several passages in ancient writers, that the occupation of Italy by the Sicani was something more than a transient passage through that country. Respecting the Siculi, it is not easy to ascertain what was their origin, or the country which they occupied prior to their settlement in Italy. So remote indeed was the period of this event, that Dionysius appears to have considered them as settled there from time immemorial. But this opinion is too unsatisfactory to allow the modern antiquary to acquiesce in it; accordingly we find many systems advanced by writers of that class respecting the origin of this ancient people. Olivieri concluded that they came from Greece, because Ancona is said by Pliny to have been founded by the Siculi, while other writers expressly call it a Greek city. But it is much more probable that by the Siculi of Pliny we are to understand a Syracusan colony, of which Strabo makes mention, and to which Juvenal alludes when he calls the city in question the Doric Ancona. Freret, on the other hand, contended, that the Siculi were an Illyrian nation, who settled in Italy not long after the Liburni, a people of the same race, had established themselves in that country. This learned writer has not made us acquainted on what authority he grounded this assertion, but it is probable that he relied chiefly on a passage in Pliny, in which the Siculi are mentioned in conjunction with the Liburni, as having anciently possessed a considerable tract of country in the province which was afterwards called Picenum: he might also be induced to think that his opinion derived some support from Ptolemy, who mentions the Siculiotæ as a people of Dalmatia. It would hardly be advisable, however, to adopt this opinion of Freret without further evidence, especially as it is found to be at variance with the express testimony of a writer whose authority, on matters connected with the history of Sicily, ought not to be hastily rejected, we mean that of Philistus of Syracuse, who, as Dionysius reports, asserted that the Siculi were Ligurians, and that having been driven from Italy by the Umbri and Pelasgi, they crossed over into Sicily. This is also the account which Silius Italicus has followed. There is no point so clearly established with respect to the Siculi as that of their having occupied, at a very early period, the Latin plains and part of Etruria. Placed therefore on the western coast of Italy, their connexion with Liguria may readily be conceived, while their Illyrian origin becomes proportionably improbable. On the same supposition likewise we can well understand how this people may have been driven south along the western coast by the combined forces of the Pelasgi and the Aborigines; but if we allow with Pliny that they had formed settlements on the Adriatic also, it will not be easy to conceive how a nation so largely disseminated and so firmly settled could have been expelled from Italy. It is evident also that the Siculi did not extend from sea to sea, as the Aborigines, their constant enemies, were placed between them and the Adriatic. Lastly, we may adduce, in confirmation of the Ligurian origin of the Siculi, a tradition recorded by Festus, which stated that the Sacrani, who are the same people as the Aborigines, expelled the Ligurians and the Siculi from the Septimontium, or Rome. Dionysius likewise mentions the Ligurians among the heterogeneous population of which the Roman nation was first composed. Ancient writers do not seem agreed as to the name of the people who compelled the Siculi to abandon Latium. Dionysius informs us, that Philistus ascribed their expulsion to the Umbri and Pelasgi. Thucydides refers the same event to the Opici; while Antiochus of Syracuse, a still more ancient writer, represents the Siculi as flying from the Œnotri. Notwithstanding this apparent discrepance, it is pretty evident, that under these different names of Umbri, Opici, and Œnotri, the same people are designated whom Dionysius and the Roman historians usually term Aborigines. Having already sufficiently treated of this ancient race under the head of Umbria, we shall content ourselves with referring the reader to the section which relates to that province, and pass on to trace rapidly the sequel of the history of Latium. The Aborigines, intermixing with several Pelasgic colonies, occupied Latium, and soon formed themselves into the several communities of Latini, Rutuli, Hernici, and Volsci, even prior to the Trojan war and the supposed arrival of Æneas. Of that event it is scarce necessary for us to speak at length, since it has been already discussed by others as fully as the subject admits of. The question indeed seems to resolve itself into this narrow compass. Are we to form our notions of the Trojan prince by what we read concerning him in the Iliad? If so, we are there told plainly that Æneas and his descendants remained in possession of the Troad for many generations. (Il. Y. 307.) Consequently Homer himself furnishes the best argument against the colony of Æneas in Latium. If we are not to form our judgment from what is related of the son of Anchises in the Iliad, then he becomes a mere fictitious character, the reality of whose adventures cannot afford ground for historical discussion. Notwithstanding that Dionysius labours anxiously to prove the fact of the arrival of Æneas in Latium, he is obliged to confess that by the accounts of all the older historians, such as Hellanicus, Cephalo of Gergithus, and Hegesippus, the Trojan prince did not advance beyond Thrace, or the peninsula of Pallene. We would not, however, go so far as some modern writers, who consider the story of the Trojan colony as an invention of the Romans to please Augustus: it is evident, from Dionysius's account, that there were some traditions to this effect among the Greeks long before they knew any thing of Rome. There seems no objection, therefore, to our admitting the arrival of a chief called Æneas on the Latin coast, though he might neither be the son of Anchises, nor in any respect connected with Troy. If he came from the Thracian Ænea, as most accounts imply, the name of that city might have occasioned the error. Various etymologies of the names of Latium and the Latins are to be met with in ancient writers; but we see no reason why they should not be derived from a chief called Latinus, of whom the Greeks seem to have heard, since he is mentioned by Hesiod in a passage already cited, though they were not acquainted with the Latins as a distinct people of Italy. The name of Prisci Latini was first given to certain cities of Latium, supposed to have been colonized by Latinus Silvius, one of the kings of Alba, but most of which were afterwards conquered and destroyed by Ancus Martius and Tarquinius Priscus. In the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, we find the Latin nation united under the form of a confederate republic, and acknowledging that ambitious prince as the protector of their league. After the expulsion of the tyrant from Rome, we are told that the Latins, who favoured his cause, experienced a total defeat near the lake Regillus, and were obliged to sue for peace. According to this historian, the Latins received the thanks of the Roman senate, some years afterwards, for having taken no advantage of the disturbances at Rome, which finally led to the secession of the people to the mons Sacer, and for having, on the contrary, offered every assistance in their power on that occasion; he adds also, that a perpetual league was formed at that time between the Romans and Latins. However, about 143 years afterwards, we find the latter openly rebelling, and refusing to supply the usual quota of troops which they had agreed to furnish as allies of Rome. Their bold demand, which was urged through L. Annius Setinus in the Roman senate, that one of the consuls at least should be chosen out of their nation, led to an open rupture. A war followed, which was rendered remarkable from the event of the execution of young Manlius by order of his father, and the devotion of Decius. After having been defeated in several encounters, the Latins were finally reduced to subjection, with the exception of a few towns, which experienced greater lenity, and Latium thenceforth ceased to be an independent state. At that time the rights of Roman citizens had been granted to a few only of the Latin cities; but, at a later period, the Gracchi sought to level all such distinctions between the Latins and Romans. This measure, however, was not carried. The Social war followed; and though the confederates were finally conquered, after a long and desperate contest, the senate thought it advisable to decree that all the Latin cities which had not taken part with the allies should enjoy the rights of Roman citizens. Many of these towns were, however, deprived of their privileges by Sylla; and it was not till the close of the republic that the Latins were admitted generally to participate in all the rights and immunities enjoyed by the Quirites." Cram.

Latmus, a mountain of Caria, near Miletus. It is famous for the residence of Endymion, whom the Moon regularly visited in the night, whence he is often called *Latmius Heros. Vid. Endymion. Latobrigi, a people of Belgic Gaul, of whom we know but little. According to Cæsar they were in the vicinity of the Helvetii, Rauraci, and Tulingi. Cæs. B. G. 1, 5.

Latopŏlis, a city of Egypt, in the Thebaid, "so called from a fish that was there adored, bears now the name of Asna, which signifies illustrious." D'Anville.

Lavinium, or Lavinum, a town of Italy, the capital of Latium during the reign of Æneas, "said to have been founded by that prince on his marriage with the daughter of Latinus: this story, however, would go but little towards proving the existence of such a town, if it were not actually enumerated among the cities of Latium, by Strabo and other authors as well as by the Itineraries. Plutarch notices it as the place in which Tatius, the colleague of Romulus, was assassinated. Strabo mentions that Lavinium had a temple consecrated to Venus, which was common to all the Latins. The inhabitants are termed by Pliny, Laviniates Ilionenses. Lavinium and Laurentium were latterly united under the name of Lauro-Lavinium. Various opinions have been entertained by antiquaries relative to the site which ought to be assigned to Lavinium. Cluverius placed it near the church of S. Petronella; Holstenius on the hill called Monte di Levano; but more recent topographers concur in fixing it at a place called Pratica, about three miles from the coast." Cram.—*Virg. Laureacum, a town at the confluence of the Ens and the Danube, now Lorch. It was the place of rendezvous of a Roman fleet on the Danube.

Laurentini, a name belonging properly to the inhabitants of Laurentum, but applied also to the subjects of king Latinus in general.

Laurentum, "the capital of Latinus, according to the opinion of the best topographers, must have stood about sixteen miles from Ostia, and near the spot now called Paterno. Of the existence of this city, whatever may be thought of Æneas and the Trojan colony, there can be no doubt; without going so far back as to Saturn and Picus, it may be asserted that the origin of Laurentum is most ancient, since it is mentioned among the maritime cities of Latium in the first treaties between Rome and Carthage recorded by Polybius. Though Laurentum joined the Latin league in behalf of Tarquin, and shared in the defeat of the lake Regillus, it seems afterwards to have been firmly attached to the Roman interests. Of its subsequent history we know but little, Lucan represents it as having fallen into ruins, and become deserted in consequence of the civil wars. At a later period, however, Laurentum appears to have been restored under the name of Lauro-Lavinium; a new city having been formed, as it is supposed, by the union of Laurentum and Lavinium. This is proved by a passage in Frontinus and Symmachus, and numerous inscriptions collected by Vulpius. The district of Laurentum must have been of a very woody and marshy nature. The Silva Laurentina is noticed by Julius Obsequens; and Herodian reports, that the emperor Commodus was ordered to this part of the country by his physicians, on account of the laurel groves which grew there; the shade of which was considered as particularly salutary. It was from this tree that Laurentum is supposed to derive its name. (Æn. 7, 59.) The marshes of Laurentum were famous for the number and size of the wild boars which they bred in their reedy pastures. We are told that Scipio and Lælius, when released from the cares of business, often resorted to this neighbourhood, and amused themselves by gathering shells on the shore. Pliny the Younger says Laurentum was much frequented by the Roman nobles in winter; and so numerous were their villas, that they presented more the appearance of a city than detached dwellings. Every lover of antiquity is acquainted with the elegant and minute description he gives of his own retreat. The precise spot which should be assigned to this villa has been a subject of much dispute among topographers. Holstenius places it at Paterno, but in this respect he was probably mistaken, as the generality of antiquaries consider the remains, which exist on that site, as those of Laurentum; besides, Paterno is at some distance from the sea, whereas Pliny's retreat was close to it. We would rather follow the opinion of Fabretti, Lancisi, and Vulpius, who fix the site of the villa at la Piastra, a hamlet nearly midway between Laurentum and Ostia. Hortensius, the celebrated orator, and the rival of Cicero, had also a farm in this neighbourhood." Cram.

Laurium, "celebrated for its silver mines, was a range of hills extending from the Astypalæan promontory to the promontory of Sunium, and from thence to the neighbourhood of Port Rafti, the ancient Prasiæ, on the eastern coast. Herodotus informs us that the produce of these mines was shared among the Athenians, each of whom received ten drachmæ; but we are not informed whether this division took place annually. Themistocles, however, during a war with Ægina, advised them to apply this money to the construction of 200 galleys; a measure which contributed in a great degree to the naval ascendency of the Athenians. Thucydides reports, that the Lacedæmonian army, in their second invasion of Attica, advanced in this direction as far as Laurium. The produce of the mines had already much diminished in the time of Xenophon. We collect from his account that they were then farmed by private persons, who paid a certain sum to the republic in proportion to the quantity of ore they extracted; but he strongly urged the government to take the works into their own hands, conceiving that they would bring a great accession of revenue to the state. These private establishments were called ἐργαστήρια ἐν τοῖς ἀργυρείοις. Nicias is said to have employed at one time 1000 slaves in the mines. Strabo informs us that the metallic veins were nearly exhausted when he wrote; a considerable quantity of silver, however, was extracted from the old scoriæ, as the ancient miners were not much skilled in the art of smelting the ore. 'Mr. Hawkins, in his survey of this part of the Attic coast, discovered many veins of the argentiferous lead ore, with which the country seems to abound; he observed traces of the silver mines not far beyond Keratia. The site of the smelting furnaces may be traced to the southward of Thorico for some miles, immense quantities of scoriæ occurring there.' These were probably placed near the sea-coast for the convenience of fuel, which it became necessary to import. The mines were situated much higher along the central range of hills." Cram.

Lauron, a town of Spain, whose situation is uncertain. According to a learned geographer, "it is now Laurigi in Valentia, a small village, once a town of great strength, which Sertorius besieged, took, and burned; even then when Pompey, whose confederates the Lauronites were, stood with his whole army nigh enough unto the flame to warm his hands, and yet durst not succour it." Heyl. Cosm.

Laus, now Laino, a town on a river of the same name, which forms the southern boundary of Lucania. Strab. 6.

Laus Pompeia, a town of Italy, founded by a colony sent thither by Pompey.

Lautumiæ, or Latomiæ, a prison at Syracuse, cut out of the solid rock by Dionysius, and now converted into a subterraneous garden, filled with numerous shrubs, flourishing in luxuriant variety. Cic. Vir. 5, c. 27.—Liv. 26, v. 27.

Lebadea, a town of Bœotia, on the borders of Phocis, west of Coronea, more anciently called Midea. "This city was celebrated in antiquity for the oracle of Trophonius, situated in a cave above the town, into which those who consulted the Fates were obliged to descend, after performing various ceremonies, which are accurately detailed by Pausanias, who also gives a minute description of the sacred cavern. The oracle was already in considerable repute in the time of Crœsus, who consulted it, as well as Mardonius. The victory of Leuctra was said to have been predicted by Trophonius, and a solemn assembly was in consequence held at Lebadea, after the action to return thanks. This was known, however, to have been an artifice of Epaminondas. Strabo calls the presiding deity Jupiter Trophonius. The geographer Dicæarchus, as we are informed by Athenæus, wrote a full account of the oracle. He briefly alludes to it in his description of Greece.

Ὅπου τὸ μαντεῖον λέγουσι γεγενῆσθαι.

Below the cave were the grove and temple of Trophonius, the fountains of Lethe and Mnemosyne, and the temples of Proserpine, Ceres, Jupiter, and Apollo; a chapel dedicated to Bona Fortuna; all of which were filled with statues by the first artists; whence Pausanias observes that Lebadea was as richly ornamented with works of art as any city of Greece. It is however said to have been plundered by the troops of Mithridates." Cram.

Lebedus, or Lebedos, a town of Ionia, at the north of Colophon, where festivals were yearly observed in honour of Bacchus. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried part of the inhabitants to Ephesus. It had been founded by an Athenian colony, under one of the sons of Codrus. Strab. 14.—Horat. 1. ep. 11, v. 7.—Herodot. 1, c. 142.—Cic. 1, Div. 33.

Lechæum, now Pelago, a port of Corinth in the bay of Corinth. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 381.—Liv. 32, c. 23. Sir William Gell observes, "Lechæum is thirty-five minutes distant from Corinth, and consists of about six houses, magazines, and a custom-house. East of it, the remains of the port are yet visible at a place where the sea runs up a channel into the fields. Near it are the remains of a modern Venetian fort."

Lectum, a promontory, now Cape Baba, separating Troas from Æolia. This constituting the northern limit of Phrygia Minor under the Roman government, formed consequently the farthest northern point of Asia, properly so called by the Romans. Liv. 37, c. 37.

Ledus, now Lez, a river of Gaul near the modern Montpelier. Mela, 2, c. 5.

Lelèges, (α λεγω, to gather,) a wandering people, composed of different unconnected nations inhabiting the Troad at the time of the Trojan war, and driven towards Caria on the termination of that contest and the destruction of Troy. Such is one account of this obscure and very ancient race. We are at liberty, however, from the very weak authority on which this notion rests, and from the vagueness of the account, to inquire further into the origin of this people, and we shall find them settling, in the earliest ages of European population, the Peloponnesus, Acarnania, Ætolia, Locris, and Bœotia. Though we do not deny the early mixture of the Carians and Leleges, it seems probable that the early residence of the latter, if the temporary occupation of a place by so migratory a people can be called a residence, was in the western continent, and probably in Thrace or Macedonia. Their appearance, nevertheless in the southern peninsula, must have been before the period of authentic history, because Lelegia, (the earliest name of Laconia, according to the traditions relied on by Pausanias) came from them, or from Lelex their prince, who flourished at an era purely mythological. The same geographer believed them to have had their first seats in this part of the Peloponnesus; an opinion which cannot stand, because it is opposed by reason and analogy, but which manifestly proves the early settlement of the Leleges in those regions. When from this place and from the other parts of Greece, they passed over to the islands, in the sea that separated the coasts of Europe and Asia, they assumed the name of Carians, if Herodotus may be relied on;

but it is certainly more consonant with probability, that this occurred upon their emigration from the islands to the eastern shore. We may still further observe, that it is not always possible to distinguish the Leleges from the other primitive tribes of Greece, who were frequently blended in part, and who were still more frequently confused by the ignorance of historians and the obscurity of the period to which they belonged. Strab. 7 and 8.—*Homer. Lelegeis, a name applied to Miletus, because once possessed by the Leleges. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Lemanis, a place in Britain, where Cæsar is supposed to have first landed, and therefore placed by some at Limne in Kent.

Lemannus, a lake in the country of the Allobroges, through which the Rhone flows by Geneva. It is now called the lake of Geneva or Lausanne. Lucan. 1, v. 396.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

Lemnos, an island in the northern part of the Ægean Sea, south-east of the promontory of Athos 87 miles, towards the islands of Imbros and Tenedos, and the coast of Asia minor. It was sacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when thrown from heaven by Jupiter. (Vid. Vulcanus.) It was celebrated for two horrible massacres, that of the Lemnian women murdering their husbands (Vid. Hipsipyle.) and that of the Lemnians, or Pelasgi, in killing all the children they had had by some Athenian women, whom they had carried away to become their wives. These two acts of cruelty have given rise to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The first inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelasgi, or rather the Thracians, who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whose descendants were at last expelled by the Pelasgi about 1100 years before the Christian era. It is famous for a certain kind of earth or chalk, called terra Lemnia and terra sigillata; and for a labyrinth, which, according to some traditions, surpassed those of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were still visible in the age of Pliny. The island of Lemnos, now called Stalimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 454.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 593.—C. Nep. in Milt.—Strab. 1, 2 and 7.—Herodot. 6, c. 140.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollon. 1, arg.— Flacc. 2, v. 78.—Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 672.—Stat. 3, Theb. 274. The principal cities were Hephaistia and Myrina. The latter stood upon the point or cape that looked towards mount Athos, whose shadow, it was said, was seen in the market-place of this city at a particular season Hephaistia may be supposed from its name to have been peculiarly dedicated to the worship of Vulcan, the tutelar deity of the island; but its wars with the soldiers of Mahomet, and its resistance under the conduct of the daughter of its Venetian governor, have rendered its modern fame superior to any that it derives from antiquity. It was well provided with bays and creeks, which in some measure atoned for the want of rivers, and the soil was for the most part fruitful and productive. There still remains one harbour, sufficient for the diminished trade of the island, which now, in a circumference of upwards of 100 miles, contains but a population of about 8000 souls. The remains of an extinct volcano have been discovered here, and the eruptions, which are supposed to have overwhelmed a part of the country, may account for the fable by which the god of fire is represented to have dwelt in this island.

Lemovices, a people of Gallia Celtica, in that part which was afterwards attached to Aquitania. Their capital was Angusturitum, Limoges, though Ptolemy makes it Ratiastum. The province of Limousin, or that region which forms the department de la Haute Vienne, corresponds to their territory, about the sources of the Vienne. The Lemovices are again mentioned by Cæsar in the same passage as that in which they are assigned to the position given above; in the second instance they would seem to belong to Armorica, but it is possible that the text is here corrupt. Cæs. Bell. Gal. 7, 75.

Leocorion. Vid. Athenæ.

Leontium, and Leontini, I. a town of Sicily, about five miles distant from the sea-shore. It was built by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa, and was, according to some accounts, once the habitation of the Læstrigones; for which reason the neighbouring fields are often called Læstrigonii campi. The country was extremely fruitful, whence Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. The wine which it produced was the best of the island. The people of Leontium implored the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, B. C. 427, and the eloquence of Gorgias, the Leontine rhetorician, was chosen as the persuasive intercessor with the republicans of Greece. The result of this embassy, and of the war which ensued on the adoption of the quarrels of the Leontines by Athens, are well known in the appointment of Alcibiades and others to take command of the Athenian forces, his recall, the defeat of the other generals, the destruction of the Greeks in Sicily, and shortly afterwards in the disastrous subversion of the Athenian democracy. The modern Lentini corresponds to the ancient Leontium. ——II. A town of the same name in Achaia, one of the twelve original cities of that division of the Peloponneseus. It was near mount Scollis, and is mentioned by Polybius. Thucyd. 6.—Polyb. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 467.—Ital. 14, v. 126.—Cic. in Verr. 5.

Lepontii. "The Lepontii inhabited the high Alps, whence flow the Rhine, the Rhone, and the Tesin; and the name of Leventina, which distinguishes among many valleys that through which the Tesin runs, is formed of the name of this nation, who on the other side extended in the Pennine valley, where they possessed Oscela, now Domo d' Osula. D'Anville. Communicating their name to the mountains among which they dwelt, and which separated Italy from Helvetia, they were surrounded by the innumerable Alpine tribes of Rhœtia, Helvetia, and Gallia Cisalpina.

Leptis, I. the name of a large city of the Tripolitana in Africa. It was situated near the Syrtis Major, a little to the west, and the ruins that now bear the name of Lebida indicate the site of this ancient place. Leptis Magna was the principal of the three cities from which that part of the African coast on which it stood has been denominated Tripolis.——II. Another, now Lemta, west of the Syrtis Minor, in the fertile country of Byzacium, and of course beyond the Tripolitana. Though a place of much importance, it was called Minor to distinguish it from the former. This Leptis stood about eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum. It paid every day a talent to the republic of Carthage, by way of tribute. Lucan. 2, v. 251.—Plin. 5, c. 19.—Sallust. in Jug. 77.—Mela, 1, c. 8.—Strab. 3, v. 256.—*Cæs. Lerina, or Planasia, a small island in the Mediterranean, now Leria, on the coast of Gaul, at the east of the Rhone. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.

Lerna, a country of Argolis, celebrated for a grove and a lake, where, according to the poets, the Danaides threw the heads of their murdered husbands. It was there also that Hercules killed the famous hydra. The fountain Amymone, the Halcyonian pool, the torrent Chimarrus, and the river Erasinus, famous in themselves, contributed to form this still more celebrated pool or marsh. A modern traveller relates, that, overgrown with grass and reeds, an incurious passenger might not observe this famed and ancient lake, which still retains in the minds of the surrounding inhabitants its former properties and peculiarities. Its small channel affording, as it discharges itself by a little stream into the Argolic gulf, abundance of water for a few mills that are seated on its banks, the surrounding people are for the most part millers; they inform the inquirer that the pool is bottomless, and no doubt the tradition to that effect has come down to them uninterrupted since the fabulous exploit of Hercules beside its bank. *Virg. Lero, the same as Lerina.

Lesbos, one of the largest islands in the Ægean Sea, and the seventh in the Mediterranean, distant from the coast of Æolia a few miles, and itself in circumference about 168. The island, to which a mythological origin, serving only to show its antiquity, is assigned by ancient authorities, seems to have received its name in the obscurest ages. Long before the Trojan war, according to their account, the Pelasgi migrated to this place; and the story of the Ionic settlement of Macareus and his family is still sufficiently remote from that first landmark of classical history to become doubtful, even without the embellishments which would make it so if otherwise entitled to credit. The later population seemed, however, descended from the Æolians, who, at a later period, and probably within the historic ages, or very nearly so, passed over to this inviting spot. "The happy temperature of the climate of Lesbos conspired with the rich fertility of the soil to produce those delicious fruits, and those exquisite wines, which are still acknowledged by modern travellers to deserve the encomiums so liberally bestowed on them by ancient writers. The convenience of its harbours furnished another source of wealth and advantage to this delightful island, which, as early as the age of Homer, was reckoned populous and powerful, and, like the rest of Greece at that time, governed by the moderate jurisdiction of hereditary princes. The abuse of royal power occasioned the dissolution of monarchy in Lesbos, as well as in the neighbouring isles. The rival cities of Mitylene and Methymna contended for republican pre-eminence. The former prevailed; and having reduced Methymna, as well as six cities of inferior note, began to extend its dominion beyond the narrow bounds of the island, and conquered a considerable part of Troas. The Lesbians afterwards underwent those general revolutions, to which both the islands and the continent of Asia Minor were exposed from the Lydian and Persian power. Delivered from the yoke of Persia by the successful valour of Athens and Sparta, the Lesbians, as well as all the Greek settlements around them, spurned the tyrannical authority of Sparta and Pausanias, and ranged themselves under the honourable colours of Athens, which they thenceforth continued to respect in peace and to follow in war." Gill. Hist. Greece. The name of the island is now Mytilin, from that of the principal city, which still retains its old appellation in the altered form of Mytilini. Among the other names by which Lesbos was known to the ancients, the most common were Macaria, Lasia, and Pelasgia.

Lethe, I. one of the rivers of hell, whose waters the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard, before, as the name implies, ληθη, oblivion.—— II. Lethe is a river of Africa, near the Syrtes, which runs under the ground, and some time after rises again; whence the origin of the fable of the Lethean streams of oblivion. "Divers canals derived from the Nile, separating Memphis from the ancient sepulchres and pyramids, furnished the Greeks with the idea of their infernal rivers Acheron, Cocytus, and Lethe." ——III. There is also a river of that name in Spain.——IV. Another in Bœotia, whose waters were drunk by those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6, v. 714.—Ital. 1, v. 235, l. 10, v. 555.—Paus. 9, c, 39.—Horat. 3, od. 7, v. 27.

Leuca, a town of Messapia, almost upon the point of the Iapygian promontory. Some vestiges of the ancient place and name are extant in that of a church, which bears the title of Santa Maria di Leuca. The name of this whole region, according to Strabo, was derived from a gigantic race of men called Leucterni, who once inhabited it, having escaped from the fight upon the Phægrean plains. It was afterwards included in the country of the Salentini, though the Leuterni may (without recourse to fable) be supposed at one time to have dwelt thereabout, and to have caused that region to be called Leuteria.

Leucas, or Leucadia, an island of the Ionian Sea, on the coast of Acarnania. It once formed "part of the continent, but was afterwards separated from the mainland by a narrow cut, and became, as it now is, an island, known by the name of Santa Maura. In Homer's time it was still joined to the mainland, since he calls it Ἀκτὴν Ἠπείροιο, in opposition to Ithaca and Cephallenia. Scylax also affirms, 'that it had been connected formerly with the continent of Acarnania. It was first called Epileucadii, and extends towards the Leucadian promontory. The Acarnanians being in a state of faction, received a thousand colonists from Corinth. The Acarnanians were urgent with Demosthenes to undertake the siege of Leucas, which had always been hostile to them, but that officer, having other designs in view, did not accede to their request. It appears, however, that many years after, they became masters of the place, though at what precise period is not mentioned, I believe, by any ancient writer. We learn from Livy that it was considered as the principal town of Acarnania, and that the general assembly of the nation was usually convened there at the time of the Macedonian war. It was then besieged by the Romans under L. Quintius Flamininus, and defended by the Acarnanians with great intrepidity and perseverance; but at length through the treachery of some Italian exiles, the enemy was admitted into the town, and the place taken by storm, an event which was followed by the subjugation of all Acarnania. After the conquest of Macedonia, Leucas was by a special decree separated from the Acarnanian confederacy. The same historian describes the town of 'Leucas as situated on the narrow strait which divides the island from Acarnania, and is not more than 120 steps wide. It rests on a hill, looking towards Acarnania and the east. The lower parts of the city are flat, and close to the shore; hence it is easily assailed by land and sea.' Thucydides likewise states that the town was situated within the Isthmus, as also Strabo, who adds, that the Corinthians removed it to its present situation from Nericum. Dr. Holland speaks of the ruins of an 'ancient city about two miles to the south of the modern town. The spot exhibits the remains of massive walls of the old Greek structure, ascending and surrounding the summit of a narrow ridge of hill near the sea; and of numerous sepulchres, which appear among the vineyards that cover its declivity.' As the passage through the Dioryctus was somewhat intricate on account of the shallows, we learn that these were marked out by stakes fixed in the sea at certain intervals. In a small island between the Dioryctus and Leucas was an ancient temple consecrated to Venus. Some other passages relative to Leucas will be found in Polybius. Aristotle in his Politics speaks of a law in force there by which landed proprietors were forbidden to part with their estates, except in cases of great necessity; he adds, that the abolition of this law proved a very popular measure. Nericum was probably the oldest town in the Leucadian peninsula, as we learn from Homer that it existed before the siege of Troy. It was taken by Laertes, father of Ulysses, at the head of his Cephallenians.

Οἵης Νήριτον εἶλον, ἐύκτιμενον πτολίεθρον
Ἀκτὴν Ἠπείροιο, Κεφαλλῆνεσσιν ἀνάσσων—
Od. Ω. 376.

Strabo, as I have already noticed, reports that the Corinthians removed their town to the Isthmus; but Nericum seems still to have subsisted after this, as Thucydides relates that the Athonians landed some forces here in the Peloponnesian war, which were, however, defeated by the inhabitants, and compelled to retire. It was probably situated in a bay not far from the Leucadian promontory, where, according to modern maps, there are some vestiges of an ancient town. Thucydides mentions also a port called Ellomenus, which is considered to be Porto Vlico, a few miles south of Santa Maura. The Leucadian promontory, so celebrated in antiquity for the lover's leap, is said by Strabo to have derived its name from the colour of the rock. On its summit was a temple of Apollo; and every year on the festival of the god, it was customary to hurl from the cliff some condemned criminal, as an expiatory victim. Feathers, and even birds were fastened to each side of his person, in order to break his fall; a number of boatmen were also stationed below ready to receive him in their skiffs, and if they succeeded in saving him, he was conveyed out of the Leucadian territory. Sappho is said to have been the first to try the remedy of the leap, when enamoured of Phaon. Artemisia, queen of Caria, so celebrated by Herodotus, perished, according to some accounts, in this fatal trial. Virgil represents this cape as dangerous to mariners."—Cram.

Leuce, a small island in the Euxine Sea, of a triangular form, between the mouths of the Danube and the Borysthenes. According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has often been called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 32.—Q. Calab. 3, v. 773. It was probably a portion of the Dromos Achilles, which the reader may see under its proper name.

Leuci, a people of Belgic Gaul. They dwelt in that part which lay upon the borders of the provinces called afterwards Champagne and Lorraine, the present departments de la Meuse and de la Meurthe. Upon their north were the Mediomatrices, the mountains Vosges covered them upon the east, on the south were the Lingones, and on the west the Tricasses and Catelauni. They were among those Gallic people, who, with the name of friends of the Romans, were permitted to enjoy a moderate and precarious liberty at the discretion of their too powerful protectors. Among their towns were Tullum, Toul, and Nasium; of the latter the site is not known with equal certainty.

Mountains on the west of Crete appear at a distance like white clouds, whence the name.

Leucopĕtra, I. a place on the isthmus of Corinth, where the Achæans were defeated by the consul Mummius.——II. A promontory six miles east from Rhegium in Italy, where the Appenines terminate and sink into the sea.

Leucŏphrys, a temple of Diana, with a city of the same name, near the Mæander. The goddess was represented under the figure of a woman with many breasts, and crowned with victory.——An ancient name of Tenedos. Paus. 10, c. 14.—Strab. 13 and 14.

Leucos, a river of Macedonia near Pydna.

Leucosia, a little island towards the southern limit of the Pæstanus Sinus, north of the Posidium promontorium. It was said "to derive its name from one of the Sirens, as we learn from Lycophron and from Strabo. Dionysius calls it Leucasia. It is now known by the name of Licosa, and sometimes by that of Isola piana. It was once probably inhabited, as several vestiges of buildings were discovered there in 1696." Cram.

Leucosyri, a name applied to the inhabitants of Cappadocia on the borders of Pontus, and to those of Pontus on the borders of Cappadocia. These people were supposed to be of Syrian origin, and the superior fairness of their complexions caused the epithet of Leuco (white) to be prefixed to the name of Syri, by which they were designated in common with others of that race. The term Leuco Syri was not the less applied to the people dwelling in these regions after the whole country had become thickly interspersed with colonies and settlements from Greece.

Leucothoe, or Leucothea, an island in the Tyrrhene Sea, near Capreæ.——A fountain of Samos.——A town of Egypt.——of Arabia. Mela, 2, c. 7.——A part of Asia which produces frankincense.

Leuctra, a village of Bœotia, between Platæa and Thespiæ, belonging to the territory of the latter. It is famous for the victory which Epaminondas, the Theban general, obtained over the superior force of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, on the 8th of July, B. C. 371. In this famous battle 4000 Spartans were killed, with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans lost the empire of Greece. The place retains its ancient name, though the modern Greek pronunciation in some measure obscures it to the English ear and eye when written according to the present mode of pronouncing it. *Plut. in Pelop. & Ages.—C. Leuctrum, a town of Messenia, on the eastern side of the Messenian gulf. The antiquity of this town ascended to the ages of fable, and the inhabitants boasted that their founder had given his name to southern Greece or the Peloponnesus. Thucydides call this place Leuctra. Strab. 8.

Leucyanias, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing into the Alpheus. Paus. 6, c. 21.

Libanus, a chain of mountains extending parallel with the coast from north to south, between Phœnicia and Syria. Towards Tyre this range of hills inclines to the coast in double ridges; the more southern of which assumes the name of Anti-Libanus. Between these, the valley is called Cœlo Syria, and the river Leontos, now Lante, runs in the line of these mountains through the whole length of the valley till it falls into the Mediterranean at Tyre. The southern extremity of this chain, or the Anti-Libanus, reaches south for some distance, running into Palestine. "Next to the country of the Ansiareh, mount Libanus raises its summits to the clouds, still shaded with some cedars and beautified with thousands of rare plants. Here the Astragulus tragacanthoides displays its clusters of purple flowers. The primrose of Libanus, the mountain amaryllis, the white and the orange lily, mingle their brilliant hues with the verdure of the birch-leaved cherry. The snow of the mountain is skirted by the Xeranthemum frigidum. The deep ravines of these mountains are watered by numerous streams, which arise on all sides in great abundance. The highest of the valleys are covered with perpetual snow. Arvieux and Pococke found the snow lying here in the month of June; Rauwolf and Kort in August. But it does not appear that any of the exposed peaks are covered with snow. The coolness, the humidity, and the good quality of the soil, maintain a perpetual verdure. These bounties of nature are protected by the spirit of liberty. It is to an industry less harassed by predatory encroachments than that of the other districts of Syria, that the hills of Lebanon owe those fine terraces in long succession, which preserve the fertile earth; those well planted vineyards; those fields of wheat, reared by the industrious hand of the husbandman; those plantations of cotton, of olives, and of mulberries, which present themselves every where in the midst of the rocky steeps, and give a pleasing example of the effects of human activity. The clusters of grapes are enormous, and the grapes themselves as large as cherries. Goats, squirrels, partridges, and turtle-doves are the most numerous animal species. All of them become a frequent prey to the pouncings of the eagle and the prowlings of the panther. This last is the animal which is here called the tiger. These retreats, secured from warlike invasion, but unfortunately accessible to the intrigues of Turkish pashas, are inhabited by two races, different in religion and in manners, but similar in their love of independence, the Maronites and the Druses." Malte-Brun.

Libethra, "a city, the name of which is associated with Orpheus, the Muses, and all that is poetical in Greece. 'Libethra,' says Pausanias, 'was situated on mount Olympus, on the side of Macedonia; at no great distance from it stood the tomb of Orpheus, respecting which an oracle had declared, that when the sun beheld the bones of the poet the city should be destroyed by a boar (ὑπὸ συὸς.) The inhabitants of Libethra ridiculed the prophecy as a thing impossible; but the column of Orpheus's monument having been accidentally broken, a gasp was made by which light broke in upon the tomb, when the same night the torrent named Sus being prodigiously swollen, rushed down with violence from mount Olympus upon Libethra, overflowing the walls and all the public and private edifices, and destroying every living creature in its furious course. After this calamity, the remains of Orpheus were removed to Dium; and Dr. Clarke observed near Katerina a remarkable tumulus, which he conceives to have been the tomb of Orpheus. This tumulus is of immense magnitude, of a perfectly conical form, and upon its vertex grow trees of great size. Pausanias says the tomb of Orpheus was twenty stadia from Dium. Whether Libethra recovered from the devastation occasioned by this inundation is not stated, but its name occurs in Livy, as a town in the vicinity of Dium before the battle of Pydna. After describing the perilous march of the Roman army under Q. Marcius through a pass in the chain of Olympus, he says, they reached, on the fourth day, the plains between Libethrum and Heracleum. Strabo also alludes to Libethra when speaking of mount Helicon, and remarks, that several places around that mountain attested the former existence of the Thracians of Pieria in the Bœotian districts. From these passages it would seem that the name of Libethrus was given to the summit of Olympus, which stood above the town. Hence the Muses were surnamed Libethrides as well as Pierides." Cram. —Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 21.—Plin. 4, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9 and 10.

Libophœnices, the inhabitants of the country near Carthage.

Liburnia, an Illyrian province of the Roman empire, lying between the river Arsia, which separated it from Histria, the Albius mons which lay towards the side of Illyricum, the Titius which flowed between it and Dalmatia, and the Adriatic Sea which lay along its coast in bays which were formed by the innumerable islands called Liburnides and Absyrtides, that studded its bosom. Two people, the Japydes and Liburni, occupied this tract of country; the former dwelling in the more northern parts in the mountains and upon the coast around their capitals Senia and Metullum in the modern Morlachia: and the latter towards the borders of Dalmatia. "The Liburni appear to have been a maritime people from the earliest times, as they communicated their name to the vessels called Liburnine by the Romans. And the Greeks, who colonized Corcyra, are said, on their arrival in that island, to have found it in their possession. Scylax seems to distinguish the Liburni from the Illyrians, restricting probably the latter appellation to that part of the nation which was situated more to the south, and was better known to the Greeks. The same writer alludes to the sovereignty of the Liburni, as not excluding females; a fact which appears to have some reference to the history of Teuta, and might serve to prove that this geographical compilation is not so ancient as many have supposed. Strabo states that the Liburni extended along the coast for upwards of one thousand five hundred stadia. To them belonged Iadera, a city of some note, and a Roman colony, the ruins of which are still to be seen near the modern town of Zara, on the spot called Zara Vecchia. Beyond is the mouth of the river Kerka, perhaps the same as the Catarbates of Scylax and the Titius of Ptolemy. Strabo, who does not mention its name, says it it is navigable for small vessels up to Scardona. This town appears to have been the capital of the Liburni since Pliny says the national council met here. The present town retains its name, and is situated on a lake formed by the Kerka, a few miles above its entrance into the sea. Under the Romans this river served as the boundary between Liburnia and Dalmatia." Cram. Gr. There were at Rome a number of men whom the magistrates employed as public heralds, who were called Liburni, probably from being originally of Liburnian extraction.

Liburnides. A great number of islands, amounting to upwards of 40 of the larger kind, on the coast of Liburnia, were called among the Greeks Liburnides. Some of them were comparatively large, and have been famous in history, as Pharos, Scardona, and Issa. They were also called the Dalmatian islands.

Liburnum mare, the sea which borders on the coasts of Liburnia.

Liburnus, a mountain of Campania.

Libya, I. In its widest sense the name of Libya was used to signify the whole of Africa. There was, however, a particular district to which this name belonged geographically, while it was rather poetically used in the manner mentioned above. This proper Libya lay upon the coast of the Mare Internum, from Egypt to the greater Syrtis, comprising the countries of Marmarica and Cyrenaica, and extending inland indefinitely.——II. Deserta, or Libya Interior, was that part of Africa which lies between the Niger and the inhabited part of the coast on the Mediterranean, corresponding in a great measure to the desert of Sahara, which modern travellers have so frequently partially described. From the word Libya are derived the epithets of Libys, Libyssa, Libysis, Libystis, Libycus, Libysticus, Libysinus, Libystæus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 106, l. 5, v. 37.—Lucan. 4.—Sallust. &c.

Libycum mare, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Cyrene. Strab. 2.

Libyssa, now Gebisse, a town of Bithynia, in which was the tomb of Hannibal. It was situated near the shores of the Propontis, or rather the Astacenus Sinus, west of Nicomedia.

Lichades, small islands near Cæneum, a promontory of Eubœa, called from Lichas. Vid. Lichas. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 155, 218.—Strab. 9.

Liger, or Ligeris, now La Loire, a large river of Gaul falling into the ocean near Nantes. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 18.—Cæs. G. 7, c. 55 and 75. Vid. Aquitania and Celtica.

Ligures, the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. Liguria.

Liguria, a country at the west of Italy, bounded on the east by the river Macra, on the south by part of the Mediterranean, called the Ligustic Sea; on the west by the Varus, and on the north by the Po. The commercial town of Genoa was anciently and is now the capital of the country. The origin of the inhabitants is not known, though in their character they are represented as vain, unpolished, and addicted to falsehood. According to some they were descended from the ancient Gauls or Germans, or, as others support, they were of Greek origin, perhaps the posterity of the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus. Liguria was subdued by the Romans, and its chief harbour now bears the name of Leghorn. Lucan. 1, v. 442.—Mela, 2, c. 1.—Strab. 4, &c.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 2, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 5, c. 35, l. 22, c. 33, l. 29, c. 6, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann.—Flor. 2, c. 8. The Ligures were a more unmixed population than almost any other of the Italians, and may be considered as having descended from the first northern inhabitants of Italy.

Ligusticæ Alpes. Vid. Alpes.

Ligusticum mare, the north part of the Tyrrhene Sea, now the Gulf of Genoa. Plin. 2, c. 47.

Ligyes, a people of Asia, who inhabited the country between Caucasus and the river Phasis. Some suppose them to be a colony of the Ligyes of Europe, more commonly called Ligures. Herodot. 7, c. 72.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 10.—Strab. 4.—Diod. 4.

Lilybæum, I. a promontory of the island of Sicily, extending into the sea, and forming the nearest point towards Africa Propria from Europe. The promontory is now Boeo.——II. A town of the same name, now Marsalla, stood on this projection, and is noted both as a principal possession of the Carthaginians, and for its resistance to the Romans during the Punic wars. It had a port large and capacious, which the Romans, in the wars with Carthage, endeavoured in vain to stop and fill up with stones, on account of its convenience and vicinity to the coast of Africa. Nothing now remains of this once powerful city but the ruins of temples and aqueducts. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 706.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Cic. in Verr. 5.—Cæs. de Bell. Afric.—Diod. 22.

Limnæ, I. a fortified place on the borders of Laconia and Messenia. Paus. 3, c. 14.——II. A town of the Thracian Chersonesus.

Limnæa, I. a lake in the interior of Acarnania, about six miles in length, now called lake Nizero.——II. A district of country, called also Limnæa, surrounded this piece of water, which likewise gave name to its principal town. This small state or region extended to the Ambracian gulf, on which it had its port, now called, as well as the bay on which it stands, Lutraki. Xen. Hell. 4, 6.

Limnæum, a temple of Diana at Limnæ, from which the goddess was called Limnæa, and worshipped under that appellation at Sparta and in Achaia. The Spartans wished to seize the temple in the age of Tiberius, but the emperor interfered, and gave it to its lawful possessors, the Messenians. Paus. 3, c. 14, l. 7, c. 20.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 43.

Limonum, a town of Gaul, afterwards Pictavi, Poictiers. Cæs. G. 8, c. 26.

Lindum, a colony of Britain, now Lincoln. This city belonged to the Coritani, who were extended widely over several counties in that part of Britain.

Lindus, now Lindo, a city at the south-east part of Rhodes, built by Cercaphus, son of Sol and Cydippe. The Danaides built there a temple to Minerva, and one of its colonies founded Gela in Sicily. It gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finishing the famous Colossus of Rhodes. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7. Plin. 34.—Herodot. 7, c. 153.

Lingŏnes, a people of Celtic Gaul, on the borders of Belgica, to which they are said at an early period to have belonged. Their country, when residing in Lugdunensis Prima, in the former province, was about the springs of the Mosa, the Sequana, and the Matrona, corresponding to the department de la Haute Marne, a part of the province of Champagne. Their capital, once Andomatunum, assumed their name, with which, under the modification of Langres, it has reached the present time. The Lingones passed into Italy, where they made some settlement near the Alps, at the head of the Adriatic. Tacit. H. 4, c. 55.—Martial. 11, ep. 57, v. 9, l. 14, ep. 159.—Lucan. 1, v. 398.—Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 26.

Lipăra, I. the largest of the Æolian islands on the coast of Sicily, now called from this one, Lipari. It had a city of the same name, which, according to Diodorus, it received from Liparus, the son of Auson, king of these islands, whose daughter Cyane was married by his successor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this island were powerful by sea, and from the great tributes which they paid to Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, they may be called very opulent. The island was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raisins are still in general repute. It had some convenient harbours, and a fountain whose waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. Liv. 5, c. 28.—Plin. 3, c. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 57.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, l. 8, v. 417. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.——II. A town of Etruria.

Liquentia, now Livenza, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Adriatic Sea. Plin. 3, c. 18.

Liris, now Garigliano, a river of Campania, which it separates from Latium. It rose among the Appenines, and flowing through a part of Latium, and between that country and Campania with a sluggish course, discharged itself into the Tyrrhene Sea among the marshes of Minturnæ. This river was more anciently called the Clanis, according to Strabo.

Lissus, I. a town of Illyria, near the mouth of the Drilo, on the borders of Macedonia. It was colonized by the Syracusans, from whom it was taken by the Illyrians. From these it was wrested for a time by Philip of Macedon. Pliny styles it Oppidum civium Romanorum. The modern Alessio corresponds to the site of Acrolissus, the citadel of Lissus. Polyb. 8, 15.——II. A river of Thrace, falling into the Ægean Sea between Thasos and Samothracia. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes when he invaded Greece. Strab. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Lista, a town of the Sabines, whose inhabitants are called Listini. This town was taken by the Sabines from the Aborigines, whose capital it was supposed to have been.

Litana, a wood in Cisalpine Gaul, extending at the foot of the Appenines, from the sources of the Parma and the Nicia to those of the Secia, occupying a part of the modern duchies of Parma and Modena. Here the Roman army was beaten by the Gauls. Liv. 23, c. 24.

Liternum, a town of Campania. "Its situation has been disputed; but antiquaries seem now agreed in fixing the site of the town at a place called Torre di Patria. The difficulty arose chiefly from the mention of a river of the same name by some of the ancient writers. This stream is apt to stagnate near its entrance into the sea, and to form marshes anciently known as the Palus Literna, now Lago di Patria. Liternum became a Roman colony in the same year with Vulturnum. It was recolonized under Augustus, and ranked among the præfecturæ. That Scipio retired here in disgust at the injustice of his countrymen, seems a fact too well attested to be called in question; but whether he really closed his existence there, as far as we can collect from Livy's account, may be deemed uncertain: his tomb and statue were to be seen both at Liternum and in the family vault of the Scipios, which was discovered some years ago outside the Porta Capena. According to Valerius Maximus, Scipio himself had caused to be engraved on it this inscription: which would be decisive of the question. It is not improbable that the little hamlet of Patria, which is supposed to stand on the site of Scipio's villa, is indebted for its name to this circumstance. Pliny asserts, that there were to be seen in his day, near Liternum, some olive-trees and myrtles, said to have been planted by the illustrious exile." Cram.

Lixus, a river of Mauretania, with a city of the same name. Antæus had a palace there, and according to some accounts it was in the neighbourhood that Hercules conquered him. Ital. 3, v. 258.—Mela, 3, c. 10.—Strab. 2.

Locri, I. a town of Magna Græcia in Italy, on the Adriatic, not far from Rhegium. It was founded by a Grecian colony about 757 years before the Christian era, as some suppose. The inhabitants were called Locri or Locrenses. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 399.—Strab.—Plin.—Liv. 22, c. 6, l. 23, c. 30.—II. A town of Locris in Greece.

Locris. "The Greeks comprehended under the name of Locrians three tribes of the same people, which, though distinct from each other in territory as well as in nominal designation, doubtless were derived from a common stock. These were the Locri Ozolæ, the Epicnemidii, and Opuntii. A colony of the latter, who at an early period had settled on the shores of Magna Græcia, were distinguished by the name of Epizephyrii, or Western Locri. The Epicnemidian and Opuntian Locri alone appear to have been known to Homer, as he makes no mention of the Ozolæ; whence we might conclude that they were not so ancient as the rest of the nation. The earliest and most authentic accounts concur in ascribing the origin of this people to the Leleges. The Locri Ozolæ occupied a narrow tract of country, situated on the northern shore of the Corinthian gulf, commencing at the Ætolian Rhium, and terminating near Crissa, the first town of Phocis, on the bay to which it gave its name. To the west and north they adjoined the Ætolians, and partly also, in the latter direction, the Dorians, while to the east they bordered on the district of Delphi belonging to Phocis. They are said to have been a colony from the more celebrated Locrians of the east, and their name, according to fabulous accounts, was derived from some fetid springs near the hill of Taphius, or Taphiassus, situated on their coast, and beneath which it was reported the centaur Nessus had been entombed. Thucydides represents them as a wild uncivilized race, and addicted from the earliest period to theft and rapine. In the Peloponnesian war they appear to have sided with the Athenians, as the latter held possession of Naupactus, their principal town and harbour, and also probably from enmity to the Ætolians, who had espoused the cause of the Peloponnesians. The Epicnemidian Locri occupied a small district immediately adjoining Thermopylæ, and confined between mount Cnemis, a branch of Œta, whence they derived their name, and the sea of Eubœa. Homer classes them with the Opuntii under the general name of Locri. The Opuntian Locri follow after the Epicnemidii; they occupied a line of coast of about fifteen miles, beginning a little south of Cnemides, and extending to the town of Halæ, on the frontier of Bœotia. Inland their territory reached to the Phocian towns of Hyampolis and Abæ. This people derived its name from the city of Opus, their metropolis." The Locri who established themselves in Italy were of the Opuntii and Ozolæ tribes, but the period of their migration it is hardly possible to define. The name of Epizephyrii they obtained from their settlement about the Cape Zephyrium, and by this appellation they were distinguished from the Locrians of Greece. The chief city founded by them bore their name, and became famous not only as one of the most flourishing towns of Græcia Magna, but also for the institutions of Zaleucus, one of the most admired lawgivers of antiquity. For 200 years these institutions continued in force, and for all that length of time the city of Locri enjoyed the greatest prosperity and the highest character for the wisdom and virtue of its citizens. Locri early took part in the politics and resolutions of Sicily, and suffered greatly from the cruelty of Dionysius the Younger. It suffered still further from the anger of Pyrrhus, on his second invasion of Italy, and still more from the licentiousness of the Roman Q. Pleminius, who was stationed there with a garrison, to keep it in the interest of Rome during the Punic war. "The situation of ancient Locri has not been hitherto determined with accuracy, though the most judicious antiquaries and travellers agree in fixing it in the vicinity of Gerace. This modern town stands on a hill, which is probably the mons Esopis of Strabo, and where the citadel was doubtless placed; the elevated position of Locri is also to be inferred from a fragment of Pindar. But the name of Pagliapoli, which is attached to some considerable ruins below Gerace, naturally leads to the supposition that this was the site of the Epizephyrian Locri. D'Anville removed it too far to the south, when he supposed it to accord with the Motta di Bruzzano." Cram.

Londinum, the capital of Britain, founded, as some suppose, between the age of Julius Cæsar and Nero. It has been severally called Londinium, Londinum, &c. Ammianus calls it vetus- tum oppidum. It is represented as a considerable, opulent, and commercial town in the age of Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 33.—Ammian. The various modes of writing the name of this place are given by Cambden, and show a striking analogy, in the greater number, to that of Londinum. Ammianus calls it Augusta, to which the surname Trinobantum is to be added, from the people whose capital it is known to have been. Its mythological names, however, are entirely different, and refer to the fabulous origin assigned to it by the obscure writers of the darkest ages. Thus Troy Novant, or Troia Nova, in allusion to its colonization by the grandson of Æneas, the renowned Brute, and Caer Lud, from Lud, another fictitious person, who founded, or at least exalted it to the high state which it early held among the cities of Britain.

Longobardi. Vid. Langobardi.

Longŭla, a town of Latium, on the borders of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 33 and 39, l. 9, c. 39.

Lotŏphăgi, a people on the coast of Africa, near the Syrtes. They received this name from their living upon the lotus. Ulysses visited their country at his return from the Trojan war. Herodot. 4, c. 177.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 7, l. 13, c. 17.

Luca, now Lucca, a city of Etruria, on the river Arnus. Liv. 21, c. 5, l. 41, c. 13.—Cic. fam. 13.

Lūcāni, a people of Italy, descended from the Samnites or from the Brutii.

Lūcānia, a country of Italy, between the Tyrrhene and Sicilian seas. Without pretending to explain the exact limits or extent of country over which the Lucani may have spread themselves, we may define the boundaries of Lucania, as it formed a part of the Roman dominion, with considerable exactness. To the south-west, beyond the little river Laos, and to the south-east beyond the Crathis, lay the Brutiorum Ager, or country of the Brutii. On the side of Campania the Silarus bounded it from the mountains to the sea; and the Bradanus, in the same manner, from the mountains to the Tarentine Gulf, divided it from Apulia. A line from the sources of these rivers, along the highlands in which they rise, describes its limits on the side of Samnium. The country was famous for its grapes. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv, 8. c. 17, l. 9, c. 20, l. 10, c. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 178.

Lucĕria, now Lucera, a town of Apulia, in that part which was distinguished by the name of Daunia. This was a place of great antiquity; its origin was referred by the poets to the time of Diomed, who was said to have founded it. It was one of the first places over which the Romans extended their dominion in Apulia, and continued faithful to them during their wars with Carthage. Like the rest of Apulia, it was remarkable for the fineness of the wool which was there prepared.

Lucrētilis, now Libretti, a mountain in the country of the Sabines, hanging over a pleasant valley, near which the house and farm of Horace was situate. Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 1.—Cic. 7, Att. 11.

Lucrīnus, a small lake in Campania, opposite Puteoli. It abounded with excellent oysters, and was united by Augustus to the Avernus, and a communication formed with the sea near the harbour called Julius Portus. The Lucrine lake disappeared on the 30th of September, 1538, in a violent earthquake, which raised on the spot a mountain 4 miles in circumference, and about 1000 feet high, with a crater in the middle. The present state of this celebrated lake is described as follows by Eustace: "Of the Lucrine lake a small part only remains, now a muddy pool, half covered with reeds, and bulrushes. The centre, though remarkable for its depth, was in one short night changed into a conical mountain. The mountain is a vast mass of cinders, black and barren, and is called Monte Nuovo. The pool, however, diminished in its size and appearance, still retains the name and honours of the Lucrine lake." Classical Tour.—Cic. 4. Att. 10.—Strab. 5 and 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Propert. 1, el. 11, v. 10.—Virg. G. 2, v. 161.—Horat. 2, od. 15.

Luculli Horti. I. Vid. Horti.——II. Villa, one of those villas which were so numerous in the immediate neighbourhood of Misenus. That of Lucullus was the chief one, and was afterwards occupied by Tiberius. "Phædrus informs us that it was situated on the very pinnacle of the hill, as it not only commanded the adjacent coasts, but extended its view to the seas of Sicily. This villa, with its gardens and porticoes, must have occupied a considerable space, and left but little room for the town, which of course must have been situated lower down, and probably on the sea-shore." Eustace.

Lugdunensis Gallia, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. It was anciently called Celtica. Vid. Gallia.

Lugdūnum, a town of Gallia Celtica, built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar, or Saone. "It was anciently a Roman colony, (testified by many old inscriptions,) and honoured with a magnificent temple, dedicated by the cities of France to Augustus Cæsar: now the most famous mart of France, and a university. These marts, in former times, were holden at Geneva, from thence removed hither by king Lewis the 11th, for the enriching of his own kingdom. When Julio the 2d had excommunicated Lewis the 12th, he commanded, by his apostolical authority, that they should be returned to Geneva again; but therein his pleasure was never obeyed. As for the university, questionless it is very ancient, being a seat of learning in the time of Caius Caligula. For in those times, before an altar consecrated to Augustus in the temple above-named, this Caligula did institute some exercises of the Greek and Roman eloquence: the victor to be honoured according to his merit; the vanquished, either to be ferulated, or with their own tongues to blot and expunge their writings; or to be drowned in the river adjoining. Hence that of Juvenal,

Ut Lugdunensem Rhetor dicturus ad aram, applied to dangerous undertakings. In the time of the Romans' first coming into Gaul, it was the chief city of the Hedui and Sequani; afterwards the metropolis of Lugdunensis, Prima. The archbishop hereof is the metropolitan of all France, and was so in the time of St. Irenæus, one of the renowned Fathers in the primitive times, who was bishop here." Heyl. Cosm.

LUPIAS, or LUPIA, now Lippe, a town of Germany, with a small river of the same name, falling into the Rhine. Tacit. Ann. 1, &c.

LUSITANIA, a part of Hispania, answering nearly to the modern Portugal. In the time of Cæsar its limits were uncertain: he, however, tells us, that to the north were the Callaici; to the east, the Vettones; to the south, Bæturia, and the sea from the mouth of the Anas; and to the west, the ocean. Ptolemy makes it the third part of Spain, and ranks with the Lusitani, the Vettones, and part of the Celtici and Turdetani. The chief cities of Lusitania were Olisipo, Lisbon; Conimbriga, Coimbra; Pax Julia, Beja; Augusta Emerita, Merida; Norba Cæsarea, Alcantara. The Tagus divided the country into two parts; in the north was the Durius, on the south the Anas. The Lusitanians inhabited a remarkably fertile country, but neglected to avail themselves of it until they had been instructed by their Roman conquerors. Vid. Hispania. Cæs. B. C. 1, 38 and 44.—*B. LUSONES, a people of Spain, near the Iberus.

LUTETIA, a town of Belgic Gaul, at the confluence of the rivers Sequana and Matrona, which received its name, as some suppose, from the quantity of clay, lutum, which is in its neighbourhood. J. Cæsar fortified and embellished it, from which circumstance some authors call it Julii Civitas. Julian the apostate resided there some time. It is now Paris, and is the capital of France. Cæs. de Bell. G. 6 and 7. —Strab. 4.—Ammian. 20.

LYCABETAS, a mountain of Attica, near Athens. Stat.

LYCÆUS, a mountain of Arcadia, sacred to Jupiter, where a temple was built in honour of the god by Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus. It was also sacred to Pan, whose festivals, called Lycæa, were celebrated there. Pausanias affirms that the whole Peloponnesus might be seen from its summit, where are yet visible the remains of the altar of Jupiter. Virg. G. 1, v. 16. Æn. 8, v. 343.—Strab. 8.—Hor. 1, od. 17, v. 2.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 698.

LYCAONIA, a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Cappadocia, on the east by Armenia Minor, on the south by Pisidia, and on the west by the Greater Phrygia; "so called from the Lycaones, a people of Lycia, or from the inhabitants of Lycaonia, a town of Phrygia Major, who, enlarging themselves into these parts, gave this name unto it; either of which I should prefer before their conceit who derive it from Lycaon, king of Arcadia, dispossessed by Jupiter of that kingdom; or think that Lycaon was king of this country and not of that." Its chief towns were Iconium, the metropolis of it when a Roman province, and Lystra. "Nor, indeed, were the Lycaonians themselves, from whomsoever they were descended, of any great note or observation in former times: subject to Cappadocia when it was a kingdom, and reckoned a part of it in the time of Ptolemy, when first made a province of the empire. Torn from the empire by the Turks, it was at first a member of the Selzuccian kingdom, as afterwards of the Caramanian; which last, founded by Caraman, a great prince of the Turks, on the death of Aladine the 2d, the last king of the Selzuccian family, was a great eyesore to those of the house of Ottoman, from the time of Amurath the 1st, who first warred upon it, to the reign of Bajazet the 2d, who in fine subverted it, An. 1486." Heyl. Cosm.

LYCASTE, an ancient town of Crete, whose inhabitants accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war. Hom. Il. 2.

LYCHNIDUS, or LYCHNIDIUM, "a city of Illyria, the chief town of the Dassaretii, situated on the great lake of the same name. Its foundation is ascribed by a writer in the Greek Anthology to Cadmus. We hear of its being constantly in the occupation of the Romans during their war with Perseus, king of Macedon, and, from its position on the frontier, it must have always been deemed a place of importance. This was more especially the case after the construction of the great Egnatian way, which passed through it. It appears to have been still a large and populous town under the Greek emperors. Procopius relates that it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake, which overthrew Corinth and several other cities during the reign of Justinian. In the Synecdemus of Hierocles it is probable that we ought to read Αυχνιδὸς μητρόπολις for Ἀδλωνιδὸς μητρόπολις. It is the opinion of Palmerius, who has treated most fully of the history of Lychnidus in his Description of Ancient Greece, that this town was replaced by Achrida, once the capital of the Bulgarians; and, according to some writers of the Byzantine empire, also the native place of Justinian, and erected by him into an archbishopric under the name of Justiniana Prima. The opinion of this learned critic has been adopted, we believe, by the generality of writers on comparative geography. But we are induced by various considerations to dissent from the commonly received notion on this point. We may observe, in the first place, that none of the historians quoted by Palmerius assert that Achrida was built on the site of Lychnidus. Nicephorus Callistus states that Achrida was placed on a lofty hill, very near a great lake called Lychnidus, and more anciently Dassarite; but there is no reference to the town of that name. Had Lychnidus been replaced by the new town of Justinian, or the Achrida of the Bulgarians, the fact would certainly have been distinctly mentioned, since it was a celebrated city, and still existing in the reign of Justinian, as Wesseling, we think, has satisfactorily proved. But even granting to Palmerius that Justiniana Prima and Achrida are the same town, he has not at all shown that they are to be identified with Lychnidus. The improbability of this supposition will, we think, be evident from a comparison of the Roman Itineraries, which describe the Via Egnatia, on which Lychnidus was placed, with the best modern maps of the Turkish dominions in Europe. Now all the Itineraries agree in fixing Lychnidus at a distance of twenty-seven or twenty-eight miles from the station in the Candavian mountains, a well-known ridge which separated the valley of the Germans from the lake of Lychnidus; while Achrida, as it is now called, stands at the northern extremity of the lake, and not more than twelve miles from the foot of the chain above

The Lycus, indeed, may perhaps be considered the principal stream.——IV. One of the small streams which constitute the head waters of the Euphrates. It belongs to Armenia, and is one of the two rivers or rivulets, which unite beneath the walls of Erzroom, to form the smaller branch of Euphrates before its junction with the Murad or other branch, which, coming from the east, was considered by Xenophon to be the proper Euphrates.——V. The Zabus was called Lycus by the Greeks, and was a tributary of the Tigris. It was an Assyrian river, and rose in the region called Corduene, a part of Curdistan. Its course is extremely sinuous, flowing first north-west, then west, then inclining towards the south-west, and lastly almost south, till it falls into the Tigris.

Lydia. The limits of this province and kingdom of Asia Minor must be differently given in reference to different eras. Lydia proper was bounded north by Mysia, east by Phrygia, south by Caria, and west by the waters of the Ægean. Such were the limits of Lydia after the kings of Sardis, its capital, had extended their authority over the Mæones, who occupied the region north of that celebrated city. The Lydii and Mæones are not to be considered different people united into one nation, but as the same, assuming different names from a change of circumstances at different eras. The Ionians, however, were a different race; who, coming from Europe, established themselves in the islands and on the coast, to which they imparted the name of Ionia. Under the empire of Crœsus, Lydia included Mæonia and Ionis, extending westward to the Halys, the limit of his empire. This, however, was a political and not a geographical distribution of the peninsula. As Sardis was the capital of Lydia proper, so we may look upon Ephesus as that of Ionia; though indeed the nature of the Ionic confederacy hardly allows the application of such a term even to its principal city. It was governed by monarchs, who after the fabulous ages reigned for 249 years in the following order: Ardysus began to reign 797 B. C.; Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 735; Gyges, 718; Ardysus 2d, 680; Sadyattes, 631; Alyattes 2d, 619; and Crœsus, 562, who was conquered by Cyrus, B. C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Persian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heraclidæ, and Mermnadæ. The history of the first is obscure and fabulous; the Heraclidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 505 years, and was always transmitted from father to son. Candaules was the last of the Heraclidæ; and Gyges the first, and Crœsus the last of the Mermnadæ. All the distinctions of territory in the peninsula may be considered as changed or abrogated while the empire of the Persian kings extended over it; at least they bore no analogy to those of the earlier times. Under the Romans again, new changes and new divisions were introduced. At one time with Mysia, Phrygia, and Lycaonia, Lydia formed the kingdom of Pergamus: converted afterwards into a prætorian province, it was given, with Mysia, Phrygia, and Caria, into the hands of a prefect. Under Constantine, who divided his empire into diocesses, Lydia fell with Caria, Lycia, the islands Pamphylia, Pisidia, &c. into the diocess called that of Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. The Lydians were an enterprising people; and it has never yet been disproved that Hetruria owed her early population and civilization to a Lydian colony. Vid. Hetruria. They were no less remarkable, however, for their luxury and effeminacy after their empire had become somewhat extended. Sipylus and Tmolus were the principal mountains, and the Hermus, the Pactolus, the Caystrus, and the Mæander, the principal rivers of Lydia.

Lyncestæ. Vid. Lyncus.

Lyncus, "was situated east of the Dassaretii of Illyria, from whose territory it was parted by the chain of mount Bernas, or Bora; while on the north it adjoined Pelagonia and Deuriopus, districts of Pæonia. It was watered by the Erigonus and its tributary streams, and was traversed by the great Egnatian way. The Lyncestæ were at first an independent people, governed by their own princes, who were said to be descended from the illustrious family of the Bacchiadæ at Corinth. Arrhibæus, one of these, occupied the throne when Brasidas undertook his expedition into Thrace. At the solicitation of Perdiccas, who was anxious to add the territory of Arrhibæus to his dominions, Brasidas, in conjunction with a Macedonian force, invaded Lyncus, but was soon compelled to retire by the arrival of a large body of Illyrians, who joined the troops of the Lyncestian prince, and had some difficulty in securing his retreat. Strabo informs us, that Irrha, the daughter of Arrhabæus, (as he writes the name,) was mother of Eurydice, who married Amyntas, the father of Philip. By this marriage it is probable that the principality of Lyncus became annexed to the crown of Macedon." Cram.

Lyrnessus, a city of Cilicia, the native country of Briseis, called thence Lyrnesseis. This city was founded by Lysimachus, who transferred to it the population of the then declining Cardia, near which it was built. Its modern name is in allusion to the width of the isthmus on which it stood. Hexamili, however, can hardly be considered a town.——II. Another in Ætolia.

Macaris, an ancient name of Crete.

Macedonia. "Much uncertainty exists as to the origin of the name of Macedon, but it seems generally agreed among the writers of antiquity that its more ancient appellation was Emathia. According to Hesiod, Macedo, the founder of this nation, was the son of Jupiter, or of Osiris according to Diodorus, while many of the moderns have derived the name from that of Kittim, by which it has been supposed that the kings of Macedon are designated in the Old Testament. In support of this opinion it is observed, that the country is not unfrequently called Macetia, and the inhabitants Macetæ. It appears from Herodotus, that the name served originally to designate the small place or district of Macednon, in the vicinity of mount Pindus. And, according to the same ancient historian, it would seem that this was the primary appellation of the Dorians. The origin of the Macedonian dynasty is a subject of some intricacy and dispute. There is one point, however, on which all the ancient authorities agree; namely, that the royal family of that country was of the race of the Temenidæ of Argos, and descended from Hercules. The difference of opinion principally regards the individual of that family to whom the honour of founding this illustrious monarchy is to be ascribed. Thucydides gives an accurate account of the extent of territory possessed by the Macedonian monarch. 'Alexander, father of Perdiccas, and his ancestors the Temenidæ, who came from Argos,' says the historian, 'were the first occupiers of Macedonia after they had vanquished and expelled the Pierians, who retired to Phagres across the Strymon, and the country under mount Pangæus, and other places; from which circumstance, the coast situated under mount Pangæus is called the Pierian gulf. They also dispossessed of their territory the Bottiæi, who are now contiguous to the Chalcidians. They likewise occupied a narrow strip of Pœonia, along the river Axius, from Pella to the sea; and beyond the Axius, as far as the Strymon, the district called Mygdonia, after driving out the Edones, the original inhabitants. They also expelled the Eordi from Eordæa, (the greater part of whom were destroyed, but a few remain near Physca,) as well as the Almopes from Almopia. Besides these, there were other districts of which the Macedonians were masters at the time of Sitalces' invasion; such as Anthemus, Grestonia, and Bisaltia. Their authority extended also over the Lyncestæ and Elimiotæ, and other inland tribes, which, though governed by their own princes, were considered as dependants and allies.' On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans the following decree was issued by the Roman senate and people respecting that country. It was ordered that the Macedonians should be considered as free, living under their own laws, and electing their own magistrates; and that they should pay to the Romans one half only of the annual contributions heretofore levied by their kings. It was also enacted, that from henceforth Macedonia should be divided into four distinct regions. The first of these was to comprise all the country between the rivers Strymon and Nessus, and whatever Perseus held on the left bank of the latter, with the exception of Enos, Maronea, and Abdera. On the right bank of the Strymon the districts of Bisaltia and Heraclea Sintica were included in this division. The second was formed of the country situated between the Strymon and the Axius, with the addition of ancient Pæonia. The third extended from the latter river to the Peneus. The fourth region reached, from mount Bermius to the confines of Illyria and Epirus. It was decided that Amphipolis should be the capital of the first division, Thessalonica of the second, Pella of the third, and Pelagonia of the fourth."—Cram. These it will be understood, were the limits of Macedonia, reduced to a province; as the kingdom of Philip, its limits may be defined nearly as follows. On the north, the ridge of mount Hæmus divided it from Mœsia; and the Cambunii montes separated it from Thessaly on the opposite side. The country of the Macedonian Illyrians lay upon its west, beyond the Scardus mountains and the hills called Bernus; while on the east the Strymon distinguished its borders from the farther limits of Thrace. Before the conquests of Philip extended the empire of his kingdom over all of Greece, the inhabitants of the southern parts were accustomed to consider the Macedonians like the Thracians, &c. as barbarians; nor were they looked upon as Greeks till that prince converted Greece into Macedonia. They were, in all probability, of the same origin as the Thracians, from whom there is little doubt they derived their descent. The kingdom of Macedonia, first founded B. C. 814, by Caranus, a descendant of Hercules, and a native of Argos, continued in existence 646 years, till the battle of Pydna. The family of Caranus remained in possession of the crown until the death of Alexander the Great, and began to reign in the following order: Caranus, after a reign of 28 years, was succeeded by Cœnus, who ascended the throne 786 B. C. Thurimus 774, Perdiccas 729, Argæus 678, Philip 640, Æropas 602, Alcetas or Alectas 576, Amyntas 547, Alexander 497, Perdiccas 454, Archelaus 413, Amyntas 399, Pausanias 398, Amyntas 2d 397, Argæus the tyrant 390, Amyntas restored 390, Alexander 2d 371, Ptolemy Alorites 370, Perdiccas 3d 366, Philip son of Amyntas 360, Alexander the Great 336, Philip Aridæus 323, Cassander 316. Antipater and Alexander 298, Demetrius king of Asia 294, Pyrrhus 287, Lysimachus 286, Ptolemy Ceraunus 280, Meleager two months, Antipater the Etesian 45 days, Antigonus Gonatas 277, Demetrius 243, Antigonus Doson 232, Philip 221, Perseus 179, conquered by the Romans 168 B. C. at Pydna.

Macri, a river flowing from the Appenines, and dividing Liguria from Etruria. Lucan. 2. v. 426.—Liv. 39, c. 32.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Macrŏbii, a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year, some say to a thousand; and, indeed from that longevity they have obtained their name (μακροι βιοι, long life) to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia. After so long a period spent in virtuous actions, and freed from the indulgences of vice, and from maladies, they dropped into the grave as to sleep, without pain and without terror. Orph. Argon. 1105.—Herodot. 3, c. 17.—Mela, 3, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 48.—Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Macrontichos. Vid Dercon.

MADAURA, a town on the borders of Numidia and Gætulia, of which the inhabitants were called Madaurenses. It was the native place of Apuleius. Apul. Met. 11.

MÆANDER, a celebrated river of Asia Minor, rising near Celænæ, and flowing through Caria and Ionia into the Ægean Sea between Miletus and Priene, after it has been increased by the waters of the Marsyas, Lycus, Eudon, Lethæus, &c. It is celebrated among the poets, for its windings, which amount to no less than 600, and from which all obliquities have received the name of Mæanders. It forms in its course, according to the observations of some travellers, the Greek letters ε ξ ς & ω, and from its windings Daedalus had the first idea of his famous labyrinth. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 145, &c.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 254.—Lucan. 5, v. 208, l. 6, v. 471.—Homer. Il. 2.—Herodot. 2, c. 29.—Cic. Pis. 29.—Strab. 12, &c.—Mela, 1, c. 17. This river is called by the Turks the Meinder; but because they give the same name to the Caystet, they prefix to this the epithet Boiuc or Great, as to the smaller stream a name indicative of its inferiority.

MÆATÆ, a people at the south of Scotland. Ibid. 76, c. 12.

MÆDI, a people of Mædica, a district of Thrace near Rhodope. Liv. 26, c. 25, l. 40, c. 21.

MÆNĀLUS, (plur. Mænala,) I. a mountain of Arcadia, sacred to the god Pan, and greatly frequented by shepherds. It received its name from Mænalus, a son of Lycaon. It was covered with pine trees, whose echo and shade have been greatly celebrated by all the ancient poets. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 216.—Virg. G. 1, v. 17. Ecl. 8, v. 24.—Paus. 8, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3. "The modern name of this mountain is Roino. Dodwell says its height is considerable, and that it is characterized by the glens and valleys which intersect it, and are watered with numerous rivulets. It is connected on the east with mount Parthenius, and to the north with the hills of Orchomenus and Stymphalus." Cram.——II. A town of Arcadia.

MÆNUS, a river of Germany, now called the Mayne, falling into the Rhine at Mayence.

MÆŌNIA. Vid. Lydia. The Etrurians, as being descended from a Lydian colony, are often called Mæonidæ, (Virg. Æn. 11, v. 759.) and even the lake Thrasymenus in their country is called Mæonius lacus. Sil. Ital. 15, v. 35.

MÆŌTÆ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia.

MÆŌTIS PALUS, a large lake, or part of the sea between Europe and Asia, at the north of the Euxine, to which it communicates by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, now called the Sea of Azoph or Zabach. It was worshipped as a deity by the Massagetæ. It extends about 390 miles from south-west to north-east, and is about 600 miles in circumference. The Amazons are called Mæotides, as living in the neighbourhood. Strab.—Mela, 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 1.—Curt. 5, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 3, el. 12. ep. Sab. 2, v. 9.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 739.

MÆSIA SYLVA, a wood in Etruria, near the mouth of the Tiber. Liv. 1, c. 33.

MAGNA GRÆCIA.—Vid Græcia Magna.

MAGNĒSIA, I. a city of Lydia, surnamed from the Mæander, upon which it stood. This was a Grecian colony. It is now Guzel-Hizar, or the Handsome Castle.——II. Another in the same country, called Sypilia from its situation beneath mount Sypilus, on the Hermus, opposite the mouth of the Hyllus. In this city died Themistocles, an exile from his country, and dependant on the magnanimity and bounty of the Persian king. It is celebrated for his death, and for a battle which was fought there 187 years before the Christian era, between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. The forces of Antiochus amounted to 70,000 men according to Appian, or 70,000 foot and 12,000 horse according to Livy, which have been exaggerated by Florus to 300,000 men; the Roman army consisted of about 28 or 30,000 men, 2000 of which were employed in guarding the camp. The Syrians lost 50,000 foot and 4000 horse, and the Romans only 300 killed with 25 horse. It was founded by a colony from Magnesia in Thessaly.——III. A country on the eastern parts of Thessaly, at the south of Ossa. It was sometimes called Æmonia and Magnes Campus. The capital, was also called Magnesia. "The Greeks gave the name of Magnesia to that narrow portion of Thessaly which is confined between the mouth of the Peneus and the Pagasæan bay to the north and south, and between the chain of Ossa and the sea on the west and east. The people of this district were called Magnetes, and appear to have been in possession of it from the most remote period. They are also universally allowed to have formed part of the Amphictyonic body. The Magnesians submitted to Xerxes, giving earth and water in token of subjection. Thucydides leads us to suppose they were in his time dependant on the Thessalians; for he says, Μάγνητες καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι ὑπήκοοι Θετταλῶν. They passed, with the rest of that nation, under the dominion of the kings of Macedon, who succeeded Alexander, and were declared free by the Romans after the battle of Cynoscephalæ. Their government was then republican, affairs being directed by a general council, and a chief magistrate called Magnetarch. Mount Homole, the extreme point of Magnesia to the north, was probably a portion of the chain of Ossa; and celebrated by the poets as the abode of the ancient Centaurs and Lapithæ, and a favourite haunt of Pan.

Ceu, duo nubigenæ quum vertice montis ab alto

From Pausanias we learn that it was extremely fertile, and well supplied with springs and fountains. One of these was apparently the Libethrian fountain. Strabo says that mount Homole was near the mouth of the Peneus, and Apollonius describes it as close to the sea." Cram.——IV. a promontory of Magnesia in Thessaly. Liv. 37.—Flor. 3.—Appian.

MAGON, a river of India falling into the Ganges. Arrian.

MAJORCA. Vid. Baleares.

MALÆA, I. a promontory of Lesbos.——II. Another in Peloponnesus, at the south of Laconia. The sea is so rough and boisterous there, that the dangers which attended a voyage round it gave rise to the proverb of Cum ad Maleam deflexeris obliviscere quæ sunt domi. It is now Cape St. Angelo or Malio; according to Strabo there were 670 stadia from hence to Tænarum, including the sinuosities of the coast. Cram.—Strab. 8 and 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 58.—Plut. in Arat.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 193.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Liv. 21, c. 44.—Ovid. Am. 2, el. 16, v. 24, el. 11, v. 20.—Paus. 3, c. 23.

MALEVENTUM, the ancient name of Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 27.

MALIA, a city of Phthiotis, near mount Œta and Thermopylæ. There were in its neighbourhood some hot mineral waters which the poet Catullus has mentioned. From Malia, a gulf or small bay in the neighbourhood, at the western extremities of the island of Eubœa, has received the name of the gulf of Malia, Maliacum Fretum or Maliacus Sinus. Some call it the gulf of Lamia from its vicinity to Lamia. It is often taken for the Sinus Pelasgicus of the ancients. Paus. 1, c. 4.—Herodot.

MAMERTĪNA, a town of Campania, famous for its wines.——A name of Messana in Sicily. Martial. 13, ep. 117.—Strab. 7.

MAMERTĪNI. Vid. Part II.

MANDĒLA, a village in the country of the Sabines, near Horace's country-seat. Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 105.

MANDUBII, a people of Celtic Gaul, dependants of the Ædui. Their chief city was Alesia, and they occupied a part of the ancient dukedom of Burgundy, called l' Auxois, now Département de la Côte d'Or. Strabo is incorrect in representing them as adjacent to the Arverni, since they were separated from that people by a large portion of the Æduan territory. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 78.

MANDURIA, a city of Calabria, near Tarentum, whose inhabitants were famous for eating dog's flesh. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Liv. 27, c. 15.

MANTINEA, a town of Arcadia, at the foot of mount Artemisius, on the borders of Argolis. The little river Ophis flowed beneath its walls. Mantinea consisted of a few small villages, which at an early period uniting, formed this city, for a long time the chief town of Arcadia. In history the Mantineans hold a conspicuous place for the wisdom of their institutions, and for the battles fought in their territory. After the Peloponnesian war, in which they had taken part with the Lacedæmonians, they fell into the displeasure of Sparta; and two wars, with an interval of some years between them, were the consequence. In the latter, the walls of the town were demolished, and the city, resolved into its primitive elements, formed again, instead of one united town, four smaller villages. At the same time it was compelled to change its republican institutions for others more consistent with the views of the Laconians. When Thebes began to assume, in the time of her generals Pelopidas and Epaminondas, an important attitude in the affairs of Greece, the Mantinæans, under the protection of that city, reunited their population and rebuilt their walls; another battle between the Thebans and the Spartans succeeded, in which Epaminondas lost his life, and which, taking its name from Mantinæa, has given to that city an immortal fame. From this time forward the policy of the people was indirect and timid in the convulsions which were preparing the way for the destruction of Greece; and the barbarous massacre of the Achæans who were garrisoned in their city, exciting the anger of Antigonus and the league, a chastisement was inflicted upon them equal to their perfidy. The city was taken, and the inhabitants were sold as slaves; and the name of Antigonea was assigned to it instead of its ancient title, to obliterate all memory of the guilty place. Under the Romans the place recovered a part of its splendour, enjoying the favour of the emperor Augustus, and afterwards of Hadrian, who restored the name of Mantinea. "The tomb of Arcas, who gave his name to all the country, was erected close to the temple of Juno, on a site called the altar of the Sun. The equestrian statue of Gryllus, the son of Xenophon, who eminently distinguished himself in the battle of Mantinea, was placed not far from the theatre. In the same quarter were situated the temples of Vesta and Venus Symmachia, the latter having been erected by the Mantineans in commemoration of the battle of Actium. There was also in this city a temple raised to Antinous, the favourite of Hadrian, by order of that emperor; it being pretended that the Bithynians, among whom Antinous was born, were descended from the Mantineans. A yearly festival and quinquennial games were also solemnized in honour of Hadrian's minion; and in a building near the gymnasium were deposited his statue, and several paintings, in which he was represented under the form of Bacchus." Cram.

MANTINŌRUM OPPIDUM, a town of Corsica, now supposed to be Bastia.

MANTUA, a town of Italy beyond the Po, founded about 300 years before Rome, by Blanor or Ocnus, the son of Manto. It was the ancient capital of Etruria. When Cremona, which had followed the interest of Brutus, was given to the soldiers of Octavius, Mantua also, which was in the neighbourhood, shared the common calamity, though it had favoured the party of Augustus, and many of the inhabitants were tyrannically deprived of their possessions. Virgil, who was among them, applied for redress to Augustus, and obtained it. Strab. 5. —Virg. Ecl. 1, &c. G. 3, v. 12. Æn. 10, v. 180.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 15. It is now Mantova, in English Mantua. This place is one of the greatest antiquity, not being, like other towns in that part of Italy, of Gallic origin. By Virgil, its founding is ascribed to the Tuscans, and though we are not called upon to acknowledge its debt to Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, according to the fancy of that poet and of the early Florentine who followed his tradition, we can have no hesitation in assigning to Mantua a Tuscan origin. It was situated on an island, or rather in a marsh occasioned by the waters of the Mincius, and was in antiquity by no means distinguished, being among the smaller towns of Gallia Cisalpina. The birth of Virgil alone ennobled it, however, in the eyes of the Romans of the empire; and in modern times, amid all the power and comparative splendour to which it arose, the name of Virgil appears to rank among the first of its glories. He was not born, however, within the city, but at Andes, a small village in the vicinity.

MARATHON, a village of Attica, 10 miles from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 1000 Platæans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Persian army, consisting of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,000, or as Justin says, of 600,000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, on the 28th of Sept. 490 B. C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians lost only 192 men, and the Persians 6,300. Justin has raised the loss of the Persians in this expedition, and in the battle, to 200,000 men. To commemorate this immortal victory of their countrymen, the Greeks raised small columns, with the names inscribed on the tombs of the fallen heroes. It was also in the plains of Marathon that Theseus overcame a celebrated bull, which plundered the neighbouring country. Erigone is called Marathonia virgo, as being born at Marathon. Stat. 5, Sylv. 3, v. 74.—C. Nep. in Milt.—Herodot. 6, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 9.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in Paral.—Paus. 2, c. 1.

Marcianopŏlis, the capital of Lower Mœsia. It received its name in honour of the empress Marciana, and is now called by the inhabitants Prebislaw, or the Illustrious City. D'Anville.

Marcomanni, a German people, dwelling, when first known to the Romans, between the Rhine and the Mayne, in a part of that which now constitutes the Duchy of Baden. When the Roman arms began to threaten the extinction, or at least the subjugation, of all the border nations, the Marcomanni resolved to quit their dangerous seats, and crossing the Mœnus and the vast Hercynian forests, they drove the Boii from their possessions about the sources of the Albis (Elbe), and fixed their residence in that country. It however retained, and still retains, in the name of Bohemia, the appellation of the people thus expelled by the Marcomans. They proved powerful enemies to the Roman emperors. Augustus granted them peace, but they were afterwards subdued by Antoninus and Trajan, &c. Paterc. 2, c. 109.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 46 and 62, G. 42.

Mardi, a people of Persia, on the confines of Media. They were very poor, and generally lived upon the flesh of wild beasts. Their country in later times, became the residence of the famous assassins destroyed by Hulakou, the grandson of Zingis Khan. Herodot. 1 and 3. —Plin. 6, c. 16.

Mardia, a place of Thrace, famous for a battle between Constantine and Licinius. A. D. 315.

Mardus, a river of Media, falling into the Caspian Sea.

Mare Mortuum, called also, from the bitumen it throws up, the lake Asphaltites, is situate in Judæa, and near 100 miles long and 25 broad. Its waters are salter than those of the sea, but the vapours exhaled from them are not so pestilential as have been generally represented. It is supposed that the 13 cities, of which Sodom and Gomorrah, as mentioned in the Scriptures, were the capital, were destroyed by a volcano, and on the site a lake formed. Volcanic appearances now mark the face of the country, and earthquakes are frequent. Plin. 5, c. 6.—Joseph. J. Bell. 4, c. 27.—Strab. 16, p. 764.—Justin. 36, c. 3. "To the east of Judæa, two rude and arid chains of hills encompass, with their dark steeps, a long basin, formed in a clay soil, mixed with bitumen and rock salt. The water contained in this hollow is impregnated with a mixture of different saline matters, having lime, magnesia, and soda, for their base, partially neutralized with muriatic and sulphuric acid. The salt which they yield by evaporation is about one fourth of their weight. The asphalta, or bitumen of Judæa, rises from time to time from the bottom, floats on the surface of the lake, and is thrown out on the shores, where it is gathered for use. Formerly the inhabitants were in the practice of going out in boats or rafts to collect it in the middle of the lake. None of our travellers have thought of sailing on this lake, which would undoubtedly contribute to render their acquaintance with its phenomena more complete. We are told by the greater part of those who have visited it, that neither fish nor shells are to be found in it, that an unwholesome vapour is sometimes emitted by it, and that its shores, frightfully barren, are never cheered by the note of any bird. The inhabitants however, are not sensible of any noxious quality in its vapours; and the accounts of birds falling down dead in attempting to fly over it are entirely fabulous. We are taught to believe that the site of the Dead Sea was once a fertile valley, partly resting on a mass of subterranean water, and partly composed of a stratum of bitumen; that a fire from heaven kindled these combustible materials, the fertile soil sunk into the abyss beneath, and that Sodom and Gomorrah, and other cities of the plain, probably built of bituminous stones, were consumed in the tremendous conflagration. In this manner the amateurs of physical geography contrive a scientific explanation of those awful changes of which, according to the Scriptures, this place was once the scene." Malte-Brun.

Mareōtis lacus, a bay of the Mediterranean, through which the Nile, at one of its mouths, discharged itself into that great inland sea. "To the south of Alexandria is lake Mareotis. For many ages this lake was dried up; for though the bed is lower than the surface of the ocean, there is not sufficient rain to keep up any lake in that country in opposition to the force of perpetual evaporation. But in 1801, the English, in order to circumscribe more effectually the communications which the French army in the city of Alexandria maintained with the surrounding country, cut across the walls of the old canal which had formed a dyke, separating this low ground from lake Maadie, or the lake of Aboukir on the east. In consequence of this easy operation, the water had a sudden fall of six feet, and the lake of Mareotis, which had so long disappeared, and the site of which had been occupied partly by salt marshes, partly by cultivated lands, and even villages, resumed its ancient extent. This modern inundation from the sea, indeed, is much more extensive than the ancient lake Mareotis, occupying, probably, four times its extent." Malte-Brun.

Margiana, a part of the empire of the Persian kings, belonging to Media, and afterwards attached to the kingdom of Parthia. On its borders were the countries of Bactriania, Aria, Parthia, and Hyrcania, with Sogdiana beyond its northern boundary, which was formed by the Oxus. The Margus, which flowed from the borders of Bactriana through the whole extent of this province, imparted to it the name of Mar gana. All this country forms at present but a part of the district of Khorasen. It was uncommonly fertile, and produced the most excellent wines, the grapes being of the finest quality and of the largest size. The vines are so uncommonly large, that two men can scarcely grasp the trunk of one of them. Curt. 7, c. 10. —Ptol. 5.

Margus, I. a river of Mœsia, falling into the Danube, with a town of the same name, now Kastolatz.——II. Another in Asia, now the Marg-ab. Rising in the mountains of Bactriana, this river flows through the greater part of Margiana towards the Ochus, but before it reaches that river, after having passed the capital, it is said to be absorbed in the sands that overspread those parts of Asia.

Mariane Fossæ, a town of Gaul Narbonensis, which received its name from the dyke (fossa) which Marius opened thence to the sea. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.

Mariandynum, a place in Bithynia, where the poets feigned that Hercules dragged Cerberus out of hell. Diongs.—Ptol. 5, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2 and 19, l. 2, c. 7.

Marianus mons, now Sierra Morena, a ridge of mountains in Spain, dividing Bætica from Lusitania and Tarraconensis. It joins the Orospeda mons at the springs of the Anas; Caput-Anæ and the Batis also rise in that part in which those mountain ranges join one another. The Marianus now separates Castile from Andalusia.

Marisus, a river of Dacia, emptying into the Tibiscus. In modern geography it belongs, for the former part of its course, to Transylvania, and for the latter forms the boundary line between the Bannot on the south and Hungary on the north. It is now the Maros.

Marmarica. Vid. Marmarida.

Marmaridæ, the inhabitants of that part of Libya called Marmarica, between Cyrene and Egypt. They were swift in running, and pretended to possess some drugs or secret power to destroy the poisonous effects of the bite of serpents. Sil. It. 3, v. 300, l. 11, v. 182.—Lucan. 4, v. 680, l. 9, v. 894.

Marmarion, a town of Eubœa, whence Apollo is called Marmarinus. Strab. 10.

Maronea, a city of the Cicones, in Thrace, near the Hebrus, of which Bacchus was the chief deity. The wine was always reckoned excellent, and with it, it was supposed, Ulysses intoxicated the Cyclops Polyphemus. Plin. 14, c. 4.—Herodot.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 57.

Marpessus, a mountain of Paros, abounding in white marble. The quarries are still seen by modern travellers. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 471.—Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 36, c. 5.

Marrucini. "The Marrucini occupied a narrow slip of territory on the right bank of the river Aternus, between the Vestini to the north, and the Frentani to the south, and between the Peligni and the sea towards the west and east. Cato derived their origin from the Marsi. Like that people, they were accounted a hardy and warlike race, and with them they made common cause against the tyranny of Rome. An idea may be formed of the population and force of the several petty nations which may be classed together in this part of Italy, from a statement of Polybius, where that historian, when enumerating the different contingents which the allies of the Romans were able to furnish about the time of the second Punic war, estimates that of the Marsi, Marrucini, Vestini, and Frentani, at 30,000 foot and 4000 horse." Cram.

Maruvium, the chief town of the Marsi, in the country of the Sabines. It stood upon the shore of the celebrated Fucine lake.

Marsi, a nation of Germany, who afterwards came to settle near the lake Fucinus in Italy, in a country checkered with forests abounding with wild boars and other ferocious animals. They at first proved very inimical to the Romans, but, in process of time, they became their firmest supporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marsic war. The large contributions they made to support the interest of Rome, and the number of men which they continually supplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aspiring; and they claimed, with the rest of the Italian states, a share of the honour and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 91. The petition, though supported by the interest, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Drusus, was received with contempt by the Roman senate; and the Marsi, with their allies, showed their dissatisfaction by taking up arms. Their resentment was increased when Drusus, their friend at Rome, was murdered by the means of the nobles; and they erected themselves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire. A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100,000 men, and were opposed by a superior force. Some battles were fought, in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconsiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Asculum, proved fatal to their cause, 4000 of them were left dead on the spot, their general, Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities, was slain, and such as escaped from the field perished by hunger in the Appenines, where they had sought a shelter. After many defeats and the loss of Asculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected, and tired of hostilities which had already continued for three years, sued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at last re-established in the republic, and all the states of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies consisted of the Marsi, the Peligni, the Vestini, the Hermini, Pompeiani, Marcini, Picentese, Venusini, Frentani, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites. The Marsi were greatly addicted to magic. The German Marsi, from whom these people were descended according to common report, after emigrating from the margin of the Lupia, inhabited the banks of the Weser in the vicinity of the Cherusci, and were altogether undistinguished in history. Horat. ep. 5, v. 76, ep. 27, v. 29.—Appian.—*Val. Marsigni, a barbarous people, between the sources of the Oder and the Elbe, in that part of Germany which is now Silesia, north of the Quadi and the Marcomanni.

Marsyas, I. a river of Phrygia emptying into the Mæander. The confluence of these rivers was a little below the town of Celænæ. Liv. 38, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 265.—Lucan. 3, v. 208.——II. Another in Syria, rising in the east of the mountains which form the chain of Libanus, and falling into the Orontes opposite to Apamea.

Martia aqua, water at Rome, celebrated for its clearness and salubrity. It was conveyed to Rome, at the distance of above 30 miles, from the lake Fucinus, by Ancus Martius, whence it received its name. Tibull. 3, el. 7, v. 26.—Plin. 31, c. 3, l. 36, c. 15.

Marus, (the Morava,) a river of Germany, which separates modern Hungary and Moravia. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 63.

Massæsyli, a people of Numidia, on the side of Mauretania. It was this part of Numidia that Syphax ruled over, and which was united on his death to the other portion over which Massinissa had authority. The promontory Tretum, now Sebdarux, or the Seven Capes, divided these two districts, which afterwards constituted the kingdom of Numidia. Vid. Massyla.

Masca, a river of Mesopotamia, emptying into the Euphrates between the mouth of the Chaboras and the borders of Arabia, near the town of Corsote. It might be possible to display a great deal of learning in fixing the precise situation of the mouth of this river; but as it is of very little importance in the history of ancient times, and as the difference of a mile or two in the description of its course affects in no degree the accuracy of our conclusions in regard to any fact in ancient history, we shall not enter into an examination of its various bendings, nor attempt to prove with Mannert, that its confluence with the Euphrates was within a mile less to the west of Anatho than D'Anville has placed it. (See Lemp. Class. Dict. 6th Am. ed. in which all these points are learnedly discussed.) The name of Masca is applied to this river by Xenophon, but Ptolemy calls it the Saocoras. It is now designated as the Wadal Geboa.

Massagĕtæ. "We find no name more considerable in Scythia than that of Massagetæ, which may be interpreted the Great Getes, by the signification of the initial syllables. The primitive and principal dwelling of the Massagetes was beyond the Iaxartes, or Araxes, according to Herodotus; and in the vicinity of the moor which the same river forms, according to Strabo. And if we find this name in other countries, as in those of the Alans, and the Huns, of a different race, the diffusion of it was owing to the celebrity that it acquired in Scythia." D'Anville. The name of Massagetæ disappears in the first centuries of Christianity. They had no temples, but worshipped the sun, to whom they offered horses, on account of their swiftness. When their parents had come to a certain age, they generally put them to death, and eat their flesh mixed with that of cattle. Horat. 1, od. 35, v. 40.—*Dionys. Massilia, a maritime town of Gallia Narbonensis, now called Marseilles. It is celebrated for its laws, its fidelity to the Romans, and for its being long the seat of literature. It acquired great consequence by its commercial pursuits during its infancy, and even waged war against Carthage. By becoming the ally of Rome, its power was established; but in warmly espousing the cause of Pompey against Cæsar, its views were frustrated, and it was so much reduced by the insolence and resentment of the conqueror, that it never after recovered its independence and warlike spirit. Herodot. 1, c. 164.—Plin. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 37, &c.—Strab. 1.—Liv. 5, c. 3.—Horat. ep. 16.—Flor. 4, c. 2.—Cic. Flac. 26. Off. 2, 8.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 44. Agr. 4. This city, almost equally celebrated in antiquity and by the moderns, owed its origin to the Asiatic Greeks of Phocæa, who, fleeing from the threatening power and oppression of the Persians, brought among the savage Gauls the civilization and enterprise of Greece. Five hundred years before the Christian era, and about the period of the Gallic invasion of Italy, while Rome yet acknowledged the rule of the Tarquins, these bold and adventurous colonists fixed themselves among the Salyes, the fiercest people of the Gauls, as yet unattempted in the strength and independence of their native land. The natural harbour of Massilia was not calcuted to afford convenient moorings to all the vessels which the great trade of the place invited to its port. The Massilians were early celebrated for their arts and letters, and not less so for the excellence of their laws and the justness with which they were executed. As their soil was not fertile, they very soon directed their attention therefore rather to commerce than to agricultural pursuits; and a number of colonies in Hispania and elsewhere, which owed their origin to the Phocæans of Marseilles, attested the spirit and prosperous enterprise of the Massilians.

Massyli, a people of Numidia, on the east of the Masæsyli, and west of Africa properly so called. When Massinissa, their king, upon the death of Syphax possessed himself of the country of the Massæsyli lying on the west, the united region constituted one kingdom under the name of Numidia. Thus joined they formed the territory of Jugurtha, so celebrated for the war which he waged with the Romans. Vid. Masæsylii. When the Massyli went on horseback, they never used saddles or bridles, but only sticks. Their character was warlike, their manners simple, and their love of liberty unconquerable. Liv. 24, c. 48, l. 28, c. 17, l. 29, c 32.—Sil. 3, v. 282, l. 16, v. 171.—Lucan. 4, v 682.—*Virg. Matisco, a town of the Ædui in Gaul, now called Macon.

Matrŏna, a river of Gaul, now called the Marne, falling into the Seine. This river, which, in modern geography, belongs for the most part to Champaigne, the departments of Marne and Seine et Marne, in the time of the Gauls divided many tribes, and rising on the confines of the territory that belonged to the Lingones, separated the Belgic population from the Celtic through the whole of its course, til.

its confluence with the Seine near Lutetia Parisiorum, the city of Paris.

Mattiaci, a German people on the borders of the Rhine, belonging to the Catti, but early in alliance with Rome. Their southern limit may be generally described by the course of the Mayne towards its mouth, and the Mattiaci Fontes, above the confluence of the two rivers along which their possessions extended, may be considered as one of their principal places. This town is now called Wisbaden in Hesse, as were the greater part of the lands of the Mattiaci. Mattium, supposed to be the same as Marpurg, appears to have been their capital, and is sometimes called the capital of all the Cattian people. Tacit. de Germ. 29. An. 1, c. 56.

Mauretania, an extensive region of Africa, upon the sea coast of the north. The Mediterranean bounded it upon this side; upon the east was Numidia; the vast Getulian deserts lay upon its borders on the south; and the open ocean washed it on the west. These boundaries enclose the modern kingdoms of Morocco and Fez. To this was added a part of Numidia, when all the coast of Africa was reduced into the form of a province or provinces of the empire. In the reign of Claudius, Mauretania was divided into two parts; the western, extending from the ocean to the river Molochath, and formed of what might be considered the proper and original Mauretania, was denominated Tingitana, from Tingis, its capital; and the eastern portion, reaching from the same river to the Ampsagas on the borders of the diminished Numidia, received the surname of Cæsariensis, from the city of Cæsaria, which, until it received this name from Juba in honour of Augustus, had been called Iol. At a still later period, the interior of Mauretania Cæsariensis was erected into a separate province under the title of Sitifensis, from the capital city of Sitifi. On the division of the empire into east and west Mauretania, Tingitana constituted a part of one of the Spanish provinces. "The expulsion of the Vandals from Spain put the Goths also in possession of the province of Tingitana; the commandant of which, under the last king of the Visigoths, in vengeance of a private injury, introduced the Maures into that kingdom about the beginning of the eighth century. The western situation of this extremity of Africa, procured it from the Arabs the name of Garb, from an appellative in their language; the province of Tingitana corresponding nearly with the kingdom of Fez." D'Anville. In the time of the Romans, the whole of this coast was thickly lined with populous cities, the inhabitants of which, though partly civilized, lived not according to the usages of Roman society. It is now inhabited by the African Moors, who retain no vestiges of even the partial civilization of the former occupants of their country. Mauretania was also called Maurusia.

Mauri, the inhabitants of Mauretania. Every thing among them grew in greater abundance and greater perfection than in other countries. Strab. 17.—Martial. 5, ep. 29, l. 12, ep. 67.—*Sil. Mazices, and Mazyges, a people of Libya, inhabiting the country in the vicinity of the Oases.

Media, a country of Asia. Media, properly so called, was separated from Armenia by the Araxes on the north, the province of Asia extended from its eastern boundary, Assyria lay upon its west, and Persis and Susiana bordered on it towards the south. On the north, the mountain regions of this country west of Armenia, were washed by the waters of the Caspian Sea. The modern Irak, distinguished, according to D'Anville, by the surname of Ajami or the Persian Irak, corresponds to the country contained within these limits. "The vast province of Irak-Adjemi, which nearly corresponds to the Great Media of the ancients, takes its name from the first founder of the Persian monarchy; the Djemshid of the Orientalists, and the Achæmenes of the Greeks. If shid and menes are considered terminations, these two words may be reduced to one root, Adjem or Achem. With the Arabians Irak signifies Babylonia, and Adjemi is their name for the Persians. The name of the province, therefore, means Persian Babylonia. This province occupies the greater part of the central plateau of Persia," (Malte-Brun,) and its description is comprehended in its name of the great salt desert. But Media, in the widest extent of its empire, was not so circumscribed, and extending on the west almost to the Halys, and on the south over Persia, it formed one of the distinguished monarchies of the early ages of antiquity. It should be observed that the history of Media, with which we are acquainted, refers but to the later period of her people, who, at a much earlier period, and probably in regions farther to the east, had exercised a controlling power over the affairs of Asia. In effect, the two series of Median kings, preserved by Herodotus and Xenophon on one hand, and by Ctesias on the other, offer little in common, and seem to refer to different dynasties or different empires. For a long time, however, the Medes were subject to the Assyrians, and their country formed a small portion of the wide empire of the Assyrian kings. The principal division of Media was into Atropatena contiguous to Armenia and Media proper, consisting of the minor districts of Choromethrene, Artacene, &c. on the more southern boundaries. "Atropatena," says Heylin, "is that part of Media which lieth between mount Taurus and the Caspian Sea." This represents the mountainous and barren parts of Media, and its capital Gasa or Gazaca still bears among the Armenians the name of Gauzak. This region, in the language of the old English antiquarian so often cited, was a "barren, cold inhospitable country; and for that reason allotted for the dwelling of so many of the captive Israelites, brought hither by Salmanassar when he conquered that country." South of the mountains commences the fertile tract; and here, in the capital city of Ecbatana, the kings of Persia, when in their turn they became lords of Media, were accustomed to take up their summer residence. The name of Media is of great antiquity, and modern writers, who please themselves in finding the origin of nations among the immediate posterity of Noah, refer it to Madai, the son of Japhet and grandson of the first great patriarch. In comparatively recent times, that is to say, within a a century or two of our era, the countries of Hyrcania and Parthia were cut off from the north-eastern parts of Media, and formed, long after she had ceased to exist as a nation, a powerful and independent state. The principal mountains of this country were the Orontes, the Coronus, the Zagros which bounded it towards Assyria, and the Bagoas which lay on the borders of Aria. These were all but ramifications of the great Taurus range, which are here disjointed, and point in every direction, intersecting the country with great irregularity. From these mountains flow the chief rivers which water the whole face of Media; the Mardus or Amardus, which falls into the Caspian Sea; the Eulæus or Choaspes, which belongs to Persia and falls into the Tigris near Apamea, with many smaller streams that irrigate the parts of Media not covered by the salt deserts which lay waste so many tracts of Asia. The province of Media was first raised into a kingdom by its revolt from the Assyrian monarchy, B. C. 820; and, after it had for some time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Deioces, by his artifice, procured himself to be called king, 700 B. C. After a reign of 53 years he was succeeded by Phraortes, B. C. 647; who was succeeded by Cyaxares, B. C. 625. His successor was Astyages, B. C. 585, in whose reign Cyrus became master of Media, B. C. 551; and ever after the empire was transferred to the Persians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power, they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage which they paid to their sovereigns, who were styled king of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors, the Persians, and was still in use in the age of the Roman emperors. Justin. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 and 10.—Curt. 5, &c.—*Diod. MEDIOLANUM, I. now Milan, a city of the Insubres in Gallia Cisalpina. It was situated on the Lambrus, near its source, in the valley of the Ticinus and the Addua, in a country abundantly fertile and conveniently situated on the Po, the medium of communication and commerce for the north of Italy with all the people of the southern coast. But, though supposed to have been early a capital city of those Gauls by whom it had been built, and though thus advantageously situated, Mediolanum is scarcely mentioned in history during the early ages of Rome. "This city is named for the first time in history by Polybius, in his account of the Gallic wars. The capture of it by Cn. Scipio and Marcellus was followed by the submission of the Insubres. In Strabo's time it was considered as a most flourishing city. But its splendour seems to have been the greatest in the time of Ausonius, who assigns to it the rank of the sixth town in the Roman empire. Procopius, who wrote a century and a half later, speaks of Mediolanum as one of the first cities of the west, and as inferior only to Rome in population and extent." Cram. With the fall, however, of the empire, commence the fortunes of Milan. For a long time, when the name of Italy became to signify more particularly the northern parts, as it was in a great measure confined to the territories of the Lombard king, the bishop of Milan was dignified by the title of Metropolitan of the diocess of Italy; and as the first city of the Lombard kingdom, in proportion to the diminution of the imperial power and of the Exarch's authority, this city became to hold the place and honours of the first town in Italy.——II. Aulercorum, a town of Gaul, now Evereux in Normandy. ——III. Santonum, another, now Saintes, in Guienne.

MEDIOMATRICI, a powerful and widely extended people of Gallia Belgica. Their country corresponded nearly to the province of Lorraine, in that part which constitutes the department de la Moselle. They were surrounded on the north by the Treviri, on the east by the Nemetes and Triboci, and on the south by the Leuci, reaching to the division of Belgica 2d on the west. The chief town of this people was Divodurum, Metz.

MEDITERRANEUM MARE, the great inland sea that lies between Europe and Africa, having the former on the north and the latter on the south, and washing the western shores of Asia on the east. It receives its names from its situation medio terræ, situate in the middle of the land. The word Mediterranean does not occur in the classics; but it is sometimes called internum, nostrum, or medius liquor, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great Sea. The first naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Castor, is Crete under Minos. Afterwards it passed into the hands of the Lydians, B. C. 1179; of the Pelasgi, 1058; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodians, 916; of the Phrygians, 893; of the Cyprians 868; of the Phœnicians, 826; of the Egyptians, 787; of the Milesians, 753; of the Carians, 734; and of the Lesbians, 676, which they retained for 69 years. Horat. 3, od. 3, v. 46.—Plin. 2, c. 68.—Sallust. Jug. 17.—Cæs. B. G. 5, c. 1.—Liv. 26, c. 42. "The Strait of Gibraltar leads into the Mediterranean, that series of inland seas equally interesting from their situation, their physical character, and historical celebrity. The first basin of the Mediterranean terminates at Cape Bruno and the Strait of Messina. It is divided into two unequal parts by Corsica and Sardinia; but the gulfs of Genoa and Lyons are the only places that are at present generally designated. The depth of the basin is about a thousand or fifteen hundred fathoms near the shores where the sea washes the base of the Pyrenees, the Alps, and the Appenines. The eastern part may be denominated the Italian Sea: numerous volcanic islands, such as the Lipari, Pontia, and many others are scattered over it; and all of them are connected with the same subterraneous fires that rise from Etna and Vesuvius. The second basin is nearly twice as large, but very few islands or rocks have been observed on it. It extends from the coasts of Sicily and Tunis to the shores of Syria and Egypt, and forms in the north two separate basins renowned in history and well adapted to excite the attention of the physical geographers. The first is the Adriatic; its bed, if carefully examined, appears to be composed of marble and lime mixed with shells. The second is the Archipelago or White Sea of the Turks, its numerous and picturesque islands are all of volcanic origin. The gulf the Great Syrtes on the south penetrates into Africa; its sandy coasts are lower than most others in the Mediterranean; its vast marshes in the midst of moving sands are of variable extent, and seem to confound the limits of the land and sea. But the most remarkable basin in the Mediterranean is without doubt that of the Black Sea. Its entrance is formed by the strait of the Dardanelles, the Propontis or the sea of Marmora, and the Bosphorus or the narrow channel of Constantinople. It is fed by the greatest rivers in central Europe, and receives, by the strait of Caffa or the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the turbid waters of the Palus-Mæotis, which the moderns have so inaccurately denominated the Sea of Azoph. Such are at present the limits of those inland seas which separate Europe from Asia and Africa, and facilitate the communication between the ancient continents. It is not perhaps improbable that a former strait, gradually obstructed in the course of ages by the gravel and alluvial deposits from the torrents of Caucasus, connected, long after the last physical revolutions that happened in our globe, the Sea of Azof, and consequently the Black Sea, with the Caspian. The deep waters in the Mediterranean arrive chiefly from the Nile, the Danube, the Dnieper, and other rivers that enter the Black Sea; and also from the Po, the Rhone, and the Ebro. Thus it receives the torrents formed by the melting of the snow in Abyssinia, Switzerland, Caucasus, and mount Atlas. But although its feeders are so abundant, it has been generally believed that the quantity of water which enters the Mediterranean from the Atlantic is greater than that discharged from it into the same ocean. It has been alleged, in support of this supposition, that a constant and large current flows into the middle, of the strait at Gibraltar, whilst only two feeble and lateral currents issue from it. But that apparent influx of the ocean is to be attributed to the pressure of a greater fluid mass on a smaller body of water; a pressure, which, from the force of its impulsion, must necessarily displace the upper strata in the lesser mass. If an anchor be cast in the strait, a lower current may be discovered, which carries to the ocean the superfluous water of the interior sea. The principal motion of the Mediterranean is from east to west, but the reaction of its water against the coast occasions several lateral and adverse currents. The straits too, from their position, give rise to many very variable currents. Those near Cape Pharo in Messina or the Charybdis of the ancients and the Euripus between the continent and the island of Negropont, are the most remarkable. The tides are in most places hardly perceptible, but they may be observed in the Adriatic and in the gulf of the Syrtes." Malte-Brun.

"Medma, or Mesma, a town in the country of the Brutii on the coast, situated by the right bank of the river Mesima. It was a city of some importance and of Greek origin; having been colonized by the Locrians, together with Hipponium. According to Strabo, it derived its name from a great fountain in its vicinity. In Pliny it is written corruptly Medua. Antiquaries report that the ruins of this city are to be seen between Nicotera and the river Medama, but nearer to the latter." Cram.

Megalopŏlis. "Megalopolis, the most recent of all the Arcadian cities, and also the most extensive, was situated in a wide and fertile plain watered by the Helisson, which flowed from the central parts of Arcadia, and nearly divided the town into two equal parts. Pausanias informs us that the Arcadians, having, by the advice of Epaminondas, resolved on laying the foundations of a city which was to be the capital of the nation, they deputed ten commissioners, selected from the principal states, to make the necessary arrangements for conducting the new colony. This event took place in the 102d Olympiad, or 370–1 B. C. The territory assigned to Megalopolis was extensive, since it reached as far as the little states of Orchomenus and Caphyæ on the north-east, while to the south and south-west it adjoined Laconia and Messenia. Diodorus affirms that the city contained about 15,000 men capable of bearing arms, according to which calculation we may compute the whole population at 65,000. The Megalopolitans experienced no molestation from the Lacedæmonians as long as Thebes was powerful enough to protect them; but on the decline of that city, and when also it became engaged in the Sacred war against the Phocians, they were assailed by the Spartans, who endeavoured to obtain possession of their town; these attacks were however easily repulsed by the aid of the Argives and Messenians. To the Athenians the Megalopolitans were likewise indebted for their protection against the attempts of Sparta, as well as their assistance in settling some dissensions in their republic, which had led to the secession of several townships that originally contributed to the foundation of the city. In order to strengthen themselves still further against the Lacedæmonians, they formed an alliance with Philip, son of Amyntas, who conciliated the favour of the Arcadians not only towards himself, but towards all his successors. On the death of Alexander, Megalopolis had to defend itself against the army of Polysperchon, who was engaged in war with Cassander. This general vigorously assaulted the city; but, owing to the bravery of the inhabitants headed by Damis, who had served under Alexander, his attacks were constantly repulsed. Subsequently we find Megalopolis governed by tyrants, the first of whom was Aristodemus of Phigalea, whose excellent character obtained for him the surname of Χρηστός. Under his reign the Spartans again invaded Megalopolis, but were defeated after an obstinate conflict, Acrotatus, the son of Cleomenes, who commanded their army, being among the slain. Some time after the death of Aristodemus, the sovereignty was again usurped by Lydiades, a man of ignoble birth, but of worthy character, since he voluntarily abdicated his authority for the benefit of his countrymen, in order that he might unite them with the Achæan confederacy. At this time Megalopolis was assailed for the third time by the Spartans; who, having defeated the inhabitants, laid siege to the town, of which they would have made themselves masters but for a violent wind which overthrew and demolished their engines. Not long, however, after this failure, Cleomenes the son of Leonidas, in violation of the existing treaty, surprised the Megalopolitans by night, and putting to the sword all who offered any resistance, destroyed the city. Philipœmen, with a considerable part of the population, escaped into Messenia. Megalopolis was restored by the Achæans after the battle of Sellasia; but it never again rose to its former flourishing condition. The virtues and talents of its great general Philopœmen added materially to its celebrity and influence in the Achæan councils, and after his death its fame was upheld by the abilities of Lycortas and Polybius, who trod in the steps of their gifted countryman, and were worthy of sharing in the lustre which he had reflected on his native city. In the time of Polybius, Megalopolis was fifty stadia in circumference, but its population was only equal to half that of Sparta, and when Strabo wrote it was so reduced, that a comic poet was justified in saying,

Ἔρημία μεγάλη ἐστὶν ἡ Μεγαλόπολις.

Pausanias informs us, that it was divided into two parts by the river Helisson. The village of Sinano has been built on the site and amidst the ruins of Megalopolis. Mr. Dodwell informs us, 'that part of the theatre still remains, but the seats are covered with earth, and overgrown with bushes.' " Cram.

Μεγάρα, I. the capital of Megaris. "Tradition, as Pausanias affirms, represented Megara as already existing under that name in the time of Car the son of Phoroneus, while others have derived it from Megarus, a Bœotian chief, and son of Apollo or Neptune. Car was succeeded by Lelex, who, as it was reported, came from Ægypt, and transmitted his name to the ancient race of the Leleges, whom we thus trace from the Achelous to the shores of the Saronic gulf. Lelex was followed by Cleson and Pylas, who abdicated his crown in favour of Pandion, the son of Cecrops king of Athens, by which event Megaris became annexed to the latter state. Nisus, the son of Pandion, received Megaris as his share of his father's dominions. The history of this prince and his daughter Scylla, as also the capture of Megara by Minos, are found in all the mythological writers of Greece; but Pausanias observes that these accounts were disowned by the Megareans. Nisus is said to have founded Nisæa, the port of Megara; whence the inhabitants of that city were surnamed Nisæi, to distinguish them from the Megareans of Sicily, their colonists. Hyperion, the son of Agamemnon, according to Pausanias, was the last sovereign of Megara; after his death, the government, by the advice of an oracle, became demoeratical. As a republic, however, it remained still subject to Athens; Strabo indeed affirms that, till the reign of Codrus, Megaris had always been included within the limits of Attica; and he thus accounts for Homer's making no special mention of its inhabitants from his comprehending them with the Athenians under the general denomination of Ionians. In the reign of Codrus, Megara was wrested from the Athenians by a Peloponnesian force; and a colony having been established there by the Corinthians and Messenians, it ceased to be considered as of Ionian origin, but thenceforth became a Dorian city, both in its language and political institutions. The pillar also which marked the boundaries of Ionia and Peloponnesus was on that occasion destroyed. The Scholiast of Pindar informs us that the Corinthians at this early period, considering Megara as their colony, exercised a sort of jurisdiction over the city. Not long after, however, Theagenes, one of its citizens, usurped the sovereign power by the same method apparently which was afterwards adopted by Pisistratus at Athens. Plutarch informs us that he was finally expelled by his countrymen; after which event a moderate republican form of government was established, though afterwards it degenerated into a violent democracy. This should probably be considered as the period of Megara's greatest prosperity, since it then founded the cities of Selymbria, Mesembria, and Byzantium on the shores of the Euxine, and Megara Hyblæa in Sicily. It was at this time also that its inhabitants were engaged in war with the Athenians on the subject of Salamis, which, after an obstinate contest, finally remained in the hands of the latter. The Megareans fought at Artemisium with twenty ships, and at Salamis with the same number. They also gained some advantage over the Persians, under Mardonius, in an inroad which he made into their territory, and lastly, they sent 3000 soldiers to Platæa, who deserved well of their country in the memorable battle fought in its plains. After the Persian war, we find Megara engaged in hostilities with Corinth, and renouncing the Peloponnesian confederacy, to ally itself with Athens. This state of things was not, however, of long duration, for the Corinthians, after effecting a reconciliation with the oligarchical party in Megara, persuaded the inhabitants to declare against the Athenians, who garrisoned their city. These were presently attacked and put to the sword, with the exception of a small number who escaped to Nisæa. The Athenians, justly incensed at this treacherous conduct, renounced all intercourse with the Megareans, and issued a decree excluding them from their ports and markets; a measure which appears to have been severely felt by the latter, and was made a pretence for war on the part of their Peloponnesian allies. Megara was, during the Peloponnesian war, exposed, with the other cities of Greece, to the tumults and factions engendered by violent party spirit. The partisans of the democracy favoured, it is true, the Peloponnesian cause, but, dreading the efforts of the adverse faction, which might naturally look for support from the Lacedæmonians in restoring the government to the form of an oligarchy, they formed a plan for giving up the city to the Athenians in the seventh year of the war. An Athenian force was accordingly despatched, which appeared suddenly before Nisæa, the port of Megara, and having cut off the Peloponnesian troops which garrisoned the place, compelled them to surrender. Megara itself would also have fallen into their hands, if Brasidas had not at this juncture arrived with a Spartan army before the walls of that city, where he was presently joined by the Bœotians and other allies. On his arrival, the Athenians, not feeling sufficiently strong to hazard an action, withdrew to Nisæa, and, after leaving a garrison in that port, returned to Athens. The leaders of the democratical party in Megara now fearing that a reaction would ensue, voluntarily quitted the city, which then returned to an oligarchical form of government. From this period we hear but little of Megara in the Grecian history; but we are told that its citizens remained undisturbed by the contest in which their more powerful neighbours were engaged, and in the tranquil enjoyment of their independence. Philosophy also flourished in this city; Euclid, a disciple of Socrates, having founded there a school of some celebrity, known by the name of the Megaric sect. Plutarch reports that the Megareans offered to make Alexander the Great a citizen of their town, an honour which that prince was inclined to ridicule, though they asserted it had never been granted to any foreigner except Hercules. After the death of that monarch, Megara fell successively into the hands of Demetrius Poliorcetes, Ptolemy Soter, and Demetrius, son of Antigonus Gonatas, by whom, according to Plutarch, the city was destroyed; but as Pausanias mentions a war waged by the Megareans against Thebes, in which they were assisted by the Achæans, we may infer that it was subsequently restored, and we know that it was taken by the Romans under Metellus and F. Calenus. Strabo also affirms that Megara still existed in his time, though much reduced, as we are assured by Sulpicius in a well-known passage of his letter to Cicero. Pausanias affirms that Megara was the only city of Greece which was not restored by Hadrian, in consequence of its inhabitants having murdered Anthemocritus the Athenian herald. Alaric completed the destruction of this once flourishing town. Megara was situated at the foot of two hills, on each of which a citadel had been built; these were named Caria and Alcathous. It was connected with the port of Nisæa by two walls, the length of which was about eight stadia, or eighteen according to Strabo. They were erected by the Athenians at the time that the Megareans placed themselves under their protection. The distance from Athens was 210 stadia, as we learn from Procopius. Dio Chrysostom call it a day's journey. Modern travellers reckon eight hours." Cram. ——II. A town of Sicily, founded by a colony from Megara in Attica, about 728 years before the Christian era. It was destroyed by Gelon, king of Syracuse; and before the arrival of the Megarean colony it was called Hybla. Strab. 26, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.

Megăris, the name given to the territory of Megara. It "was confined on the west by the Corinthian gulf, on the south by the chain of mountains which separated it from the Corinthian district, and also by the waters of the Saronic gulf. On the east and north-east it bordered on Attica, and to the north on Bœotia, the chain of Cithæron being the common boundary of the two states in that direction. With the exception of the plain, in which Megara itself was situated, the country was rugged and mountainous, and, from the poverty of its soil, inadequate to the wants of the inhabitants, who must have derived their supplies from Attica and Corinth. The extent of the Megarean coast, along the Saronic gulf, from the ridge of Kerata, on the Attic frontier, to the vicinity of Crommyon, on that of Corinth, was 140 stadia according to Scylax. The same geographer reckons 100 stadia from Pagæ, the first Megarean port on the Crissæan gulf towards Bœotia, to the Corinthian frontier. The extreme breadth of the territory of Megara from Nisæa to Pagæ is estimated by Strabo at 120 stadia. According to Plutarch, Megaris was once divided into five districts or townships, named Heræa, Piræa, Megara, Cynosuria, Tripodiscus." Cram.

Megista, an island of Lycia, with a harbour of the same name. Liv. 37, c, 22.

Melanchlæni, a people near the Cimmerian Bosphorus.

Melas sinus, I. "a deep gulf formed by the Thracian coast on the north-west, and the shore of the Chersonese on the south-east; its appellation in modern geography is the Gulf of Saros. A river named Melas, now Cavalcha, empties itself into this bay at its north-eastern extremity." Cram.——II. A river of Thessaly, about 20 stadia from the river Dyras, and 5 from the city of Trachis.——III. A river of Bœotia, "near Orchomenus, which empties itself in the Copaic or Cephissian lake. Plutarch says it rose close to the city, and very soon became navigable, but that part of it was lost in the marshes, the remainder joined the Cephissus. Pliny remarks of its waters that they had the property of dying the fleece of sheep black. In the marshes formed near the junction of this river with the Cephissus grew the reeds so much esteemed by the ancient Greeks for the purpose of making flutes and other wind instruments." Cram.——IV. A river of Cappadocia, which issued from mount Argæus, now Argeh-dag. The Melas, now Koremoz, is "also called by the Turks Karasou, 'the Black water,' in conformity to its Greek denomination of Melas." D'Anville.——V. A river of Pamphylia.

Meldæ, or Meldorum urbs, a city of Gaul, now Meaux in Champagne.

Meles (ētis,) a river of Asia Minor, in Ionia near Smyrna. Some of the ancients supposed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumstance they call him Melesigenes, and his compositions Meletæ chartæ. It is even supported that he composed his poems in a cave near the source of that river. Strab. 12.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 7, v. 34.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 201.—Paus. 7, c. 5.

Mĕlĭbœa, I. a town of Thessaly, "ascribed by Homer to Philoctetes. This town according to Livy, stood at the base of mount Ossa, in that part which stretches towards the plains of Thessaly above Demetrias. It was attacked in the Macedonian war by M. Popilius, a Roman commander, at the head of five thousand men; but the garrison being reinforced by a detachment from the army of Perseus, the enterprise was abandoned. We know from Apollonius that it was a maritime town." Cram.——II. Also an island at the mouth of the Orontes in Syria, whence Melibœa purpura. Mel. 2, c. 3.

Melignūnis, one of the Æolian islands near Sicily.

Melita, I. an island in the Libyan Sea, between Sicily and Africa, now called Malta. The soil was fertile, and the country famous for its wool. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians. St. Paul was shipwrecked there, and cursed all venomous creatures, which now are not to be found in the whole island. Some, however, suppose that the island on which the Apostle was shipwrecked, was another island of the same name in the Adriatic, on the coast of Illyricum, now called Melede. Malta is now remarkable as being the residence of the knights of Malta, formerly of St. John of Jerusalem, settled there A. D. 1530, by the concession of Charles V. after their expulsion from Rhodes by the Turks. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 46.——II. Another on the coast of Illyricum in the Adriatic, now Melede. Plin. 3, c. 26.

Melitene, a part of Armenia Minor, one of the greatest prefectures of the country. "The principal Roman camp in Melitene took the form of a city under Trajan, with the same name; and in the division of the less Armenia into two provinces, Melitene became the metropolis of the second. Situated between the rivers Euphrates and Melas, which last may have thus denominated the country, it subsists in the name of Malaria; and, in its jurisdiction, a city called Arca is known under the same name." D'Anville.

Mella, or Mela, a small river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Allius, and with it into the Po. Catull. 68, v. 33.—Virg. G. 4, v. 278.

Melos, now Milo, an island between Crete and Peloponnesus, about 24 miles from Schyllæum, about 60 miles in circumference. It enjoyed its independence for above 700 years before the time of the Peloponnesian war. This island was originally peopled by a Lacedæmonian colony, 1116 years before the Christian era. From this reason the inhabitants refused to join the rest of the islands and the Athenians against the Peloponnesians. This refusal was severely punished. The Athenians took Melos, and put to the sword all such as were able to bear arms. The women and children were made slaves and the island left desolate. An Athenian colony re-peopled it, till Lysander reconquered it, and re-established the original inhabitants in their possessions. The island produced a kind of earth successfully employed in painting and medicine. Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 35, c. 9.—Thucyd. 2, &c.

Melpes, now Melpa, a river of Lucania, falling into the Tyrrhene Sea. Plin. 3, c. 5.

Memphis, "which owed its foundation to a king in the first ages of Ægypt named Uchoreus, was a city predominant over all in Ægypt before Alexandria was elevated to this advantage, and was situated on the western shore of the Nile, three schênes, or fifteen miles, above the Delta. These indications are the only means afforded us of ascertaining its position. A considerable lapse of time had so impaired this great city when Strabo wrote, that he saw its palaces in ruins. It existed nevertheless about six hundred years after; for, on the invasion of Ægypt by the Arabs, it appears under the name of the country itself, or Mesr. But vestiges of it, which, according to Abulfeda, were apparent in the fifteenth century, are no longer in being. Divers canals derived from the Nile, separating Memphis from the ancient sepulchres and pyramids, furnished the Greeks with the idea of their infernal rivers Acheron, Cocytus, and Lethe. On the bank of the Nile, opposite to Memphis, a place which it is pretended was named Troja by the Trojans who followed Menelaus into Egypt, is now indicated by the analogous name of Tora." (D'Anville.) We extract the following from Russell's History of Egypt. "We should willingly detain the reader at Memphis, did any relics of its magnificence occupy the ground on which it once stood, to gratify the rational curiosity its name cannot fail to excite. But we shall only quote from an old writer a description of that capital as it appeared in the twelfth century. 'Among the monuments of the power and genius of the ancients,' says Edrisi, 'are the remains still extant in old Misr or Memphis. That city, a little above Fostat, in the province of Djizeh, was inhabited by the Pharoahs, and is the ancient capital of the kingdom of Egypt. Such it continued to be till ruined by Bokhtnasr (Nebuchadnezzar); but many years afterward, when Alexander had built Iskanderiyeh (Alexandria), this latter place was made the metropolis of Egypt, and retained that pre-eminence till the Moslems conquered the country under Amru ebn el Aasi, who transferred the seat of government to Fostat. At last El Moezz came from the west and built El Cahirah (Cairo), which has ever since been the royal place of residence. But let us return to the description of Memf, also called old Misr. Not withstanding the vast extent of this city, the remote period at which it was built, the change of the dynasties to which it has been subjected, the attempts made by various nations to destroy even the vestiges, and to obliterate every trace of it by removing the stones and materials of which it was formed,—ruining its houses, and defacing its sculptures; notwithstanding all this, combined with what more than four thousand years must have done towards its destruction, there are yet found in it works so wonderful that they confound even a reflecting mind, and are such as the most eloquent would not be able to describe. The more you consider them, the more does your astonishment increase; and the more you look at them the more pleasure you experience. Every idea which they suggest immediately gives birth to some other still more novel and unexpected; and as soon as you imagine that you have traced out their full scope, you discover that there is something still greater behind.' Among the works here alluded to, he specifies a monolithic temple, similar to the one mentioned by Herodotus, adorned with curious sculptures. He next expatiates upon the idols found among the ruins, not less remarkable for the beauty of their forms, the exactness of their proportions, and perfect resemblance to nature, than for their truly astonishing dimensions. We measured one of them, he says, which, without including the pedestal, was forty-five feet in height, fifteen feet from side to side, and from back to front in the same proportion. It was of one block of red granite, covered with a coating of red varnish, the antiquity of which seemed only to increase its lustre. The ruins of Memphis, in his time, extended to the distance of half a day's journey in every direction. But so rapidly has the work of destruction proceeded since the twelfth century, that few points have been more debated by modern travellers than the site of this celebrated metropolis. Dr. Pocoke and Mr. Bruce, with every show of reason, fixed upon Metrahenny, an opinion which was opposed by Dr. Shaw, who argued in favour of Djizeh. But the investigations of the French appear to have decided the question. At Metrhainé, one league from Sakhara, we found, says General Dugna, so many blocks of granite covered with hieroglyphics and sculptures around and within an esplanade three leagues in circumference, enclosed by heaps of rubbish, that we were convinced that these must be the ruins of Memphis. The sight of some fragments of one of those colossuses, which Herodotus says were erected by Sesostris at the entrance of the temple of Vulcan, would, indeed, have been sufficient to dispel our doubts had any remained. The wrist of this colossus, which Citizen Contelle caused to be removed, shows that it must have been forty-five feet high."

Menapii, a people of Belgic Gaul, partly Belgic, partly German. In regard to their territory, some difficulty has arisen in consequence of the apparently conflicting statements of ancient writers. Cæsar tells us "that the Usipetes and Tenctheri came to the Rhine, where he Menapii dwelt, and where they possessed ands, houses, and villages, on either side of the river." Strabo agrees with Cæsar, saying that he Menapii inhabited woods and marshes on either side of the mouths of the Rhine; and that upon the borders of the sea they were adjoining the Morini. But Tacitus removes the Menapii from the Rhine, and places them this side the Mosa. Ptolemy too fixes the Menapii at the mouth of the Mosa; and Pliny classes them, not with the nations that bordered upon the Rhine, but with the Belgæ, and places them between the Mosa and the Scaldis. Perhaps Cæsar, in giving to the Menapii such an extensive territory, included under the same name several tribes of common origin and of the same habits of life. The Menapii, accordingly, were bounded on the north by the Mosa and the Rhine; on the east by the Rhine and various German nations; on the south by the Eburones and Ambivareti; and on the west by the sea and the marshes between the mouths of the Scaldis and the Mosa. They were very rude, and were Germans rather than Gauls. The city, or rather strong hold of the Menapii, is now Kessel, on the Mosa. If we follow Cæsar and Strabo, the Menapii occupied that part of Belgica which is now la Gueldre, le duché de Clèves et le Brabant Hollandais. Cæs. Lem. ed.

Mendes, a city of Egypt, near Lycopolis, on one of the mouths of the Nile called the Mendesian mouth. Pan, under the form of a goat, was worshipped there.

Menĕlăi Portus, a harbour on the coast of Africa, between Cyrene and Egypt. C. Nep. in Ages. 8.—Strab. 1.——Mons, a hill near Sparta, with a fortication, called Menelaium. Liv. 34, c. 28.

Menesthĕi portus, a town of Hispania Bætica.

Meninx, Lotophagitis insula, afterwards Girba, now Zerbi, an island on the coast of Africa, near the Syrtis Minor. It was peopled by the people of Neritos, and thence called Neritia. The tree, called Lotus, gave this island one of its names. Plin. 5, c. 7.—Strab. 17.—Sil. It. 3, v. 318.

Mennis, a town of Assyria, abounding in bitumen. Curt. 5, c. 1.

Mercurii promontorium, a cape of Africa, near Clypea. Liv. 26, c. 44, l. 29, c. 27.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

Meroe, a country of Æthiopia, which the ancients believed to be an island. "Two rivers, which the Nile received successively on the eastern side, Astapus and Astaboras, would indeed insulate Meroe, if these rivers had communication above. The latter is named in Abyssinia, Tacazzé. At its confluence with the Nile, a city indicated by the Arabian geographers in the name of Ialac, should represent Meroe, according to the position which Ptolemy assigns to it. But we find a distance given from Ialac to ascend by the Nile to this city; whose name, in the Arabian geography of Edrisi, is Nuabia, and common also to the country, as Meroe was in antiquity." D'Anville. We subjoin the opinion of Malte-Brun in reference to this ancient empire. "Ascending to the confluence of the great Nile with the Nile of Abyssinia, we enter the territories of the kingdom of Sennaar, which occupy the space assigned by the ancients to the famous empire of Meroe, the origin of which is lost amidst the darkness of antiquity. Many writers, both ancient and modern, have considered it as the cradle of all the religious and political institutions of Egypt, and it must at least be admitted to have been a very civilized and a very powerful state. Bruce thought that he saw the ruins of its capital under the village of Shandy, opposite to the isle of Kurgos. The distances given by Herodotus and Eratosthenes coincide very well with that position; and the island which, according to Pliny, formed the port of Meroe, is found to correspond with equal probability." Malte-Brun.

Meros, a mountain of India sacred to Jupiter. It is called by Pliny, 6, c. 21, Nysa. Bacchus was educated upon it; whence arose the fable that Bacchus was confined in the thigh (μηρος) of his father. This mountain, now called Merou, is said to correspond with the ancient Meros. If the position of the latter was as uncertain as that of the former is, D'Anville has rested his decision in regard to the position of Nysa on a very unsafe foundation. The Bagavedam, one of the canonical books of the Indians, tells us, that in the middle of the earth is a great isle, named Jambam or Jambou, in the midst of which is mount Merou. Again, he says that Merou is for six months perpetually illumined by the sun, and again for the same period involved in darkness. The Ezour-Vedam, an ancient commentary on the Vedam, written in Sanscrit, and translated by a Brahmin of Benares, places mount Merou at the mouth of the Ganges, and makes the latter flow from the former. The mountain is said to be in the centre of the earth, and to be of a prodigious height. Bayer observes, that in the Indian geography entitled Puwana-Saccarain, mount Merou is described in a fabulous manner; on the whole, there is little doubt that it exists only in the imaginations of the Indians. Chaussard.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 13.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Diod.

Messapius. "Above Anthedon, towards the interior of Bœotia, rises mount Ktypia, the ancient Messapus, so called, as it was reported, from Messapius, who afterwards headed a colony which established itself in Iapygia. Stephanus improperly assigns it to Eubœa." Cram.

Mesembria, now Mesevria, a maritime city of Thrace. Hence Mesembriacus. Ovid. I, Trist. 6, v. 37.

Mesopotamia. "The name of Mesopotamia is known to denote a country between rivers; and in the books of the Pentateuch this is called Aram-Naharaim, or Syria of the Rivers. It is also known that these rivers are the Euphrates and the Tigris, which embrace this country in its whole length, and contract it by their approximation in the lower or southern part, which is contiguous to Babylon. From this situation it has acquired the name of al-Gezira among the Arabs, who have no specific term to distinguish a peninsula from an island. We cannot forbear remarking here, that it is through ignorance that this country is called Diarbek in the maps. For not only should this name be written Diar-Bekr, but it should also be restrained to the northern extremity, which Armenia claims in antiquity. This part corresponds with what the oriental geographers call Diar Modzar on the side of the Euphrates, and Diar-Rabiah on the banks of the Tigris. On the north there reigns a mountainous chain, which from the passage of the Euphrates through mount Taurus extends to the borders of the Tigris. This is the mount Masius of antiquity, and now known among the Turks by the plural appellation of Karadgia Daglar, or the Black Mountains. A river, called Chaboras, which preserves the name of al Kabour, and augmented by another river, to which the Macedonians of Syria have given the name of Mygdonius, proceeds to join the Euphrates at Circesium, a frontier fortress of the Roman empire. The lower part of the country, distant from the rivers, being less cultivated and more sterile than the upper, could be only occupied by Arabs called Scenites, or inhabiting tents. The district of Mesopotamia, which is only separated from Syria by the course of the Euphrates, bore the name of Osroene, which it owed to Osroes, or, according to the chronicles of the country, Orrhoes; who, profiting by the feebleness of the Seleucides, caused by their divisions, acquired a principality, about a hundred and twenty years before the Christian era." (D'Anville.) It is worthy of notice, that Mesopotamia, though again and again the scene of hostile action between contending nations, has never been distinguished by a display of independence on the part of its inhabitants, who are of no importance in history. They were successively subjected to the Babylonians, Assyrians, Medes, and Persians. Afterwards they were conquered by the Romans under Pompey, but the country was not reduced to the form of a province till the reign of Trajan. From the hands of the Romans, it passed again into the possession of the Persians; and, having been subsequently conquered by the Saracens, is now under the dominion of the Turks. (Vid. Heyl. Cosm.) "Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, though greatly neglected by modern geographers, have a good claim to our careful attention. It was in this country that the first towns known in history were built, and the first kingdoms formed. It was here that Alexander gave the mortal blow to the colossal monarchy of Persia. At a later period, the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates became the bloody theatre where Trajan, Julian, and Heraclius conducted the Roman legions against the squadrons of invincible Parthia. In modern times, the Osmanlis and the Sophis, the sect of Omar and that of Ali, are still two great powers who dispute the mastery of these countries. Nature has here presented us with a sufficient number of objects both of interest and study, independently of the transactions of men and their transient power. There are few countries of the globe where, in so small a space, so many striking contrasts are found united. Within an extent of ten degrees of latitude, we have at Bagdad a heat equal to that of Senegambia, and on the summit of Ararat, eternal snows. The forests of firs and oaks in Mesopotamia join those of palms and orange trees. The roaring of the lions of Arabia echoes to the howling of the bears of mount Taurus. We might indeed say, that Africa and Siberia had here given each other a meeting. This near approach of climates so opposite, principally arises from the great differences which are found in elevation. Armenia, which is a very elevated plain, is encompassed on all sides by lofty mountains." Malte-Brun.

Messana, an ancient and celebrated town of Sicily, on the straits which separate Italy from Sicily. It was anciently called Zancle, and was founded 1600 years before the Christian era. The inhabitants, being continually exposed to the depredations of the people of Cuma, implored the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Messenians entered Zancle, and lived in such intimacy with the inhabitants, that they changed their name, and assumed that of the Messenians, and called their city Messana. Another account says, that Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, made war against the Zancleans with the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnessus; and that after he had obtained a decisive victory, he called the conquered city Messana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the Christian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took possession of it, and made it the capital of the neighbouring country. Vid. Mamertini. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for some time the chief of their possessions in Sicily. The inhabitants were called Messenii, Messanienses, and Mamertini. The straits of Messana have always been looked upon as very dangerous, especially by the ancients, on account of the rapidity of the currents and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the sea. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Diod, 4.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot. 6, c. 23, l. 7, c. 28.

Ithome, now Vourkano, the ruins of Messene, founded by Epaminondas. Pausanias informs us that the walls of this city were the strongest he had ever seen, being entirely of stone, and well supplied with towers and buttresses. He commences his description of the interior with the agora, which was adorned with a statue of Jupiter Servator and a fountain: a statue of Cybele in Parian marble by Damophon, a Messenian sculptor of some celebrity, and the temples of Neptune and Venus: beyond were those of Ilithya and Ceres, the hall of the Curetes, and the statues of Castor and Pollux bearing away the daughters of Leucippus. But none of the sacred edifices were so richly adorned with works of sculpture as the temple of Æsculapius, which contained statues of the Muses and Apollo, Hercules, the city of Thebes, Epaminondas, Fortune, and Diana Lucifera. The temple of Messene, daughter of Triopas, was embellished with the portraits of the ancient Messenian kings and heroes by Omphalion, a pupil of Nicias. The Hierothysion contained images of all the gods worshipped by the Greeks, and a brazen statue of Epaminondas. Those of Mercury, Hercules, and Theseus, which adorned the gymnasium, were by Egyptian artists. Within this building was to be seen the tomb of Aristomenes, whose remains were, by the advice of the Pythian oracle, conveyed thither from Rhodes, where he died. The statue of this Messenian hero was erected in the stadium. Near the theatre was a temple of Serapis and Isis. The citadel was situated on mount Ithome, celebrated in history for the long and obstinate defence which the Messenians there made against the Spartans in their last revolt. Another summit, called Evan, separated Messene towards the east from the valley of the Pamisus. Its modern name is not mentioned by sir W. Gell, who makes use of the ancient appellation of Evan. The ruins of Messene are visible as we learn from the same antiquary, at Mauromati, a small village, with a beautiful source under Ithome in the centre of the ancient city. There are considerable vestiges of the walls and gates. The architrave of one of these is nineteen feet long. It was placed between two towers, thirty-three feet distant from each other. These remains, as well as the walls, are composed of magnificent blocks. The latter are in fine preservation, running up mount Ithome, and enclosing a vast extent of ground. The inner gates were divided so as to afford a separate passage for persons on foot, and a road for carriages." Cram.

Messenia, a large country of the Peloponnesus; "the river Neda formed its boundary towards Elis and Arcadia. From the latter country it was further divided by an irregular line of mountains, extending in a south-easterly direction to the chain of Taygetus on the Laconian border. This celebrated range marked the limits of the province to the east, as far as the source of the little river Pamisus, which completed the line of separation from the Spartan territory to the south. We learn from Pausanias that Messenia derived its appellation from Messene, wife of Polycaon, one of the earliest sovereigns of the country. He also observes, that whenever this name occurs in Homer it denotes the province rather than the city of Messene, which he conceives did not exist till the time of Epaminondas. At the period of the Trojan war, it appears from the poet that Messenia was partly under the domination of Menelaus, and partly under that of Nestor. In the division of Peloponnesus, made after the return of the Heraclidæ, Messenia fell to the share of Cresphontes, son of Aristodemus, with whom commenced the Dorian line, which continued without interruption for several generations. In the reign of Phintias an event occurred which interrupted the harmony that till then had subsisted between the Messenians and Spartans. During the festival of Diana, which was celebrated at Limnæa, on the confines of the two countries, the Messenians are said to have offered violence to some Spartan maids, and to have also slain Teleclus king of Lacedæmon, who attempted to punish the authors of this flagrant outrage. On the other hand, the Messenians denied the charge preferred against them, and accused the Spartans of having disguised armed youths in female attire with the intention of attacking their territory whilst unprepared to resist such an aggression. These differences in the following reign led to an open rupture, and war was commenced on the part of the Lacedæmonians by the surprise and capture of Amphea, a border town of Messenia in the second year of the ninth Olympiad." Cram. The result of this war, in which the Messenians were greatly worsted, and of another which broke out some years afterwards, reduced Messenia to the condition of a dependancy, and Sparta extended her law over the conquered territory. "The Messenians, who inhabited the western coast, embarked on board their ships, and withdrew to Cyllene; whence they afterwards crossed over to Sicily, at the instigation of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, and occupied Zancle, thenceforth called Messene. Aristomenes retired to Rhodes, where he continued during the rest of his life. The Messenians who remained in their country were treated with the greatest severity by the Spartans, and reduced to the condition of Helots or slaves. This cruel oppression induced them once more to take up arms, in the seventy-ninth Olympiad, and fortify mount Ithome, where they defended themselves for ten years. The Lacedæmonians being at this time so greatly reduced in numbers by an earthquake, which destroyed several of their towns, that they were compelled to have recourse to their allies for assistance. At length the Messenians, worn out by this protracted siege, agreed to surrender the place on condition that they should be allowed to retire from the Peloponnesus. The Athenians were at this time on no friendly terms with the Spartans, and gladly received the refugees of Ithome, allowing them to settle at Naupactus, which they had lately taken from the Locri Ozolæ. Grateful for the protection thus afforded to them, the Messenians displayed great zeal in the cause of Athens during the Peloponnesian war. Thucydides has recorded several instances in which they rendered important services to that power, not only at Naupactus, but in Ætolia and Amphilochia, at Pylos, and in the island of Sphacteria, as well as in the Sicilian expedition. When, however, the disaster of Ægospotamoi placed Athens at the mercy of her rival, the Spartans obtained possession of Naupactus, and compelled the Messenians to quit a town which had so long afforded them refuge. Many of these on this occasion crossed over into Sicily to join their countrymen, who were established there, and others sailed to Africa, where they procured settlements among the Evesperitæ, a Libyan people. After the battle of Leuctra, however, which humbled the pride of Sparta, and paved the way for the ascendency of Thebes, Epaminondas, who directed the counsels of the latter republic, with masterly policy determined to restore the Messenian nation, by collecting the scattered remnants of this brave and warlike people. He accordingly despatched emissaries to Sicily, Italy, and Africa, whither the Messenians had migrated, to recall them to their ancient homes, there to enjoy the blessings of peace and liberty, under the powerful protection of Thebes, Argos, and Arcadia. Gladly did they obey the summons of the Theban general, and hastened to return to that country, the recollection of which they had ever fondly cherished. Epaminondas meanwhile had made every preparation for the erection of a city under mount Ithome, which was to be the metropolis of Messenia; and such was the zeal and activity displayed by the Thebans and their allies in this great undertaking, that the town, which they named Messene, was completed and fortified in eighty-five days. The entrance of the Messenians, which took place in the fourth year of the 102d Olympiad, was attended with great pomp, and the celebration of solemn sacrifices, and devout invocations to their gods and heroes: the lapse of 287 years from the capture of Ira, and the termination of the second war, having, as Pausanias affirms, made no change in their religion, their national customs, or their language, which, says that historian, they speak even now more correctly than the rest of the Peloponnesians. During the wars and revolutions which agitated Greece, upon the death of Alexander they still preserved their independence, and having, not long after that event, joined the Achæan confederacy, they were present at the battle of Sellasia, and the capture of Sparta by Antigonus Doson. Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, made another attack on the city by night some years afterwards, and had already penetrated within the walls, when succours arriving from Megalopolis under the command of Philopœmen, he was forced to evacuate the place. Subsequently to this event, dissensions appear to have arisen, which ultimately led to a rupture between the Achæans and Messenians. Pausanias was not able to ascertain the immediate provocation, which induced the Achæans to declare war against the Messenians. But Polybius does not scruple to blame his countrymen, and more especially Philopœmen, for their conduct to a people with whom they were united by federal ties. Hostilities commenced unfavourably for the Achæans, as their advanced guard fell into an ambuscade of the enemy, and was defeated with great loss; Philopœmen himself remaining in the hands of the victors. So exasperated were the Messenians at the conduct of this celebrated general, that he was thrown into a dungeon, and soon after put to death by poison. His destroyers, however, did not escape the vengeance of the Achæans; for Lycortas, who succeeded to the command, having defeated the Messenian forces, captured their city, and caused all those who had been concerned in the death of Philopœmen to be immediately executed. Peace was then restored, and Messenia once more joined the Achæan confederacy, and remained attached to that republic till the period of its dissolution. Messenia, though in some parts a mountainous country, abounded in rich and well-watered plains, which furnished pasturage for numerous herds and flocks." Cram.

MESÚLA, a town of Italy, in the country of the Sabines.

METAPONTUM, a town of Lucania, to the south of the river Bradanus, "one of the most distinguished and celebrated of the Grecian colonies. The original name of this city appears to have been Metabum, which it is said was derived from Metabus, a hero to whom divine honours were paid. Some reports ascribed its foundation to a party of Pylians, on their return from Troy; and as a proof of this fact it was remarked, that the Metapontini formerly made an annual sacrifice to the Neleidæ. The prosperity of this ancient colony, the result of its attention to agriculture, was evinced by the offering of a harvest of gold to the oracle of Delphi. It may be remarked also, that the Scholiasts of Homer identify Metapontum with the city which that poet calls Alyba in the Odyssey.

Εἰμὶ γὰρ ἐξ Ἀλόβαντος, ὅθι κλυτὰ δώματα ναίω.

Other traditions are recorded relative to the foundation of Metapontum by Strabo, which confirm at least its great antiquity. But his account of the destruction of the first town by the Samnites is obscure, and not to be clearly understood. It appears, however, that Metabum, if such was its name, was in a deserted state when a number of Achæans, invited for that purpose by the Sybarites, landed on the coast, and took possession of the town, which thenceforth was called Metapontum. The Achæans, soon after their arrival, seem to have been engaged in a war with the Tarentini, and this led to a treaty by which the Bradanus was recognised as forming the separation of the two territories. Pythagoras was held in particular estimation by the Metapontini, in whose city he is reported to have resided for many years. After his death, the house which he had inhabited was converted into a temple of Ceres. In the Peloponnesian war, we find an alliance formed between Metapontum and Athens to which power it furnished some light troops and two galleys for the Sicilian expedition. This city still retained its independence when Alexander of Epirus passed over into Italy. Livy, who notices that fact, states, that the remains of this unfortunate prince were conveyed here previous to their being carried over into Greece. It fell, however, ultimately, into the hands of the Romans, together with the other colonies of Magna Græcia, on the retreat of Pyrrhus, and with them revolted in favour of Hannibal, after his victory at Cannæ. In the time of Pausanias this city was a heap of ruins; as he states that nothing remained standing but the walls and theatre." Cram.

METAURUS, I. now Metauro, a river of Umbria, which rises in the Appenines and empties into the Hadriatic near Fanum Fortunæ, Fano. It is rendered memorable by the defeat of Asdrubal, A. U. C. 545.——II. Another in the Brutian territory, now called Mano, and sometimes Petlace, with a port of the same name. It was famed for the thunny fish taken at its mouth. Cram.

Methone, I. a city of Macedonia, "about forty stadia north of Pydna, according to the Epitomist of Strabo, celebrated in history from the circumstance of Philip's having lost an eye in besieging the place. That it was a Greek colony, we learn from Scylax, Peripl. and also Plutarch, who reports, that a party of Eretrians settled there, naming the place Methone, from Methon, an ancestor of Orpheus: he adds, that these Greek colonists were termed Aposphendoneti by the natives. It appears from Athenæus, that Aristotle wrote an account of the Methonæan commonwealth. This town was occupied by the Athenians, towards the latter end of the Peloponnesian war, with a view of annoying Perdiccas by ravaging his territory, and affording a refuge to his discontented subjects. When Philip, the son of Amyntas, succeeded to the crown, the Athenians, who still held Methone, landed there three thousand men, in order to establish Argæus on the throne of Macedon: they were however defeated by the young prince, and driven back to Methone. Several years after, Philip, laid siege to this place, which at the end of twelve months capitulated. The inhabitants having evacuated the town, the walls were razed to the ground. There was another Methone in Thessaly, noticed by Homer, and which must not be confounded with the Macedonian city, an error into which Stephanus Byz. seems to have fallen. Dr. Clarke and Dr. Holland concur in supposing that the site of Methone answers to that of Leuterochori, the distance from that place to Kitros, or Pydna, agreeing with the forty stadia reckoned by Strabo." Cram.——II. A city of Messenia, on the coast to the south of Coryphasium and Pylos. It was otherwise styled Mothone, according to Pausanias. Tradition reported that it was so called from Mothone the daughter of Æneas, but it more probably derived its name from the rock Mothon, which formed the break-water of its harbour. Strabo informs us, that in the opinion of many writers Methone should be identified with Pedasus, ranked by Homer among the seven towns which Agamemnon offered to Achilles. Pausanias makes the same observation. In the Peloponnesian war, Methone was attacked by some Athenian troops, who were conveyed thither in a fleet sent to ravage the coast of Peloponnesus; but Brasidas, who was quartered in the neighbourhood, having forced his way through the enemy's line, threw himself into the town with 100 men: which timely succour obliged the Athenians to re-embark their troops. Methone subsequently received a colony of Nauplians: these, being expelled their native city by the Argives, were established here by the Lacedæmonians. Many years after, it sustained great loss from the sudden attack of some Illyrian pirates, who carried off a number of the inhabitants, both men and women. Methone was afterwards besieged and taken by Agrippa, who had the command of a Roman fleet: that general having found there Bogus, king of Mauretania, caused him to be put to death as a partisan of Marc Antony. We learn from Pausanias that Trajan especially favoured this town, and bestowed several privileges on its inhabitants. The same writer notices here a temple of Minerva Anemotis, and another sacred to Diana, containing a well, whose water, mingled with pitch, resembled in scent and colour the ointment of Cyzicus. Sir W. Gell states that at about 2700 paces to the east of Modon, is a place called Palaio Mothone, where are the vestiges of a city, with a citadel, and a few marbles. Modon is a Greek town of some size, with a fortress built by the Venitians." Cram.——III. "Methone, or Methana, which retains its ancient name, was a peninsula in Argolis, within the Trœzenian district, formed by the harbour or bay of Pogon on one side, and the curvature of the Epidaurian gulf on the other. It was connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, which the Athenians occupied and fortified in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian war. Diodorus Siculus says it was taken by the same people under Tolmides in the interval between the Persian and Peloponnesian wars: and this is perhaps the meaning of Thucydides when he says, that on peace being made, or rather a truce for thirty years, Trœzen, among other, towns, was restored to the Peloponnesians. Within the peninsula was a small town, also called Methone, which possessed a temple of Isis; the forum was decorated with statues of Mercury and Hercules, About thirty stadia from the town were to be seen some hot springs, produced by the eruption of a volcano in the reign of Antigonus Gopatas. Strabo writes, that on this occasion 'a mountain was raised by the action of this subterraneous fire to the height of seven stadia; in the day-time the spot cannot be approached from the heat and sulphureous stench; but at night there is no unpleasant smell, the light is then reflected very far, and the heat thrown out is so great, that the sea boils at the distance of five stadia from the land, and its waters are troubled for twenty stadia; great fragments of rock have also been raised from its bed to a height equalling that of towers.' Ovid, who alludes to the same phenomenon in his Metamorphoses, seems to attribute it to the force of subterraneous winds; Dodwell says, 'that the mountainous promontory of Methana consists chiefly of a volcanic rock of a dark colour. The outline is grand and picturesque, and the principal mountain, which was thrown up by the volcano, is of a conical form. Its apparent height is about equal to that of Vesuvius. The ancient city of Methone,' according to the same learned antiquary, 'was situated in the plain at the foot of its acropolis, near which are a few remains of two edifices, one of the Doric, the other of the Ionic order, composed of white marble, and of small proportions. The walls of the acropolis are regularly constructed and well preserved, extending round the edge of the rock, which in some places rises about thirty feet above the plain.'" Cram.

Methymna, (now Porto Petera), a town of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from a daughter of Macareus. It is the second city of the island in greatness, population, and opulence, and its territory is fruitful, and the wines it produces excellent. It was the native place of Arion. When the whole island of Lesbos revolted from the power of the Athenians, Methymna alone remained firm to its ancient allies. Diod. 5.—Thucyd. 3.—Horat. 2, Sat. 8, c. 50.—*Virg. MEVANIA, a town of Umbria. "Strabo mentions Mavania as one of the most considerable places of that district. Here Vitellius took post, as if determined to make a last stand for the empire against Vespasian, but soon after withdrew his forces. If its walls, as Pliny says, were of brick, it could not be capable of much resistance. This city is farther memorable as the birth-place of Propertius, a fact of which he himself informs us. It is now an obscure village, which still however retains some traces of the original name in that of Bevagna." Cram.

MILÉTIUM, I. a town of Calabria, built by the people of Miletus of Asia.——II. A town of Crete. Homer. Il. 2, v. 154.

MILÉTUS, a celebrated town of Asia Minor, the capital of all Ionia, situate about ten stadia south of the mouth of the river Mæander, near the sea-coast on the confines of Ionia and Caria. "Doubts are entertained as to the situation of ancient Miletus. Spon, the traveller, having found at Palatsha certain inscriptions bearing the name of the Milesians, imagined that he had discovered the ruins of the ancient city. Chandler, setting out upon such data, sought in vain for the Latmian Gulf, with the cities of Myus, Heraclea, and others situated upon its shores. He supposed that this gulf was represented by the lake Ufa-Bassi, and that the low grounds which separate that lake from the sea owed their formation to the accumulated deposites of the Meander. This hypothesis, which is not very intelligibly stated by its author, has found a formidable opponent in an ingenious German, who considers the ruins of Palatsha as those of Myus, a small town incorporated with Miletus, the inhabitants of which, on that account were called Milesians. This learned man thinks that Ufa-Bassi is the lake which, according to Pausanias, was formed by the sinking down of the soil near Myus. The ruins of Miletus and the Latmian gulf should be sought for more to the south and the west. But the modifications which a skilful French geographer has recently introduced into the plans of Chandler, and the very accurate maps of M. de Choiseul-Gouffier, seem to establish the fact that alluvial additions have been made to the land posterior to those mentioned by Strabo and Pausanias. The lake of Ufa-Bassi appears, from decided marks, to be the ancient Latmian Gulf; the ruins of Miletus, however, must lie farther to the west than Palatsha. This interesting question does not seem to us to have yet received an exact and perfect solution. Malte-Brun. It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus, the son of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's son. It has successively been called Lelegeis, Pithyusa, and Anactoria. The inhabitants, called Milesii, were very powerful, and long maintained an obstinate war against the kings of Lydia. They early applied themselves to navigation, and planted no less than 80 colonies, or, according to Seneca, 380, in different parts of the world. Miletus gave birth to Thales, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Hecatæus, Timotheus the musician, Pittacus, one of the seven wise men, &c. Miletus was also famous for a temple and an oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and for its excellent wool, with which were made stuffs and garments, held in the highest reputation, both for softness, elegance, and beauty. The words Milesiæ fabulæ, or Milesiaca, were used to express wanton and ludicrous plays. Ovid. Trist. 2. v. 413.—Capitolin. in Alb. 11.—*Virg. MILVIUS. "About two miles from Rome, we find on the Tiber a bridge, called Pons Milvius, or Mulvius, a name which has been corrupted into that of Ponte Molle. Its construction is ascribed to M. Æmilius Scaurus, who was censor A. U. C. 644. We learn from Cicero, that the Pons Milvius existed at the time of Catiline's conspiracy, since the deputies of the Allobroges were here seized by his orders. In later times it witnessed the defeat of Maxentius by Constantine. About a mile from the bridge, at the point where the Flaminian and Clodian Ways branched off, were the gardens of Ovid." Cram.

MINÆI, a people of Arabia Felix, contiguous to the Sabæi. "They were sufficiently conspicuous to give to their country the name of Minæa, and had for their capital Carana, whose name is preserved in that of Almakarama; which is a strong fortress." D'Anville.

MINCIUS, now Mincio, a river of Venetia, flowing from the lake Benacus, and falling into the Po. Virgil was born on its banks. Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 13, G. 3, v. 15. Æn. 10, v. 206.

MINIO, now Mignone, a river of Etruria, falling into the Tyrrhene Sea. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 183.

MINTURNÆ, a town of Latium, on the banks of the Liris, three or four miles from its mouth, the situation of which is sufficiently indicated by the extensive ruins that remain. It was originally a town of the Ausones, and fell, about the year of the city 456, into the hands of the Romans, who sent thither a colony. It was in the marshes near this place that Marius concealed himself in the mud to avoid the partisans of Sylla. The people condemned him to death, but when his voice alone had terrified the executioner, they showed themselves compassionate and favoured his escape. Marica was worshipped there; hence maricæ regna applied to the place. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 8 c. 10, l. 10, c. 21, l. 27, c. 38.—Paterc. 2, c. 14.—Lucan. 2, v. 424.

Minyæ, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenos in Bœotia, from Minyas, king of the country. Orchomenos, the son of Minyas, gave his name to the capital of the country, and the inhabitants still retained their original appellation in contradistinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians passed into Thessaly, and settled in Iolchos; from which circumstance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyæ. This name they received, according to the opinion of some, not because a number of Orchomenians had settled among them, but because the chief and noblest of them were descended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the sons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The descendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themselves, received the name of Minyæ. They first inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands. They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelasgi about 1160 years before the Christian era, and came to settle in Laconia, from whence they passed into Calliste with a colony of Lacedæmonians. Hygin. fab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 6.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Herodot. 4, c. 145.

Mitylene, and Mitylenæ, the capital city of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from Mitylene, the daughter of Macareus, a king of the country. It was greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings and the fruitfulness of its soil, but more particularly for the great men it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophanes, Hellenicus, &c. were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honour of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peloponnesian war the Mityleneans suffered greatly for their revolt from th power of Athens; and in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. Cic. de leg. ag.—Strab. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Diod. 3 and 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 7, &c.—Thucyd. 3, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. &c.

Mœris, a celebrated lake in Egypt, on the Libyan side of the Nile, south-west of Memphis and the region of the pyramids. "Herodotus informs us that the circumference of this vast sheet of water was three thousand six hundred stadia, or four hundred and fifty miles; that it stretched from north to south; and that its greatest depth was about three hundred feet. He adds that it was entirely the product of human industry; as a proof of which, he states that in its centre were seen two pyramids, each of which was two hundred cubits above, and as many beneath, the water; and that upon the summit of both was a colossal statue, placed in a sitting attitude. The precise height of these pyramids, he concludes, is therefore four hundred cubits, or six hundred Egyptian feet. The waters of the lake, he continues, are not supplied by springs; on the contrary, the ground which it occupies is of itself remarkably dry; but it communicates by an artificial channel with the Nile, receiving during six months the excess of the inundation, and during the other half of the year emptying itself back into the river. Every day during the latter period the fishery yields to the royal treasury a talent of silver; whereas, as soon as the ebb has ceased, the produce falls to a mere trifle. 'The inhabitants affirm of this lake, that it has a subterraneous passage westward into the Libyan Desert, in the line of the mountain which rises above Memphis.' Last century, according to Dr. Pococke, lake Mœris was about fifty miles long and ten broad. The older French writers estimated its circumference at a hundred and fifty leagues; a result not materially different from that of the English traveller. Mr. Browne, who was more lately in Egypt, thought that the length did not exceed thirty or forty miles, and that the greatest breadth was not more than six. It is hence manifest that the limits of this inland sea have been much contracted; and, moreover, that the process of diminution is still going on at a rate which is distinctly perceptible. In its present contracted dimensions, the lake of Mœris is called by the Arabs the Birket-el-Karoun, and is recognised at once as a basin formed by nature, and not by art. The details collected by Herodotus, and the other writers of Greece and Rome, must therefore have applied to the works which were necessary not only to connect the Nile with the lake, but also to regulate the ebb and flow of the inundation. The canal, called Joseph's River, is about a hundred and twenty miles in length; which, when it enters the valley of Fayoum, is further divided into a number of subordinate branches, and supplied with a variety of locks and dams. There were two other canals communicating between the lake and the stream, with sluices at their mouths, which were alternately shut and opened as the Nile rose or fell. These, we may presume, were the achievements of Mœris; which, when they are regarded as the work of an individual, having for their object the advantage and comfort of a numerous people, may justly be esteemed a far more glorious undertaking than either the Pyramids or the Labyrinth." Russel's Egypt. "We shall thus," says Malte-Brun, "reconcile the different positions assigned to lake Mœris by Herodotus, Diodorus, and Strabo, and give a reason why the ancients say that the lake was of artificial formation, while the Birket-el-Karoun gives no evidence of any such operation."

Mœsia, an extensive tract of country in Europe, reaching east and west from the Euxine along the south bank of the Danube to the confluence of that river and the Savus, which, with its branches separates it from Pannonia and Illyricum. On the south, the Hæmus mountains form its common boundary with Thrace and Macedon. All the greater rivers of this country pour their waters into the Danube, which goes, swollen with their tribute, to the sea; of these the principal are the Margus, the Œscus, the Utus, and the Iatrus. "It must be remarked, that the name of the country and of the nation is also writen Mysia, and Mysi, as the name of the province south of the Propontis in Asia and of its people, who are thought to have issued from the country now under consideration. This country corresponds in general with those which we call Servia and Bulgaria. Mœsia was in great part more anciently occupied by the Scordisci, a Celtic nation; and when we read that Alexander, in the first expedition towards the Ister, encountered the Celts, or Gauls, these are the people alluded to. And although the Scordiscians were almost annihilated at the time when the Roman power extended in this country, it is remarked that many names of places on the Ister are purely Celtic. Darius, son of Hystaspes, marching against the Scythians, encountered the Getes, who were reputed Thracians, on his passage, before arriving at the Ister; and we shall see that this extremity of the country on the Euxine bore the name of Scythia. Mœsia appears to have been subjected to the empire under Augustus and Tiberius. Its extent along the river, which separated it from Dacia on the north, was divided into Superior and Inferior; and a little river named Ciabrus or Cebrus, now Zibriz, between the Timacus and the Œscus, makes, according to Ptolemy, the separation of these two Mœsias. But Mœsia suffered encroachment upon its centre in the admission of a new province, under the name of Dacia. Aurelian, fearing that he could not maintain the conquest of Trajan beyond the Ister, called Dacia, abandoned it, and retired with the troops and people, which he placed on the hither side of the river, affecting to call his new province the Dacia of Aurelian. That which Mœsia preserved of the superior division, was called the First Mœsia; and there is reason to believe that the name of Masua, which remains to a canton south of the Save, near its confluence with the Ister, comes from this Mœsia. The Inferior was the Second Mœsia. There was afterwards distinguished in Dacia the part bordering on the river under the name of Ripensis; and that which was sequestered in the interior country under the name of Mediterranea, occupied probably a country contiguous to Macedonia, and known more anciently by the name of Dardania. (Vid. Dardania.) To finish what concerns Mœsia, there remains a division of it adjacent to the Euxine; in which the part nearest to the mouths of the Ister was formed, under Constantine, into a particular province named Scythia. The city of Tomi, which the banishment of Ovid has illustrated, assumed in this province the rank of metropolis; and is still known in the name of Temeswar, although otherwise called Baba." D'Anville.

Molossi, a people of Epirus, who inhabited that part of the country which was called Molossia or Molossis from king Molossus. "It must, therefore, have comprehended the territory of Janniná, the present capital of Albania, together with its lake and mountains, including the country of the Tymphæi, which bordered on that part of Thessaly near the source of the Peneus. Its limits to the west cannot precisely be determined, as we are equally ignorant of those of Thesprotia." Cram. This country had the bay of Ambracia on the south, and the country of the Perrhæbeans on the east. The dogs of the place were famous, and received the name of Molossi among the Romans. Dodona was the capital of the country according to some writers. Others, however, reckon it as the chief city of Thesprotia. Lucret. 5, v. 10, 62.—Lucan. 4, v. 440.—Strab. 7.—Liv.—Justin. 7, c. 6.—C. Nep. 2, c. 8.—*Virg. Another island, now Anglesey, off the coast of Caernarvonshire in Wales. This is the Mona described by Tacitus, the seat of the Druids, and the scene of their massacre. It was reduced by the Romans under Suetonius Paulinus and Agricola. The narrow strait which separated this island from Wales was called Menai. From the early British name of Mon, the Latins formed that of Mona; nor was it till the early English took possession of this island that it exchanged its ancient designation for that of Anglesey, or Island of the English.

Monda, a river between the Durius and Tagus in Portugal. Plin. 4, c. 22. It rose near the source of the Cuda, and flowing west, emptied into the Atlantic below the city of Conimbriga, now Coimbra. Its modern name is the Mondego.

Monœcus, now Monaco, a town and port of Liguria, where Hercules had a temple, whence he is called Monœcius, and the harbour Herculis Portus. Strab. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 830.

Mons Sacer, a mountain about three miles, from Rome, accompanying the line of the course of the Anio. It presents itself in a low range of sandstone hills, on the right bank, and is celebrated from the earliest days of the republic for the secession of the populace, who there made that stand against the nobles which resulted in their admission to power, by the creation of the new office of popular Tribunes or Tribunes of the people.

Mopsium, a hill and town of Thessaly, between Tempe and Larissa. Liv. 42.

Mopsopia, an ancient name of Athens, from Mopsus one of its kings, and from thence the epithet of Mopsopius is often applied to an Athenian.

Mopsuhestia, or Mopsos, now Messis, a town of Cilicia Campestris, near the mouth of the Pyramus. Cic. Fam. 3, c. 8.

Morgantium, (or ia), a town of Sicily, near the mouth of the Simethus. Cic. in Ver. 3, c. 18.

Morini, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the shores of the British ocean. The shortest passage in Britain was from their territories; and from the Itius Portus, one of their ports, it was that Cæsar embarked for that till then unexplored and almost undiscovered country. They were called extremi hominum by the Romans, because situate on the extremities of Gaul. Their city, called Morinorum castellum, is now Mount Cassel, in Artois; and Morinorum civitas is Terouenne, on the Lis. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 726.—Cæs. 4, Bell. G. 21. Their territory is comprehended for the most part in the departments Pas-de-Calais and Le Nord; and, like the Armoricans, they derived their name from their proximity to the sea.

Mortuum mare. Vid. Mare Mortuum.

Mosa, a river of Belgic Gaul, falling into the German ocean, and now called the Maese or Meuse. The place at which it was crossed by a bridge, the ancient Trajectus ad Mosam, is now supposed to be Maestricht. It rose in the country of the Lingones, and flowing irregularly north-north-west, it fell into the ocean at no great distance from the mouths of the Rhine. Tacit. H. 4, c. 66.

Moscha, now Mascat, a port of Arabia on the Red Sea.

Moschi, a people of Asia, at the west of the Caspian Sea. Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 270.

Mosella, a river of Belgic Gaul, falling into the Rhine at Coblentz, and now called the Moselle. Flor. 3, c. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 53.

Mosychlus, a mountain of Lemnos, "from which fire was seen to blaze forth, according to a fragment of the poet Antimachus, preserved by the Scholiast of Nicander.

. . . . Ἡφαίστου φλογὶ εἴκελον, ἣν ῥα τιτύσκει
Δαίμων ἀκροτάτας ὄρεος κορυφῆσι Μοσύχλου.

This volcanic appearance will account for all the mythological fictions which allude to this island as the smithy of the god of fire, and also for the ancient name of Æthalea, which it is said to have borne in distant ages. 'The whole island,' says Dr. Hunt 'bears the strongest marks of the appearance of volcanic fire; the rocks in many parts are like burnt and vitrified scoria of furnaces.'" Cram.—Nicand.

Mosynæci, a nation on the Euxine Sea, in whose territories the 10,000 Greeks staid on their return from Cunaxa. Xenoph. "The name of Mosynæcia is derived from the wooden habitations in which the people in this part of Pontus towards the eastern corner, were accustomed to reside." D'Anville.

Mothone, a town of Magnesia, where Philip lost one of his eyes. Justin. 7, c. 6. The word is often spelt Methone.

Mulucha, a river of Africa, dividing Numidia from Mauretania. Plin. 5, c. 2.

Mulvius Pons. Vid. Milvius Pons.

Munda, a small town of Hispania Bætica. The village of Munda, near the modern town of Ronda in Granada, corresponds nearly to the site of the ancient town. It was celebrated for a battle fought there on the 17th of March, B. C. 45, between Cæsar and the republican forces of Rome, under Labienus and the sons of Pompey. Cæsar obtained the victory after an obstinate and bloody battle, and by this blow put an end to the Roman republic. Pompey lost 30,000 men, and Cæsar only 1000, and 500 wounded. Sil. Ital. 3, c. 400.—Hirt. Bell. Hisp. 27.—Lucan. 1.

Munychia, (and æ,) a port of Attica, between the Piræus and the promontory of Sunium, called after king Munychus, who built there a temple to Diana, and in whose honour he instituted festivals called Munychia. The temple was held so sacred, that whatever criminals fled there for refuge were pardoned. During the festivals they offered small cakes, which they called amphiphontes, απο του αμφαινειν, from shining all around, because there were lighted torches hung round when they were carried to the temple, or because they were offered at the full moon, at which time the solemnity was observed. It was particularly in honour of Diana, who is the same as the moon, because it was full moon when Themistocles conquered the Persian fleet at Salamis. The port of Munychia was well fortified, and of great consequence; therefore the Lacedæmonians, when sovereigns of Greece, always kept a regular garrison there. Plut.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 709.—Strab. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 1.

Murgantia, a town of Samnium. Liv. 25, c. 27.

Mutina, a Roman colony of Cisalpine Gaul, where M. Anthony besieged D. Brutus, whom the consuls Pansa and Hirtius delivered. Two battles on the 15th of April, B. C. 43, were fought, in which Antony was defeated and at last obliged to retire. Mutina is now called Modena. Lucan. 1, v 41, l. 7, v. 872.—Sil. 8, v. 592.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 822.—Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 14. Brut. ep. 5.

Muziris, a town of India, now Vizindruk. Plin. 6, c. 23.

Mycale, a city and promontory of Asia Minor, opposite Samos. This celebrated promontory was long sacred to the meetings of the Ionians, who there assembled in the temple of Neptune, and in the council, Panionium, in which all the Ionic cities were represented, investigated, and provided for the concerns of the confederation. In the Persian war this spot became still more noted as the scene of the total destruction of the fleet of the Persian king, on the morning of the same day that his land forces, under Mardonius, were routed by Pausanias and his Spartans before Platæa. The Persians were about 100,000 men, that had just returned from the unsuccessful expedition of Xerxes in Greece. They had drawn their ships to the shore and fortified themselves, as if determined to support a siege. They suffered the Greeks to disembark from their fleet without the least molestation, and were soon obliged to give way before the cool and resolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, slaughtered some thousands of the enemy, burned their camp, and sailed back to Samos with an immense booty, in which were seventy chests of money among other very valuable things. Herodot.—Justin. 2, c. 14.—Diod.

Mycalessus, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Paus. 9, c. 19.

Mycenæ, a town of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, built by Perseus, son of Danae. It was situate on a small river at the east of the Inachus, and 50 stadia from Argos. "Mycenæ is said to have been founded by Perseus after the death of his grandfather Acrisius.

. . . . πόλισμα Περσέως,
Κυκλωπείων πόνον χειρῶν.
Eurip. Iph. Aul. 1500.

The name was supposed by some to be derived from Mycene, daughter of Inachus; but others assigned a different origin to the word, as may be seen from Pausanias. Perseus was succeeded by Sthenelus, married to a daughter of Pelops named Astydameia: after whom followed Eurystheus, Atreus, and Agamemnon; under the latter monarch, the empire of Mycenæ reached its highest degree of opulence and power, since his authority was acknowledged by the whole of Greece. Mycenæ, which had been superior even to Argos during the Trojan war, declined after the return of the Heraclidæ: and in the 78th Olympiad, or 468 B. C. the Argives, having attacked and captured the city, levelled it to the ground, and enslaved its inhabitants. Strabo states that so complete was the destruction of this celebrated capital, that not a vestige remained of its existence. This assertion, however, is not correct, since Pausanias informs us that several parts of the walls were yet standing, as also one of the gates, surmounted by lions, when he visited the ruins. Modern travellers have given us a full and interesting account of these vestiges; among which the most remarkable is a subterraneous chamber, called by Pausanias the treasury of Atreus, and usually mentioned under that name by antiquaries of the present day. It served also as the burial vault of Atreus and his descendants. The gate of the lions still remains in the same state as it was when seen by Pausanias, who ascribes it, as well as the treasury, to the Cyclopes, who also raised the fortifications of Tiryns. 'This gate forms the principal entrance to the acropolis, and a magnificent wall, composed of irregular polygons, closely united and carefully smoothed, supports the terrace on which it is situated. The acropolis is a long irregular triangle standing nearly east and west. The walls follow the sinuosities of the rock, and are mostly composed of the second style of well-joined polygons, although the rough construction is occasionally seen. The traces within are few and imperfect.' Pausanias also mentions the monuments of Agamemnon and Electra. Clytemnestra and Ægisthus were interred without the walls. The fountain of Perseus, which he likewise notices, 'rises,' as Dodwell informs us, 'a few hundred yards to the north-east of the acropolis, and immediately after issuing from the rock forms a small clear stream of excellent water, with which Mycenæ was anciently supplied.' The extent of the town itself has not been ascertained. Thucydides, however, leads us to suppose it was but small, notwithstanding the epithets of εὐρυάγυια and εὐκτίμενον applied to it by Homer. Mr. Dodwell is of opinion 'that the walls of the city extended considerably beyond the subterraneous chambers to the plain;' and he adds, 'that the foundations of some edifices, as well as the remains of houses, may be traced in many places.' The ruins are close to the village of Krabata. The temple of Juno, which, according to Strabo, was common to the Argives and Mycenæans, stood on the slope of mount Eubœa, at a distance of fifteen stadia from the city of the latter. That part of the mountain which rose above the edifice was named Acræa, and the lower portion Prosymna. A rivulet, called Asterion, had its source near the temple, but presently after disappeared among the rocks. Eupolemus was said to be the architect of this celebrated building, which was enriched with numerous bass-reliefs representing the birth of Jove, the battle of the gods and giants, as well as various events which occurred during the siege, and after the capture of Troy. In the vestibule were ranged the statues of the priestesses of Juno, and different heroes; that which bore the name of Augustus, as Pausanias was informed, was originally intended for Orestes. The image of the goddess was of a colossal size, and represented seated on a throne. A crown, adorned with figures of the Hours and Graces, encircled the head; in one hand she held a sceptre, in the other a pomegranate. This admirable statue was wrought in gold and ivory by Polycletus. The figure of Hebe, which once stood near the Juno, was the work of Naucydes. Among the various offerings with which the temple was enriched, the most remarkable were an altar of silver, on which was represented the marriage of Hercules and Hebe, a peacock of gold studded with jewels, presented by the emperor Hadrian, and a golden crown and robe of purple by Nero. The first temple was accidentally burnt, the curtains having caught fire through the negligence of the priestess Chryseis, who had fallen asleep; she in consequence fled to Tegea, and took refuge in the sanctuary of Minerva Alea. The Argives nevertheless did not remove her statue from the temple, where it still remained in the time of Pausanias. This fire happened in the ninth year of the Peloponnesian war. The site of this ancient edifice has not yet been ascertained. Sir W. Gell supposes it might have stood at Phiti, or Phytai, to the west of Krabata, where there are some vestiges. Mount Eubœa, below which, according to Pausanias, the temple was situated, answers apparently to the ridge now called Tricorypho, or three heads." Cram.—Paus. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela, 2, c. 3. The word Mycenæus is used for Agamemnon, as he was one of the kings of Mycenæ.

Mycŏnos, (or E,) one of the Cyclades, between Delos and Icaria, which received its name from Myconus, an unknown person. It is about three miles at the east of Delos, and is thirty-six miles in circumference. It remained long uninhabited on account of the frequent earthquakes to which it was subject. Some suppose that the giants whom Hercules killed were buried under that island whence arose the proverb of every thing is under Mycone, applied to those who treat of different subjects under one and the same title, as if none of the defeated giants had been buried under no other island or mountain about Mycone. Strabo observes, and his testimony is supported by that of modern travellers, that the inhabitants of Mycone became bald very early, even at the age of 20 or 25; from which circumstance they were called, by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Pliny says that the children of the place were always born without hair. The island was poor, and the inhabitants very avaricious; whence Archilochus reproached a certain Pericles, that he came to a feast like a Myconian, that is, without previous invitation. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 76.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 11, c. 37, l. 12, c. 7, l. 14, c. 1.—Athen. 1.—Thucyd. 3, c. 29.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.

Myēnus, a mountain of Ætolia. Plut. de Flum.

Mygdŏnia, a small province of Macedonia, near Thrace, between the rivers Axius and Strymon. The inhabitants, called Mygdones, migrated into Asia, and settled near Troas, where the country received the name of their ancient habitation. Cybele was called Mygdonia, from the worship she received in Mygdonia in Phrygia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 22, l. 3, od. 16, v. 41.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 45.——A small province of Mesopotamia bears also the name of Mygdonia, and was probably peopled by a Macedonian colony. Flacc. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10.—Ovid. Heroid. 20.—Horat. 2, od. 12.

Mygdŏnus, or Mygdon, a small river running through Mesopotamia.

Mylassa (orum), a town of Caria, on a small stream emptying west of the Doridis Sinus. It still remains, though with an altered name; the quantity of marble in its vicinity causing it, as D'Anville concludes, to be called Marmora. Liv. 38, c. 39.

Mylæ, now Melazzo, a town upon a narrow cape, that, stretching from the northern coast of Sicily west of Pelorum, assists to form a bay upon this part of the shore. Near this place the fleet of the younger Pompey was destroyed by that of Octavius Cæsar, then triumvir, under the conduct of his favourite leader Agrippa.

Myndus, a maritime town of Caria, near Halicarnassus. Cic. Fam. 3, ep. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 16.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

Myonnesus, a town and promontory of Ionia, now Jalanghi-Liman. Liv. 37, c. 13 and 27.

Myos-hormos, a commercial town of Egypt, on the Sinus Arabicus, below the Heropolites Sinus. This place was frequently called also Aphrodites, and its harbour was crowded by a number of little islands bearing the same name. Their modern name among the surrounding people is Sufangeul-barki, or the Sponge of the Sea. From this place all the inland country, and all the cities on the upper portion of the Nile, were supplied with the commodities of the east; and till the founding of Berenice, and the formation of a road from Coptus to that city through the desert that lay between, Myos-hormos flourished almost as much as any city of Egypt. The better fortune, however, of Berenice, in engrossing all the intercourse of Coptus and the Indies, soon reduced Myos-hormos to a very subordinate rank.

Myra, (orum or æ), a town of Lycia, on a high hill two miles from the sea. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Strab. 14.

Myrcinus, a town of the Edones in Thrace, on the left bank of the Strymon. "Myrcinus is often mentioned by Herodotus as the place chosen by Histiæus of Miletus for his settlement, which was granted to him by Darius, in consideration of the important services he had rendered that sovereign in the Scythian expedition. The advantages which this situation presented to the enterprising Ionian, consisted in an abundant supply of timber for ship-building, the number of mariners and soldiers which the country could readily furnish, the richness of the mines it contained, and its proximity to the Greek colonies. His designs, however, did not escape the vigilant observation of Megabyzus, who commanded the Persian army in Thrace: and on his representation to Darius, Histiæus was recalled in the manner related by Herodotus. Aristagoras also subsequently retired to Myrcinus on the failure of his enterprise in Ionia, and was slain before some Thracian town which he was besieging. At the time of the Peloponnesian war, Myrcinus had fallen again into the hands of the Edoni; but on the death of Pittacus, sovereign of that people, it opened its gates to Brasidas, who was then in the possession of Amphipolis. Cleon, the Athenian commander was killed in the battle which took place before that city by a targeteer of Myrcinus. The situation of Myrcinus probably corresponds with that of Orphano." Cram.

Myriandros, a town of Seleucia in Syria, on the bay of Issus, which is sometimes called Sinus Myriandricus. Liv. 2, c. 108.

Myrĭna, I. a maritime town of Æolia, called also Sebastopolis, and now Sanderlic. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—Liv. 33, c. 30.—Strab. 13.—II. A town of Lemnos, now Palio Castro, built on the point of a promontory looking towards Athos. Vid. Lemnos. Plin. 4, c. 12.——III. A town of Asia, destroyed by an earthquake in Trajan's reign.

Maricæ, a town of Arcadia, called also Megalopolis.

Myrleæ, same as Apamea of Bithynia. Plin. 5, c. 32.

Myrmĭdŏnes, a people on the southern borders of Thessaly, who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. They received their name from Myrmidon, a son of Jupiter and Eurymedusa, who married one of the daughters of Æolus, son of Helen. His son Actor married Ægina, the daughter, of the Asopus. He gave his name to his subjects who dwelt near the river Peneus in Thessaly. According to some the Myrmidons received their name from their having been originally ants, μυρμηκες. Vid. Æacus. According to Strabo, they received it from their industry, because they imitated the diligence of the ants, and like them, were indefatigable, and were continually employed in cultivating the earth. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 654.—Strab.—Hygin. fab. 52.

Myrtōum mare, a part of the Ægean Sea which lies between Eubœa, Attica, and Peloponnesus, as far as cape Malea. It receives this name from Myrto, a woman, or from Myrtos, a small island opposite to Carystos in Eubœa; or from Myrtilus, the son of Mercury, who was drowned there, &c. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

Myrtuntium, a name given to that part of the sea which lies on the coast of Epirus between the bay of Ambracia and Leucas.

Mysi, a barbarous people according to Herodotus, who, crossing with the Teucri into Thrace from the eastern shores of the Euxine and the Propontis, effected important changes in the settlements of that country, extending themselves as far as the Adriatic on the west and the Peneus on the south. The revolutions occasioned by this migration occurred at an era more remote than that to which the Trojan war can be referred.

Mysia, a country of Asia, bounded in its greatest extent by the Propontis on the north, the Ægæan and the Hellespont upon the west, by Lydia on the south, and by Bithynia on the east. Besides the country lying within these boundaries, the ancients usually assigned to Mysia the island of Lesbos, and the smaller islands that clustered round the shore. In some respects this is the most remarkable of all the Asiatic provinces; here, before the historic ages, were performed those exploits, which, themselves, beyond its pale, have served for a landmark in all history; and half the poetry of the ancient world, or more than half perhaps, is in some way connected with the name of Troy. The first division which we may mark in Mysia is that which distinguishes two provinces, the Greater and the Less. In the former we may include all the region lying along the coast as far as the commencement of the Hellespont, and inland to the borders of Bithynia, a part of which, as far as mount Olympus, may have once belonged to it; the Lesser Mysia was contained therefore within the line of the coast along the Hellespont and Propontis eastward as far as the river Rhindacus; but all the early fame of Mysia is connected with this part. Here, upon the straits, or, as it was anciently called, the river, was the plain of Troy, with the consecrated Ida in its rear; and here the streams of Xanthus and of Simois are seen to bear their feeble but still classic waters to the "broad Hellespont." If poetry has not done as much for the more southern part, history has done much more; and about 80 years after the events which give such lasting interest to the section just described, a body of Æolic Greeks passed over to rebuild and repopulate the country that their ancestors had spent ten years in laying waste. The name of Æolis belongs to this part of Mysia from the period of the return of the Heraclidæ to the Peloponnesus. (Vid. Æolis.) Many different aspects present themselves, under which we must consider the geographical and political divisions of this part of peninsular Asia. Thus, after the establishment of the Æolians, we may consider almost every town as an independent state, or at least as striving for independence. After some time the Lydian empire of Crœsus affected a change in its political but without interfering with its geographical situation, and without affecting the relative position of the towns. In the same manner it passed into and probably remained in the hands of the Persians. On the erection of the kingdom of Pergamus, Mysia entered into the distribution of Asia, which constituted that state, and was afterwards a part of "Asia," a prætorian province. Without regard to these differences, however, we may observe that the subdivisions of Mysia were generally understood to be as follows among the Greeks. 1st. Great Mysia, of which the capital was Pergamus, upon the Caicus; 2d. the coast of the Pelasgi, Leleges, &c. and the island of Lesbos; 3d. Troas and Little Mysia, forming what was sometimes designated little Phrygia. Of these the ancient Troy, once mistress of the east, was the capital of the former; while Cyzicus and Lampsacus were the principal towns of the latter district in the 3d subdivision. Under Constantine, when Asia was divided into diocesses, Mysia, in the diocess of Asia, assumed the name of Hellespontus, the principal town being still Pergamus. The whole of this country is now comprised, with the greater part of Bithynia, in the Turkish divisions of Khudavenkiar, Karassi, and Bigah. The Mysi are supposed to be the descendants of the Mœsi, a Thracian people, who early crossed over from Europe; but though we may safely grant the analogy, which is presumed or ascertained, between the Thracian and the Phrygian dialects, and though we cannot for a moment dispute the antiquity of both, it requires a very deep research to enable us to say that one, and still more to declare which one, is the parent tongue. The Mysians were once very warlike, but they greatly degenerated; and the words Mysorum ultimus were emphatically used to signify a person of no merit. The ancients generally hired them to attend their funerals as mourners, because they were naturally melancholy and inclined to shed tears.

Myus, (Myuntis,) a town of Ionia on the confines of Caria, founded by a Grecian colony. It is one of the 12 capital cities of Ionia, situate at the distance of about 30 stadia from the mouth of the Mæander. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, gave it to Themistocles to maintain him in meat. Magnesia was to support him in bread, and Lampsacus in wine. The sea having retired and left much of the shore bare, Myus was so infested by insects in consequence, that the inhabitants removed to Miletus; and in the time of Pausanias the city existed only in name. *Heyl. Nabathæa, a country of Arabia, of which the capital was called Petra. The word is often applied to any of the eastern countries of the world by the poets, and seems to be derived from Nabath the son of Ishmael. *Ovid. Naharvali, a people of Germany.—Tacit. Germ. 43.

Naissus, or Nessus, now Nissa, a town of Mœsia, the birth-place of Constantine, ascribed by some to Illyricum or Thrace.

Namnetes, an Armoric people of Celtic Gaul, whom Strabo calls Namnitæ, and Ptolemy Namnetæ. On the north they were bounded by the Rhedones; on the east by the Andes; on the south by the Ligeris; and on the west by the Veneti. Their towns, according to Ptolemy, was Condevicnum, which seems to be formed from the Celtic Condate, meaning "a confluence;" for the town was situated at the confluence of the Ardra and the Ligeris. It afterwards took the name of the people, whence the modern name Nantes (dép. de la Loire-Inferieure.) Cæs. B. G. 3, 9. Lem. ed.

Nantuates, a people of Gallia Celtica, whose territory is not easily defined. For Cæsar speaks of the Nantuates, Veragri, and Seduni in conjunction, and does not mark out their separate limits. On the whole it is most likely that their territory is now the part of the Alps called Le Chablais, and le bas de la Vallée. Cæs. B. G. 3, 1, 7; 4, 10.

Napheus, a river of Peloponnesus falling into the Alpheus. Paus. 1.

Nar, now Nera, a river of Umbria, whose waters, famous for their sulphureous properties, pass through the lake Velinus, and issuing from thence with great rapidity, fall into the Tiber. It rises at the foot of mount Fiscellus, on that part of the chain of the Appenines which separates the Sabines from Picenum, and falls into the Tiber near Ocriculum. Cram.—*Ovid. Narbo Martius, now Narbonne, dép de l' Aude, the first Roman colony established in Gaul. It was a very ancient city of the Volcæ Tectosages; having been colonized by Porcius and Marcius the consuls, A. U. C. 635, it became the chief city of the province, which hence derived the name of Narbonensis. Its epithet of Martius it received, not from the consul Marcius, but from Mars, because, as Cicero says in the oration for Fonteius, it was specula populi Romani ac propugnaculum, istis nationibus (Gallorum) oppositum et objectum. C. J. Cæsar sent a second colony to this city, consisting of the veterans of the 10th legion. It was led by Tib. Claudius Nero, the father of the emperor. Its inhabitants were called Atacini from the river Atacinus, and Decumani, from the 10th legion (a decima legione.) Cæs. B. G. 3, 20; 7, 7; 8, 46. Lem. ed.

Narbonensis Gallia, one of the four great divisions of ancient Gaul, was bounded by the Alps, the Pyrenean mountains; Aquitania, Belgica, and the Mediterranean, and contained the modern provinces of Languedoc, Provence, Dauphine, and Savoy. Vid. Gallia.

Narisci, a nation of Germany, in the Upper Palatinate. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

Narnia, or Narna, anciently Nequinum, now Narni, a town of Umbria, washed by the river Nar, from which it received its name. In its neighbourhood are still visible the remains of an aqueduct and of a bridge erected by Augustus. Liv. 10, c. 9.

Naro, a river of Dalmatia, "now Narenta, a considerable stream, which rises in the mountains of Bosnia, and falls into the sea opposite to the island of Lesina. Scylax speaks of a great lake in the interior of the country, from which this river flows, containing an island of about one hundred and twenty stadia in extent. Modern maps only lay down some extensive marshes in this direction. The Emporium, to which the same ancient geographer alludes, as being situated eighty stadia above the mouth of the Naro, may apply to the Narona of Pliny and Mela, a Roman colony of some note. Its ruins should be sought for in the vicinity of Castel Norin." Cram.

Narycia, or um, or Naryx, a town of Magna Græcia, built by a colony of Locrians after the fall of Troy. The place in Greece from which they came, bore the same name, and was the country of Ajax Oileus. The word Narycian is more universally understood, as applying to the Italian colony, near which pines and other trees grew in abundance. Virg. G. 2, v. 438. Æn. 3, v. 399.—*Ovid. Nassus, or Nasus, a town of Acarnania, near the mouth of the Achelous. Liv. 26, c. 24. ——Also a part of the town of Syracuse.

Natiso, now Natisone, a river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Adriatic east of Aquileia. Plin. 3, c. 18.

Nava, now Nahe, a river of Germany falling into the Rhine at Bingen, below Mentz. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 70.

Naucrătis, a city of Egypt, on the left side of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was celebrated for its commerce, and no ship was permitted to land at any other place, but was obliged to sail directly to the city, there to deposite its cargo. It gave birth to Athenæus. The inhabitants were called Naucratitæ, or Naucratiotæ. Herodot. 2, c. 97 and 179.—Plin. 5, c. 9.

Naulŏchus, I. a maritime town of Sicily near Pelorum.——II. A town of Thrace, on the Euxine Sea. Plin. 4, c. 11.——III. A promontory of the island of Imbros.——IV. A town of the Locri. Plin. 4, c. 3.

Naupactus, or Naupactum, "situated at the western extremity of the Locrian territory, and close to Rhium of Ætolia, was said to have derived its name from the circumstance of the Heraclidæ having there constructed the fleet in which they crossed over into Peloponnesus. After the Persian war this city was occupied by the Athenians, who there established the Messenian Helots, after they had evacuated Ithome. The acquisition of Naupactus was of great importance to the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war, as it was an excellent station for their fleet in the Corinthian gulf, and not only afforded them the means of keeping up a communication with Corcyra and Acarnania, but enabled them also to watch the motions of the enemy on the opposite coast, and to guard against any designs they might form against their allies. Some important naval operations, which took place off this city in the third year of the war, will be found detailed in Thucydides. After the failure of the expedition undertaken by Demosthenes the Athenian general against the Ætolians, the latter, supported by a Peloponnesian force, endeavoured to seize Naupactus by a coup de main; but such were the able arrangements made by Demosthenes, who threw himself into the place with a reinforcement of Acarnanian auxiliaries, that the enemy did not think proper to prosecute the attempt. On the termination of the Peloponnesian war, however, Naupactus surrendered to the Spartans, who expelled the Messenians from the place. Demosthenes acquaints us that it had afterwards been occupied by the Achæans, but was ceded by Philip of Macedon to the Ætolians, in whose possession it remained till they were engaged in a war with the Romans. The latter, after having defeated Antiochus at Thermopylæ, suddenly crossed over from the Maliac gulf to that of Corinth, and invested Naupactus, which would probably have been taken, notwithstanding the obstinate defence made by the Ætolians, had they not obtained a truce by the intervention of T. Flaminius. Pausanias speaks of a temple of Neptune in this city, and also of one dedicated to Diana. Naupactus was still a city of some importance in the time of Hierocles, but it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake under the reign of Justinian. The modern town is called Enebachti by the Turks, Nepacto by the Greeks and Lepanto by the Franks. 'Nepacto,' says Sir W. Gell, 'is a miserable paskalic and a ruinous town; but it is worth visiting, because it gives a very exact idea of the ancient Greek city, with its citadel on mount Rhegani, whence two walls, coming down to the coast and the plain, form a triangle. The port absolutely runs into the city, and is shut within the walls, which are erected on the ancient foundations.'" Cram.

NAUPLIA, "the port of Argos, derived its name and origin from Nauplius, the son of Neptune and Amymone. Nauplia was deserted and in ruins when visited by Pausanias. The inhabitants had been expelled several centuries before by the Argives, upon suspicion of their favouring the Spartans. The latter people in consequence received them into their territory, and established them at Methone of Messenia. He noticed the vestiges of its wall and harbour, the temple of Neptune, and a fountain named Canathus. It has been succeeded by the modern town of Napoli di Romania, as it is called by the Greeks, which possesses a fortress of some strength. Dodwell observed there some remains of the walls, which were constructed in the polygonal style. 'The site of the temple of Neptune is not known; but the fountain Canathos still exhibits a copious flow of water.' Sir W. Gell remarks, that 'Nauplia is the best built city of the Morea. It is situated on a rocky point, on which are many remains of the ancient wall. The port is excellent and very defensible.' Nauplia, according to Pausanias, was fifty stadia from Temenium." Cram.

NAXOS, I. now Naxia, a celebrated island in the Ægean Sea, the largest and most fertile of all the Cyclades. It was formerly called Strongyle, Dia, Dionysias, and Callipolis; and received the name of Naxos from Naxus, who was at the head of a Carian colony which settled in the island. Naxos abounds with all sorts of fruits, and its wines are still in the same repute as formerly. The Naxians were anciently governed by kings, but they afterwards exchanged this form of government for a republic, and enjoyed their liberty, till the age of Pisistratus, who appointed a tyrant over them. They were reduced by the Persians; but in the expedition of Darius and Xerxes against Greece, they revolted and fought on the side of the Greeks. During the Peloponnesian war they supported the interest of Athens. Bacchus was the chief deity of the island. The capital was also called Naxos; and near it, on the 20th Sept. B. C. 377, the Lacedæmonians were defeated by Chabrias. Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot.—Diod. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 636.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 125.—Paus. 6, c. 16.—Pindar. ——II. An ancient town on the eastern side of Sicily, founded 759 years before the Christian era. There was also another town at the distance of five miles from Naxos, which bore the same name, and was often called by contradistinction Taurominium. Plin. 3.—Diod. 13.——III. A town of Crete, noted for hones. Plin. 36, c. 7.——IV. A Carian, who gave his name to the greatest of the Cyclades.

NEANDROS, (or IA,) a town of Troas. Plin. 5, c. 30.

NEAPOLIS, "in Italian Napoli, and with us Naples. Innumerable accounts exist relative to the foundation of this celebrated city; but the fiction most prevalent seems to be that which attributed it to the siren Parthenope, who was cast upon its shores, and from whom it derived the name by which it is usually designated in the poets of antiquity. According to Strabo, the tomb of this pretended foundress was shown there in his time. Hercules is also mentioned as founder of Neapolis by Oppian and Diodorus Siculus. We find also considerable variations in what may be regarded as the historical account of the origin of Neapolis. Scymnus of Chios mentions both the Phocæans and Cumæans as its founders, while Stephanus of Byzantium names the Rhodians. But by far the most numerous and most respectable authorities attribute its foundation to the Cumæans; a circumstance which their proximity renders highly probable. Hence the connexion of this city with Eubœa, so frequently alluded to by the poets, and especially by Statius, who was born here.—A Greek inscription mentions a hero of the name of Eumelus as having had divine honours paid to him, probably as founder of the city. The date of the foundation of this colony is not recorded. Velleius Paterculus observes only that it was much posterior to that of the parent city. Strabo seems to recognise another colony subsequent to that of the Cumæans, composed of Chalcidians, Pithacusans, and Athenians. The latter were probably the same who are mentioned in a fragment of Timæus, quoted by Tzetzes, as having migrated to Italy under the command of Diotimus, who also instituted the λαμπαδηφορία, still observed at Neapolis in the time of Statius. The passage of Strabo above cited will account also for the important change in the condition of the city now under consideration, which is marked by the terms Palæpolis and Neapolis, both of which are applied to it by ancient writers. It is to be noticed that Palæpolis is the name under which Livy mentions it when describing the first transactions which connect its history with that of Rome A. U. C. 429; while Polybius, speaking of events which occurred in the beginning of the first Punic war, that is about sixty years afterwards, employs only that of Neapolis. Livy, however, clearly alludes to the two cities as existing at the same time: but we hear no more of Palæpolis after it had undergone a siege, and surrendered to the Roman arms. According to the same historian, this town stood at no great distance from the site of Neapolis, certainly nearer to Vesuvius, and in the plain. It was betrayed by two of its chief citizens to the Roman consul A. U. C. 429. Respecting the position of Neapolis, it may be seen from Pliny, that it was placed between the river Sebethus, now il Fiume Maddalona, and the small island Megaris, or Megalia, as Statius calls it, on which the Castel del Ovo now stands. It is probable that Neapolis sought the alliance of the Romans not long after the fall of the neighbouring city; for we find that they were supplied with ships by that town in the first Punic war, for the purpose of crossing over into Sicily. At that time we may suppose the inhabitants of Neapolis, like those of Cumæ, to have lost much of their Greek character from being compelled to admit the Campanians into their commonwealth; a circumstance which has been noticed by Strabo. In that geographer's time, however, there still remained abundant traces of their first origin. Their gymnasia, clubs, and societies were formed after the Greek manner. Public games were celebrated every five years, which might rival in celebrity the most famous institutions of that nature established in Greece; while the indolence and luxury of Grecian manners were also very prevalent, and allured to Neapolis many a Roman whose age and temperament inclined them to a life of ease. Claudius and Nero seem to have shown a like predilection for Neapolis as a residence. The epithet of docta, applied to this city by Martial, proves that literature continued to flourish here in his time. Among other superstitions, we learn from Macrobius, that the Neapolitans worshipped the sun under the appearance of a bull with a human face, which they called Hebon. This fact is confirmed by numerous coins, and by a remarkable Greek inscription." Cram.

Nemæa, I. a town of Argolis, between Cleonæ and Phlius, with a wood, where Hercules, in the 16th year of his age, killed the celebrated Nemæan lion. This animal, born of the hundred-headed Typhon infested the neighbourhood of Nemæa, and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. It was the first labour of Hercules to destroy it; and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were useless against an animal whose skin was hard and impenetrable, seized him in his arms and squeezed him to death. The conqueror clothed himself in the skin, and games were instituted to commemorate so great an event. The Nemæan games were originally instituted by the Argives in honour of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a serpent, (Vid. Archemorus,) and Hercules some time after renewed them. They were one of the four great and solemn games which were observed in Greece. The Argives, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ, generally presided by turns at the celebration, in which were exhibited foot and horse races, chariot races, boxing, and wrestling, and contests of every kind, both gymnical and equestrian. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of olive, afterwards of green parsley, in memory of the adventure of Archemorus, whom his nurse laid down on a sprig of that plant. They were celebrated every third, or according to others, every fifth year, or more properly on the 1st and 3d year of every Olympiad, on the 12th day of the Corinthian month Panemos, which corresponds to our August. They served as an era to the Argives, and to the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. It was always usual for an orator to pronounce a funeral oration in memory of the death of Archemorus, and those who distributed the prizes were always dressed in mourning. Liv. 27, c. 30 and 31, l. 34, c. 41.—*Ovid. The word Neritos is often applied to the whole island of Ithaca; and Ulysses, the king of it, is called Neritius dux, and his ship Neritia navis. Nervii, a people of Gaul, in the second Belgica, among the boldest and most warlike of that nation. Dwelling in the northern regions that bordered upon Germany, they claimed to be of German origin, and refused to acknowledge, as the other Gallic people had done, the supremacy of Rome. They were surrounded, particularly on the north, by other warlike tribes; and it was among the great achievements of Cæsar to break the spirit of this fierce, unyielding tribe. They were among those who dwelt in the most northern parts of Gaul comprised in France, and had beyond the people of Germania Secunda, the Merapii and Batavi of the Netherlands. A portion of the department du Nord now represents their settlements, and Bavai is their capital called Bagacum.

Nicæa, I. a town of Achaia, near Thermopylæ, on the bay of Malia.——II. A town of Illyricum.——III. Another in Corsica.——IV. Another in Thrace.——V. In Bœotia.——VI. now Nice, a city of Liguria in the country of the Intemelia, near the mouth of the Var. It was founded by the Massilians, and was long considered to belong rather to Gallia Provincia than to Italy. It is now in English called Nice. ——VII. A town of Bithynia, now Is-nik and Nice, west of the Sangarius, on the lake Ascanius. Its earlier name was Antigonia, but Lysimachus, in honour of his wife, changed it to Nicæa. The general council of bishops, called by Constantine A. D. 325, was held in this place; and here the doctrines of Arius were formally examined and discussed. No council is considered of greater authority than this, at which the creed, known as the Nicene, was partly drawn up and adopted. The empress Irene, to give the council greater authority, which she wished should declare in favour of the worship of images, ordered that also to convene at Nicæa; and here that superstition was formally reinstated which had been partially abolished by the vigorous efforts of the Isaurian Leo, the Iconoclast. ——VIII. A place of some repute in India. This town was built by Alexander on the east bank of the Hydaspes, opposite Bucephalia. The building of this city was in commemoration of the victory of the Macedonians over Porus and the Indians. Chaussard.

Nicephorium, a town of Mesopotamia, on the Billicha, immediately above its confluence with the Euphrates, above the Fossa Semiramidis. It was built by Alexander during his eastern expedition, and on the accession of Seleucus Callinicus to the throne of Syria, it was repaired and fortified; and the name of Callinicum was assigned to it instead of that which it had borne before. It is probable, however, that the new town was built upon the opposite or south side of the Billicha. Under the emperor Leo, the fifth who bore that name, Callinicum, was destined to another change of title, and Leontopolis succeeded to the former appellation. The eastern writers designate it by the name of Racca, and here the Caliph Haroun Alrashid established his favourite residence.

Nicephŏrius, now Khabour. Vid. Centritis.

Nicer, now the Neckar, a river of Germany. It rises in the Abnoba mons, Black Mountain, and flowing for the greater part of its course towards the north-west in Wirtemberg, on the northern boundary of Baden, the country of the Marcomanni before they crossed the Mayne, it turns towards the west, and falls into the Rhine near Manheim. Auson. Mos. 423.

Nicia, I. a city. Vid. Nicæa.——II. A river falling into the Po at Brixellum. It is now called Lenza, and separates the duchy of Modena, from Parma.

Nicomēdia, now Is-nikmid, a town of Bithynia founded by Nicomedes 1st. at the head of the Astacenus Sinus on the north, and opposite the town of Astacus. It was the capital of the country, and it has been compared, for its beauty and greatness, to Rome, Antioch, or Alexandria. It became celebrated for being, for some time, the residence of the emperor Constantine and most of his imperial successors. Some suppose that it was originally called Astacus, and Olbia, though it was generally believed that they were all different cities. Ammian. 17. —Paus. 5, c. 12.—Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 12, &c.

Nicopŏlis, I. a city of Lower Egypt.——II. A town of Armenia Minor, built by Pompey the Great in memory of a victory which he had there obtained over the forces of Mithridates. According to D'Anville it is now called Divriki. Strab. 12.——III. Another in Thrace, built on the banks of the Nestus by Trajan, in memory of a victory which he obtained there over the Barbarians.——IV. Another, of Epirus, on the Ambracian gulf, west of the river Charadrus, and nearly opposite to Actium. It was founded by Augustus, in honour of his victory obtained over Antony before the last-named place, and "may be said to have risen out of the ruins of all the surrounding cities in Epirus and Acarnania, and even as far as Ætolia, which were compelled to contribute to its prosperity. So anxious was Augustus to raise his new colony to the highest rank among the cities of Greece, that he caused it to be admitted among those states which sent deputies to the Amphictyonic assembly. He also ordered games to be celebrated with great pomp every five years. Suetonius states that he enlarged a temple of Apollo; and consecrated to Mars and Neptune the site on which his army had encamped before the battle of Actium, adorning it with naval trophies. Having afterwards fallen into decay, it was restored by the emperor Julian. Hierocles terms it the metropolis of Old Epirus. Modern travellers describe the remains of Nicopolis as very extensive; the site which they occupy is now known by the name of Prevesa Vecchia. Mr. Hughes observes, that 'the first view of the isthmus on which it stood, covered with immense ruins of ancient edifices, is particularly curious and striking. The most prominent object is the ruin of a large theatre, cresting the top of a rising eminence.' The same traveller noticed also 'an aqueduct, which brought water from the distance of thirty miles; a large enclosure, supposed to have been that of the Acropolis mentioned by Dio Cassius; within the city itself a beautiful little theatre, and a temple of Ceres. Near the city are to be seen the ruins of the suburb, mentioned by Strabo, where the Actian games were celebrated.'" Cram.——V. Two towns in Mœsia: that which has preserved the ancient name in Nicopoli, was erected by Trajan, in memory of his victories on the Danube, opposite the mouth of the Aluta, or Olt. The victory of Bajazet obtained against the flower of the chivalry of France in the year 1393, renewed its fame, and seemed again to justify its distinguished title. The other Mœsian city of the same name was situated in the southern part of the province, towards the Hæmus mountains and the borders of Thrace. It is now Nicop on the Iantia, the Iatrus of antiquity, and its situation on this stream caused it to be surnamed ad Iatrum.——VI. Another, near Jerusalem, founded by the emperor Vespasian. ——VII. Another, in Dacia, built by Trajan to perpetuate the memory of a celebrated battle. ——VIII. Another near the bay of Issus, built by Alexander, in Cilicia.

Niger, or Nigris, (itis,) a river of Africa, which rises in Æthiopia, and falls by three mouths into the Atlantic, little known to the ancients, and not yet satisfactorily explored by the moderns. Plin, 5, c. 1 and 8.—Mela, 1, c. 4, l. 3, c. 10.—Ptol. 4, c. 6. "Ptolemy, the best informed of the ancient geographers, and commented on by the most learned of the moderns, M. D'Anville, makes mention of two great rivers, the Ghir, which runs from south-east to north-west, nearly like the Misselad, or Bahr-el-Gazel in our modern maps; the other, the Niger, runs nearly in the direction of the Joliba, from east to west. But in following the literal meaning of Ptolemy, we are not certain that this author thought all that his commentator makes him say. He seems to give the Niger two courses; one westerly to the lake Nigrites, the other easterly to the Libyan lake, besides different canals of derivation, by one of the most ambiguous words in the Greek language (εκιδον,) a word which may signify the mouth of a river, or a place where two roads separate, or a canal, or a simple bending. Taking advantage of these uncertainties, and applying to the interior the system of M. Gosselin, which contracts Ptolemy's map to two thirds, some have attempted to prove that the Ghir and the Niger of Ptolemy do not belong at all to Nigritia, but were only small rivers on the southern declivity of mount Atlas. The great characteristic mark, given by Pliny, to wit, the position of the Niger between the Libyans and the Ethiopians, i. e. between the Negroes and the Moors, appears to us conclusive against these recent hypotheses. Applying the name of the Nile of the Negroes to the Misselad, and supposing that both this river and the Niger lose themselves in lakes or in the sands, D'Anville, and long after him, Rennel, have constructed maps, half traditional and half hypothetical, which are usually followed with more or less modification. But a very able geographer has proposed an important alteration, which amounts to more than a mere modification. Allowing the Niger and the other rivers the general direction assigned to them by D'Anville and Rennel, he adds an outlet connected with the Gulf of Guinea. 'To the west of Wangara,' says this author, 'the Nile has a southerly course; and the Misselad, after having crossed the lake of Fittree, then that of Stmegonda, leaves this last in two leading branches, which encircle Wangara and fall into the Niger, then this last river continues in a south-westerly course, till it terminates in the Gulf of Guinea, where it forms a delta between its western branch, the Rio-Formosa, and the eastern one, Rio-del-Rey.' At the very time when this hypothesis appeared to be established, an opinion diametrically opposed to it, and the least probable of all that had been advanced, has been again brought forward. It is nearly that which was given by Pliny the naturalist, who considered the Niger as the principal branch of the Nile, allowing, however, that it frequently disappeared under ground. Some of the contradictory testimonies of the ancients and of the Arabians may be ingeniously combined in favour of this opinion, but the only powerful argument is derived from a recent account of a journey performed by water from Tombuctoo to Cairo. The journal has come to us in an indirect channel. Mr. Jackson, British consul at Mogadore, collected from the oral declaration of a Moroccan, who had visited Tombuctoo, various particulars, by means of which he wishes to demonstrate the identity of the Niger with the Nile. 'The Nil-el-Abeed, or Nile of the Negroes,' says this writer, 'is also called Nil-el-Kebir, or the Great Nile; that of Egypt is called Nil-el-Masr, or Nil-el-Scham, from the Arabic terms for Egypt and Syria. The inhabitants of Tombuctoo and the whole of central Africa maintain that these two rivers communicate together, and even that they are the same river. The Africans are surprised when they hear that the Europeans make them two distinct rivers, experience having taught them otherwise.'" Malte-Brun. Vid. Nilus.

Nilus, anciently called Egyptus, one of the most celebrated rivers in the world. Its sources were unknown to the ancients, and the moderns are equally ignorant of their situation; whence an impossibility is generally meant by the proverb of Nili caput quærere. "The Nile, the largest river of the old world, still conceals its true sources from the research of science. At least, scarcely any thing more of them is known to us now than was known in the time of Eratosthenes. That learned librarian of Alexandria distinguished three principal branches of the Nile. The most easterly was the Tacazze of the moderns, which flowed down the north side of the table land of Abyssinia. The second known branch, or the Blue River, first makes a circuit on the table land of Abyssinia, and then flows down through the plains of Sennaar, or of Fungi. The sources of this Blue River were found and described by the Jesuits, Paez and Tellez, two centuries before the pretended discovery of Bruce. These two rivers are tributaries to the White River, the Bahr-el-Abiad, which is the true Nile, and the sources of which must lie in the countries to the south of Darfoor.

These countries are, according to the report of a Negro, named Dar-el-Abiad. The mountains from which it issues are called Dyre and Tegla; and probably form part of the Al-Quamar mountains, or the mountains of the Moon. As it seems proved that travellers have passed by water from Tombuctoo to Cairo, the Niger must fall into the Nile, and be really the Nile itself; or there must be intermediate rivers, forming between the Nile and Niger a communication resembling that which was found by Humboldt between the Orinoco and the Amazons. The first hypothesis might seem to be supported by a vague romantic passage of Pliny the naturalist. The other hypothesis is the only one which can reconcile the accounts of persons who have travelled by the way of Tombuctoo, with the positive testimony of Mr. Browne, according to which the rivers Misselad and Bar-Koolla, run from south to north. This fact, which is generally admitted, does not allow us to suppose any other communication between the Nile and the Niger, than one which may be formed by canals, which, like those of Casiquiari in Guiana, might wind along a table land where the sources of the Misselad and Bar-Koolla are at a short distance from each other, and from those of the Nile. The true Nile, whatever may be its origin, receives two large rivers from Abyssinia, and then forms an extensive circuit in the country of Dongola by turning to the south-west. At three different places a barrier of mountains threatens to interrupt its course, and at each place the barrier is surmounted. The second cataract in Turkish Nubia is the most violent and most unnavigable. The third is at Syene or Assouan, and introduces the Nile into Upper Egypt. The height of this cataract, singularly exaggerated by some travellers, varies according to the season, and is generally about four or five feet. At the place called Batn-el-Bahara, the river divides into two branches; the one of which flowing to Rosetta, and the other to Damietta, contain between them the present Delta; but this triangular piece of insulated land was in former times larger, being bounded on the east by the Pelusian branch, which is now choked up with sand or converted into marshy pools. On the west it was bounded by the Canopic branch, which is now partly confounded with the canal of Alexandria, and partly lost in lake Etko. But the correspondence of the level of the surface with that of the present Delta, and its depression as compared with that of the adjoining desert, together with its great verdure and fertility, still mark the limits of the ancient Delta, although irregular encroachments are made by shifting banks of drifting sand, which are at present on the increase. The different bogaz, or mouths of this great river, have often changed their position, and are still changing it; a circumstance which has occasioned long discussions among geographers. The following are the most established results. The seven mouths of the Nile, known to the ancients, were, 1. The Canopic mouth, corresponding to the present mouth of lake Etko; or, according to others, that of the lake of Aboukir, or Maadeé; but it is probable, that at one time it had communications with the sea at both of these places. In that case it is probable that these lakes existed nearly in their present state, except that the Nile flowed through them, and gave them a large proportion of fresh water, instead of the sea water with which they are now filled. We cannot believe that the bottoms of these lakes were formerly higher, as we know of no natural process by which surfaces of such breadth could have been subsequently excavated. 2. The Bolbitine mouth at Rosetta. 3. The Sebenitic mouth, probably the opening into the present lake Burlos. 4. The Phatnitic, or Bucolic at Damietta. 5. The Mendesian, which is lost in the lake Menzaleh, the mouth of which is represented by that of Dibeh. 6. The Tanitic, or Saitic, which seems to leave some traces of its termination to the east of lake Menzaleh, under the modern appellation of Omm-Faredje. The branch of the Nile which conveyed its waters to the sea corresponds to the canal of Moez, which now loses itself in the lake. 7. The Pelusiac mouth seems to be represented by what is now the most easterly mouth of lake Menzaleh, where the ruins of Pelusium are still visible. The depth and rapidity of the Nile differ in different places, and at different seasons of the year. In its ordinary state, this river carries no vessels exceeding sixty tons burden, from its mouth to the cataracts. The bogaz of Damietta is seven or eight feet deep when the waters are low. That of Rosetta does not exceed four or five. When the waters are high, each of them has forty-one feet more, and caravels of twenty-four guns can sail up to Cairo. The navigation is facilitated in a singular degree during the floods: for while the stream carries the vessels from the cataract to the bogaz with great rapidity, the strong northerly winds allow them to ascend the river, by means of set sails, with equal rapidity. The celebrated plains of Egypt would not be the abode of perpetual fertility were it not for the swellings of the river, which both impart to them the requisite moisture, and cover them with fertilizing mud. We now know for certain what the ancients obscurely concluded, and what was asserted by Agatharcides, Diodorus, Abdolatif, and the Abyssinian envoy, Hadgi Michael, that the heavy annual rains between the tropics are the sole cause of these floods, common to all the rivers of the torrid zone, and which, in low situations such as Egypt, occasion inundations. The rise of the Nile commences with the summer solstice. The river attains its greatest height at the autumnal equinox, continues stationary for some days, then diminishes at a less rapid rate than it rose. At the winter solstice it is very low, but some water still remains in the large canals. At this period the lands are put under culture. The soil is covered with a fresh layer of slime of greater or less thickness. The fertility and general prosperity of Egypt depend much on a certain medium in the height to which the Nile rises in its inundations; too little rise or too much is nearly equally hurtful. In September, 1818, M. Belzoni witnessed a deplorable scene, from the Nile having risen three feet and a half above the highest mark left by the former inundation. It was productive of one of the greatest calamities that had occurred in the memory of any one living. Rising with uncommon rapidity, it carried off several villages, and some hundreds of their inhabitants. During the increase of the Nile, it first acquires a green colour, sometimes pretty deep. After thirty or forty days, this is succeeded by a brownish red. These changes are probably owing to the augmentations which it receives from different temporary lakes in succession, or from the waters formed by a succession of rains on the different table lands of the interior of Africa." Malte-Brun.

Ninus, a celebrated city, now Nino, the capital of Assyria, built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus, and called Nineveh in Scripture. It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, fifteen miles long, nine broad, and forty-eight in circumference. It was surrounded by large walls 100 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could pass together abreast, and was defended by 1500 towers each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar king of Babylon, B. C. 606. Strab. 1.—Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 185, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 33.—Lucian. "The village of Nunia on the banks of the Tigris, opposite to Mosul, is ascertained to be the site of the ancient Nineveh. Here are found a rampart and fosse, four miles in circumference; but Mr. Kinnear believes these to belong to a city founded subsequently to the time of Adrian, so that Nineveh has left no trace now in existence." Malte-Brun.

Niphates, I. a mountain of Asia, which divides Armenia from Assyria, and from which the Tigris takes its rise. It is not the part which was called Niphates that formed this natural boundary, but rather a prolongation of the chain which, running somewhat south and stretching east, unite the Niphates of Armenia to the Zagrus on the boundaries of Media. "The chains of Taurus," says Malte-Brun, "enter Armenia near the cataracts of the Euphrates; they rise considerably in advancing to the east: the Niphates of the ancients, to the south-east of the lake Van, derive their name from the snows which cover their summits all the year." Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—II. A river of Armenia, falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 20.—Lucan, 3, v. 245.

Nisæa, a naval station on the coasts of Megaris. Strab. 8.

Nisibis, a strong and famous military post of Mesopotamia, towards the banks of the Tigris, between that river and the Masius mons. The country to which it belonged was called Mygdonia, and Nisibis was sometimes known as Antiochia Mygdoniæ. "This place is seen afterwards serving as a barrier to the Roman empire against the enterprises of the Parthians. But it was at length ceded to Sapor, king of Persia, by one of the conditions of the treaty which succeeded the disgrace of the Roman army in the expedition of Julian. Nisibis is now a place entirely open, and reduced to a hamlet." D'Anville. "The north-west part of the pashalic of Orfa, or the ancient Mygdonia, presents us with luxuriant pastures and flowery hills. Hence the Greeks called it Anthemusia, from ἄνθος, 'a flower.' Here the famous fortress of Nisibis stood so long out against the arms of the Parthians. It has only left some feeble traces in the town of Nisibin, a place which is remarked for white roses." Malte-Brun.

Nisyros, an island in the Ægean Sea, at the west of Rhodes, with a town of the same name. It was originally joined to the island of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyris. Neptune, who was supposed to have separated them with a blow of his trident, and to have then overwhelmed the giant Polybotes, was worshipped there, and called Nisyreus. Apollod. 1, c 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

Nitiobriges, a people of Gaul. Their country corresponds to the present department de Lot et Garonne, and their ancient capital of Agennum retains the ancient name in the French Agen, instead of assuming, as do the greater number of the Gallic towns, the name of the population to which it belonged.

Nitria, a city, and, as D'Anville observes, a country, of Egypt, west of the Nile. This region, which was but a desert, is called Scithiaca in Ptolemy, and produced as an article of trade an abundance of nitre. "The mountain of Natron skirts the whole length of the valley of that name. That mountain contains none of the rocks which are found scattered about in the valley, such as quartz, jasper, and petrosilex. There is a series of six lakes in the direction of the valley. Their banks and their waters are covered with crystallizations, both of muriate of soda or sea-salt, and of natron or carbonate of soda. When a volume of water contains both of these salts, the muriate of soda is the first to crystallize; and the carbonate of soda is then deposited in a separate layer. Sometimes the two crystallizations seem to choose separate localities in insulated parts of the same lake. This curious valley is only inhabited by Greek monks. Their four convents are at once their fortresses and their prisons. They subsist on a small quantity of leguminous seeds. The vegetation in these valleys has a wild and dreary aspect. The palms are mere bushes, and bear no fruit. Caravans come to this place in quest of natron." Malte-Brun.

Nivaria, an island at the west of Africa, supposed to be Teneriffe, one of the Canaries. Plin. 6, c. 32. Vid. Insulæ Fortunatæ.

Nola, an ancient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the first Punic war. It was founded by a Tuscan, or, according to others, by an Eubœan colony. It is said that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that when he was refused a glass of water by the inhabitants as he passed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and substituted the word ora, in the 225th line of the 2d book of his Georgics. Nola was besieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Augustus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were first invented there, in the beginning of the fifth century, from which reason they have been called Nolæ or Campanæ, in Latin. The inventor was St. Paulinus, the bishop of the place, who died A. D. 431, though many imagine that bells were known long before, and only introduced into churches by that prelate. Before his time, congregations were called to the church by the noise of wooden rattles (sacra ligna.) Paterc. 1, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug.—Sil. 8, v. 517, l. 12, v. 161.—A. Gellius, 7, c. 20.—Liv. 23, c. 14 and 39, l. 24, c. 13.

Nomades. Vid. Part II.

Nomentum, a town of the Sabines in Italy, famous for wine, and now called Lamentana. The dictator, Q. Servilius Priscus, gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there, A. U. C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Fast. 4. v. 906.—Liv. 1, c. 38, l. 4, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

Nonăcris, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood. Evander is sometimes called Nonacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nonacria, as being a native of the place. Curt. 10, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 97. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Paus. 8, c. 17, &c.

Norba, I. a town of Latium near the centre, in the territory of the Volsci. "It is mentioned among the early Latin cities by Pliny; and Dion. Hal. speaks of it as no obscure city of that nation. It was early colonized by the Romans as an advantageous station to check the inroads of the Volsci. This, however, rendered Norba particularly subject to their devastations, especially on the part of the Privernates, who lay in the immediate neighbourhood; but neither these repeated attacks, nor even the distresses of the second Punic war, had power to shake its fidelity to Rome. The disastrous end of this city gave further proof of its devotion to the cause which it had espoused; for the zeal which it displayed on the behalf of Marius and his party drew upon it the vengeance of the adverse faction. Besieged by Lepidus, one of Sylla's generals, it was opened to him by treachery; but the undaunted inhabitants chose rather to perish by their own hands than become the victims of a bloody conqueror. The name of C. Norbanus, who was descended from a distinguished family of this city, occurs frequently in the history of those disastrous times, as a conspicuous leader on the side of Marius." Cram. ——II. There was another town of the same name in Apulia. The inhabitants of Norba Latina were called Norbani, while those of Norba Apula were designated as the Norbanenses.——III. Cæsarea, a town of Spain on the Tagus now Alcantara.

Noreia, "a town belonging to the Norici. Cluverius places it on the left bank of the Tagliamento, near Venzone. Strabo speaks of its gold mines, and further mentions that Cn. Carbo had an unsuccessful action with the Cimbri in its vicinity. Pliny informs us that Noreia no longer existed in his time." Cram. To this it may be added from D'Anville, that "it is said to have been occupied by a body of Boiens, who are to be distinguished from those established in Bohemia, and from a time anterior to the invasion of the Marcomans, who drove this nation into Noricum."

Noricum, a province of the Roman empire among the Alps. The Danube on the north, a portion of the Œnus (Inn) upon the west, the Carnic Alps and sources of the Savus on the south, and the Cetius mons upon the east, describe the boundaries of Noricum. These limits correspond generally with those of Carinthia, Stiria, the country contiguous to Saltsburgh and Linlz, and Austria Proper. "This country," says D'Anville, "which is first spoken of as having a king, followed the fate of Pannonia; for, when it was reduced, Noricum also became a province under the reign of Augustus. Afterwards, and by the multiplication of provinces, there is distinguished a Noricum Ripense, adjacent to the Danube, from a Noricum Mediterraneum, distant from that river in the bosom of the Alps." The Nerici, from whom the country seems to have been named, possessed, at the time at which it became a province, a small portion only of the soil in the north-west; the Sevaces, the Alauni, and the Ambidiani occupying the other portions near to Vindelicia and Cisalpine Gaul. The iron that was drawn from Noricum was esteemed excellent, and thence Noricus ensis was used to express the goodness of a sword. Dionys. Perieg.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 14.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 712.

Notium, a town of Æolia, near the Cayster. It was peopled by the inhabitants of Colophon, who left their ancient habitations because Notium was more conveniently situated, it being on the sea-shore. Liv. 37, c. 26, 38, 39.

Novæ, (tabernæ), the new shops built in the forum at Rome, and adorned with the shields of the Cimbri. Cic. Orat. 2, c. 66.——The Veteres tabernæ were adorned with those of the Samnites. Liv. 9, c. 40.

Novaria, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now Novara in Milan. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 70.

Noviomum, a town of the Ubii, on the west of the Rhine, now called Nuys, near Cologne. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 26, &c.

Noviodūnum, a town of the Æduii or Hedui in Gaul, taken by J. Cæsar. It is pleasantly situated on the Ligeris, and now called Noyon, or, as others suppose, Nevers. Cas. Bell. G. 2, c. 12.

Noviomagus, or Neomagus, I. a town of Gaul, now Nizeux in Normandy.——II. Another, called also Nemetes, now Spire.——III. Another in Batavia, now Nimeguen, on the south side of the Waal.

Novium, a town of Spain, now Noya.

Novum Comum, a town of Insubria, on the lake Larius, of which the inhabitants were called Novocomenses. Cic. ad Div. 13, c. 35.

Nuceria Alfaterna, I. a town of Campania on the Samus, "of the highest antiquity, but remarkable only for its unshaken attachment to the Romans at all times, and for the sad disasters to which it has been exposed in consequence of that attachment. Its fidelity to the republic during the second Punic war drew down upon it the vengeance of Hannibal, who, after some vain attempts to seduce its inhabitants into his party, plundered and destroyed their city. Its adherence to the cause of a Roman pontiff during the great schism, roused the fury of a still more irritable enemy, Ruggiero, king of Naples, who again razed its walls and dispersed its citizens. They, instead of rebuilding the town when the storm was over, as their ancestors had done before, continued to occupy the neighbouring villages. Hence the appearance of the modern Nocera, which, instead of being enclosed within ramparts, spreads in a long line over a considerable extent of ground, and displays some handsome edifices intermingled with rural scenery. It is still a bishopric, and derives the additional appellation dei Pagani, from the circumstance of its having been for some time in possession of the Saracens." Eustace.——II. Another, in Umbria, on the Flaminian Way, surnamed Camallaria, now Nocera.——III. A third, now Lazzara in Gallia Cisalpina, south of the Po, between the mouths of the Nicia and the Secia.

Numantia, a town of Spain, near the sources of the river Durius, celebrated for the war of fourteen years, which, though unprotected by walls or towers, it bravely maintained against the Romans. The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces, till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of sixty thousand men, and was bravely opposed by the besieged, who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valour, and the courage of the Numantines was soon changed into despair and fury. Their provisions began to fail, and they fed upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards of that of their dead companions, and at last were necessitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy situation of their affairs obliged some to surrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themselves up on the morrow; they refused, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and set fire to their houses, and all destroyed themselves, B. C. 133, so that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some historians, however, deny that, and support that a number of Numantines delivered themselves into Scipio's hands, and that fifty of them were drawn in triumph at Rome, and the rest sold as slaves. The conqueror obtained the surname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Appian. Iber.—Paterc. 2, c. 3.—Cic. 1, off.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plut.—Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 1.

Numentana via, a road at Rome, which led to mount Sacer, through the gate Viminalis. Liv. 3, c. 52.

Numicia via, one of the great Roman roads which led from the capital to the town of Brundusium.

Numicus, a small river of Latium, near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's sister, drowned herself. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c.—Sil. 1, v. 359.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358, &c. Fast. 3, v. 643.

Numidia, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers and Bildulgerid. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, south by Gætulia, west by Mauretania, and east by a part of Libya which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numidæ. It was the kingdom of Massinissa, who was the occasion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as also Juba the father and son. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night time. They rode without saddles or bridles, whence they have been called infræni. They had their wives in common as the rest of the barbarian nations of antiquity. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 and 17.—Mela, 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 754 For the divisions of Numidia, Vid. Massyli, Massæsyli, and Mauretania.

Nursia, now Norza, a town of Picenum, whose inhabitants are called Nursini. Its situation was exposed, and the air considered as unwholesome. Sil. It. 8, v. 416.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

Nymphæum, I. a place near the walls of Apollonia, sacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had also an oracle. The place was also celebrated for the continual flames of fire which seemed to rise at a distance from the plains. "Strabo supposes it to have arisen from a mine of bitumen liquified, there being a hill in the vicinity whence this substance was dug out, the earth which was removed being in process of time converted into pitch, as it had been stated by Posidonius. Pliny says this spot was considered as oracular, which is confirmed by Dio Cassius, who describes at length the mode of consulting the oracle. The phenomenon noticed by the writers here mentioned has been verified by modern travellers as existing near the village of Selenitza, on the left bank of the Aous, and near the junction of that river with the Sutchitza." Cram. It was there that a sleeping satyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monster had the same features as the poets ascribe to the satyr. He was interrogated by Sylla, and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman spurned from him a creature which seemed to partake of the nature of a beast more than that of a man. Plut. in Sylla.—Dio. 41.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 36 and 49.——II. A city of Taurica Chersonesus.——The building at Rome where the nymphs were worshipped, bore also this name, being adorned with their statues, and with fountains and waterfalls, which afforded an agreeable and refreshing coolness.

Nysa, or Nyssa, I. a town of Æthiopia, at the south of Egypt, or, according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the same name in India, was sacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionysius, which seems to be compounded of Διος and Νυσα, the name of his father and that of the place of his education. The god made this place the seat of his empire and the capital of the conquered nations of the east. Diodorus, in his third and fourth books, has given a prolix account of the birth of the god at Nysa, and of his education and heroic actions. It is this Indian Nysa that is properly called Nagar. This term, which signifies among the natives any town, was bestowed particularly, and we may suppose as a mark of pre-eminence, upon this. It was also called Dionysopolis. Chaussard.—Mela, 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 13, &c.—Val. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.——According to some geographers there were no less than ten places of the name of Nysa. One of these was on the coast of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in such an uncommon manner, that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it immediately produced grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.——II. A city of Thrace.——III. Another, seated on the top of mount Parnassus, and sacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

O.

Oasis, "certain fertile spots in the Libyan desert, which, from the peculiarity of their situation, amid an ocean of sand, have been denominated islands. The term Oasis, in the ancient language of the country, signifies an inhabited place, a distinction sufficiently intelligible when contrasted with the vast wilderness around, in which even the most savage tribes have not ventured to take up their abode. Like Egypt itself, these isolated dependancies have been described in very opposite colours by different writers. The Greeks called them the islands of the blessed; and without doubt they appear delightful in the eyes of the traveller, who has during many painful weeks suffered the privations and fatigue of the desert. But it is well known that they were generally regarded in a less favourable aspect by the Greeks and Romans, who not unfrequently assigned them as places of banishment. The state malefactor and the ministers of the Christian church, who were sometimes comprehended in the same class, were, in the second and third centuries, condemned to waste their days as exiles in the remote solitude of the Libyan Oasis. They were usually reckoned three in number; the Great Oasis, of which the principal town is El Kargeh; the little Oasis, or that of El Kassar; and the Northern Oasis, more frequently called Siwah. To these is now added the Western Oasis, which does not appear to have been mentioned by any ancient geographer except Olympiodorus, and which was never seen by any European until Sir Archibald Edmonstone visited it about ten years ago. The Great Oasis, the most southern of the whole, consists of a number of insulated spots, which extend in a line parallel to the course of the Nile, separated from one another by considerable intervals of sandy waste, and stretching not less than a hundred miles in latitude. M. Poncet, who examined it in 1698, says that it contains many gardens watered with rivulets, and that its palm groves exhibit a perpetual verdure. It is the first stage of the Darfur caravan, which assembles at Siout, being about four days journey from that town, and nearly the same distance from Farshout. Sir F. Henniker speaks rather contemptuously of the ecclesiastical architecture which happened to fall under his notice in this Oasis. There is a temple which he describes as a small building composed of petty blocks of stone, the pillars of which are only two feet six inches in diameter, and 'even these, instead of being formed of one solid block, are constructed of mill-stones.' He adds, that the surface of the earth in the vicinity of the temple is very remarkable; it is covered with a lamina of salt and sand mixed, and has the same appearance as if a ploughed field had been flooded over, then frozen, and the water drawn off from under the ice. This remark suggests a question relative to the origin of these grassy islands in the desert. Major Rennel thinks that they may be attributed to the vegetation which would necessarily be occasioned by springs of water; the decay of the plants producing soil until it gradually increased to the extent of several leagues. They are universally surrounded by higher ground,—a circumstance which accounts for the abundance of moisture. The climate, however, is extremely variable, especially in winter. Sometimes the rains in the Western Oasis are very abundant, and fall in torrents, as appears from the furrows in the rocks; but the season Sir A. Edmonstone made his visit there was none at all, and the total want of dew in the hot months sufficiently proves the general dryness of the atmosphere. The springs are all strongly impregnated with iron and sulphur, and hot at their sources; but, as they continue the same throughout the whole year, they supply to the inhabitants one of the principal means of life. The water, notwithstanding, cannot be used until it has been cooled in an earthen jar. The Western Oasis is called Bellata. El Cazar, however, appears to be the principal town. The situation of the place, we are told, is perfectly lovely, being on an eminence at the foot of a line of rock which rises abruptly behind it, and encircled by extensive gardens filled with palm, acacia, citron, and various other kind of trees, some of which are rarely seen even in those regions. The principal edifice is an old temple or convent called Daer el Hadjur, about fifty feet long by twenty-five wide, but presenting nothing either very magnificent or curious. The first chamber is 24 feet by 20, supported by four pillars five feet in diameter at the shaft, the walls, as far as they are visible, being traced with figures and hieroglyphics. The winged globe, encompassed by the serpent, the emblem of eternity, is carved over one of the doors. This Oasis is composed of twelve villages, of which ten are within five or six miles of each other; the remaining two being much farther off at the entrance of the plain, and scarcely looked upon as belonging to this division. The sheiks express their belief that there is inhabited land to the westward,—adding that some Arabs, who had lately attempted to explore the country in that direction, met at the end of three days such a terrible whirlwind as compelled them to return. The Little Oasis, or that of El Kassar, has been less visited than either of the two others which have been longest known to European travellers. We owe the latest and most distinct account to Belzoni, who, proceeding in search of it westward from the valley of Fayoum, arrived, at the close of the fourth day, on the brink of what he calls the Elloah,—that is, the El Wah, or El Ouah, from which the Greeks formed the more common term oasis. He describes it as a valley surrounded with high rocks, forming a spacious plain of twelve or fourteen miles in length, and about six in breadth. There is only a small portion cultivated at present, but there are many proofs remaining that it must at one time have been all under crop, and that with proper management it might again be rendered fertile. We have still to mention the Oasis of Siwah, in some respects the most interesting of the whole, and more especially as connected with the tradition of Jupiter Ammon, whose temple it is generally understood to contain. It is situated in lat. 29° 12′ N., and in long. 26° 6′ E.; being about six miles long, and between four and five in width, the nearest distance from the river of Egypt not exceeding one hundred and twenty miles. A large proportion of the land is occupied by date-trees; but the palm, the pomegranate, the fig, the olive, the vine, the apricot, the plum, and even the apple, are said to flourish in the gardens. No soil can be more fertile. Tepid springs, too, holding salts in solution, are numerous throughout the district; and it is imagined that the frequency of earthquakes is connected with the geological structure of the surrounding country." Russel's Egypt. "Towards the isthmus of Suez there is an Oasis called Korayn by the inhabitants of the country. It contains eight or ten hamlets with their gardens, and about 4000 inhabitants. In the same direction is Salekeyd, another Oasis, shaded by a wood six miles long. It contains ten villages and about 6000 inhabitants." Malte-Brun.

Oaxes, a river of Crete, which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

Obringa, now Ahr, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine above Rimmagen.

Ocellum, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, in the Cottian Alps. It stood near the source of the Cluso, one of the principal springs of the Po, and is now Uxeau in Piedmont.

Ocha, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itself.

Ochus, a river of Asia, belonging in antiquity to the kingdom of Parthia, rising on the borders of that country and of the province of Margiana. In the latter part of its course it separated the Dahæ from the Derbicæ, bounding on the north Hyrcania, in which the first-named people dwelt. "The largest river," says Malte-Brun, "of Khorazan, the Tedzen of the moderns, and the Ochus of the ancients, loses itself in a marshy lake, according to Wahl, but it is more probable that it passes through the marshes which it forms to communicate with the gulf of Balkan." Malte-Brun.

Oricŭlum, now Otricoli, a town of Umbria near Rome. Cic. pro Mil.—Liv. 19, c. 41.

Octodūrus, a principal town of the Veragri, between Gallia and Rhætia, in the Vallis Pennina, now Le Valais. It was situated within the confluence of the Drance and the Rhone. The modern town is called Martigny.

Octogesa, a town in the province of Hispania Citerior, situated on the Iberus, in the county of the Ilercaones, near the mouth of the Sicoris. It is now Mequinenza in Arragon. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 61.

Odessus, a sea-port town at the west of the Euxine Sea, in Lower Mœsia, below the mouths of the Danube, supposed to be Varna. Ovid. Trist. 9, v. 37.

Odeum, a musical theatre at Athens, erected by Pericles. Vid. Athenæ.

Œbălia, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king Œbalus, and thence Œbalides puer is applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Œbalius sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.——The same name is given to Tarentum, because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by Œbalus. Virg. G. 4, v. 125.—Sil. 12, v. 451.

Œchălia, I. a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurytus was king over it, from which circumstance it is often called Eurytopolis.——II. A small town of Eubœa, where, according to some, Eurytas reigned, and not in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8, 9, and 10.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 291.—Ovid. Heroid. 9, Met. 9, v. 136.—Sophoc. in Thrac. 74, and Schol.

Œne, a small town of Argolis. The people are called Œneadæ.

Œniadæ, a town of Acarnania, "on the Achelous, a little above the sea, and surrounded by marshes, caused by the overflowings of the river, which rendered it a place of great strength, and deterred the Athenians from undertaking its siege; when, unlike the other cities of Acarnania, it embraced the cause of the Peloponnesians, and became hostile to Athens. At a later period of the war, it was however compelled by the Acarnanian confederacy to enter into an alliance with that power. The same writer gives us to understand that Œniadæ was first founded by Alcmæon, according to an oracle which he consulted after the murder of his mother, and that the province was named after his son Acarnan. The Ætolians, having in process of time conquered that part of Acarnania which lay on the left bank of the Achelous, became also possessed of Œniadæ, when they expelled the inhabitants under circumstances apparently of great hardship and cruelty, for which it is said they were threatened with the vengeance of Alexander the Great. By the advice of Cassander the Œniadæ settled in Sauria, (probably Thyria,) another Acarnanian town. Many years afterwards the Ætolians were compelled to evacuate Œniadæ by Philip the son of Demetrius, king of Macedon, in an expedition related by Polybius. This monarch, aware of the advantage to be derived from the occupation of a place so favourably situated with respect to the Peloponnesus, fortified the citadel, and enclosed within a wall both the port and arsenal. In the second Punic war this town was again taken by the Romans, under Val. Lævinus, and given up to the Ætolians, their allies. But, on a rupture taking place with that people, it was finally restored to the Acarnanians. We must search for the remains of Œniadæ to the east of the present mouth of the Achelous. The ruins which Sir W. Gell describes as situated above Missilonghi and the lake of Anatolico, on the spot named Kuria Irene, seem to possess many of the characteristic features appertaining to Œniadæ. It may however be doubted whether that town was so far from the Achelous, unless indeed the river once fell into the lake of Anatolico, which is possible: and a tradition to that effect is alluded to by Sir W. Gell, who strongly argues for the identity of the two places. It should, however, be observed, that the remains visible at Kuria Irene are hardly considerable enough for so important a city as Œniadæ. Mr. Dodwell, who describes them very minutely, says, that the walls seem not to be above two miles in circuit; and the ruins of the theatre on the south side of the city show it to have been the smallest building of the kind in Greece; he is therefore of opinion that Kuria Irene cannot be Œniadæ, which he places at Trigardon. This question, however, cannot be decided until the whole of the Parachelotis has been well examined. Sir W. Gell states that there are several appearances of ruined cities in the vicinity of Kuria Irene; one in particular at Gardako, which might be Œniadæ." Cram.

ŒNOE, I. a city of Argolis, where Œneus fled when driven from Calydon. Paus. 2, c. 25.——II. A town of Elis in the Peloponnesus. Strab.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 1, &c.

ŒNON, a part of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

ŒNŌNA, I. an ancient name of the island Ægina. It is also called Œnopia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.——II. A town of Troas, the birth-place of the nymph Œnone. Strab. 13.

ŒNŌPIA, one of the ancient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 473.

ŒNŌTRI, the inhabitants of Œnotria. "It appears, from the earliest period of which we have any records, that the southern portion of Italy, which was afterwards so much frequented by the Greeks as to derive from them the name of Magna Græcia, was occupied by the Œnotri, a people concerning whose origin it would be scarce worth our while to inquire, had not the opinion of some ancient writers attached greater importance to the subject than it would otherwise have appeared to deserve. We allude to the well-known hypothesis of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who regarded this primitive race as descended from a most ancient Arcadian colony, and further identified them with the Aborigines of the Latin writers. Antiochus of Syracuse, who is the earliest ancient author who is said to have studied the antiquities of Italy, evidently seems to have regarded the Œnotri, Itali, Chones, and Morgetes, as indigenous tribes, who had peopled the southern part of that country long before the Greeks formed any settlements there; a statement which could hardly be reconciled with the Arcadian descent of the Œnotri. The best informed writers among the moderns certainly look upon the population of Italy as having been disseminated from north to south; and this opinion seems so much more agreeable to reason and to history, that a contrary notion will scarcely gain credit at the present day. On this great principle, we should not be led to consider the Œnotri as a very early branch of the primitive Italian stock, but rather as the last scion propagated in a southerly direction. They were not so ancient apparently as the Ausones, whom tradition represented as being in possession of the country before the arrival of Œnotrus. It may be more worth our while to remark, that it was from Italus, a prince of the Œnotri, that the name of Italia was stated to have been derived; to him also is ascribed the merit of having first introduced agriculture, legislation, and other institutions tending to civilize his rude and barbarous subjects." Cram.

ŒNŌTRIA, a part of Italy, which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from Œnotrus the son of Lycaon, who settled there with a colony of Arcadians. The Œnotrians afterwards spread themselves into Umbria, and as far as Latium and the country of the Sabines, according to some writers. The name of Œnotria is sometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Œnotrus settled, was before inhabited by the Ausones. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536, l. 7, v. 85.—Ital. 8, v. 220. "The name of Œnotria, derived from the ancient race of the Œnotri, seems also to have been early in use among the Greeks, but it was applied by them to that southern portion of Italy only with which they were then acquainted." Cram.

ŒNŌTRIDES, two small islands on the coast of Lucania, where some of the Romans were banished by the emperors. They were called Iscia and Pontia.

ŒNUSÆ, small islands near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.—Thucyd. 8.——Others on the coast of the Peloponnesus, near Messenia. Mela, 2, c. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

ŒNUS, a small river of Laconia. Liv. 34, c. 28.

ŒROE, an island of Bœotia, formed by the Asopus. Herodot. 9, c. 50.

ŒTA, I. now Banina, a celebrated mountain between Thessaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himself. Its height has given occasion to the poets to feign that the sun, moon, and stars rose behind it. Mount Œta, properly speaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the straits of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia, in a western direction, to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The straits or passes of mount Œta are called the straits of Thermopylæ from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. These passes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. Mela, 2, c. 3.—Catull. 66, v. 54.—Apollod. 2. c. 7.—Paus. 10, c. 20, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 9, Met. 2, v. 216, l. 9, v. 204, &c.—Virg. Ecl. 8.—Plin. 25, c. 5.—Seneca in Met.—Lucan. 3, &c. "Mount Œta extends its ramifications westward into the country of the Dorians, and still further, into Ætolia, while to the south it is connected with the mountains of Locris and those of Bœotia. Its modern name is Katavothra. Sophocles represents Jove as thundering on the lofty crags of Œta. The highest summit, according to Livy, was named Callidromus: it was occupied by Cato with a body of troops in the battle fought at the pass of Thermopylæ, between the Romans under Acilius Glabrio, and the army of Antiochus; and owing to this manœuvre, the latter was entirely routed. Herodotus describes the path by which the Persian army turned the position of the Greeks, as beginning at the Asopus. Its name, as well as that of the mountain, is Anopæa. It leads along this ridge as far as Alponus, the first Locrian town. On the summit of mount Œta were two castles, named Tichius and Rhoduntia, which were successfully defended by the Ætolians against the Romans. The inhabitants of the chain of Œta, thence named Œtæi, constituted a tribe sufficiently numerous and warlike to prove a serious annoyance to the Lacedæmonian colony of Heraclea. On account of these depredations, their country was on one occasion ravaged and laid under contribution by Agis king of Sparta." Cram.——II. A small town at the foot of mount Œta, near Thermopylæ.

ŒTÆI, the mountaineers of Œta. Vid. Œta.

ŒTŸLUS, or ŒTŸLUM, a town of Laconia, which received its name from Œtylus, one of the heroes of Argos. Serapis had a temple there. Paus. 3, c. 25.

Oglosa, an island in the Tyrrhene Sea, east of Corsica, famous for wine, and now called Monte Christo. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Ogygia, a name of one of the gates of Thebes in Bœotia. Lucan. 1, v. 675.——An ancient name of Bœotia, from Ogyges, who reigned there.—The island of Calypso, opposite the promontory of Lacinium in Magna Græcia, where Ulysses was shipwrecked. The situation, and even the existence of Calypso's island, is disputed by some writers. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 52 and 85, l. 5, v. 254.

Olbia, I. a town of Sarmatia, at the confluence of the Hypanis and the Borysthenes, about 15 miles from the sea according to Pliny. It was afterwards called Borysthenes and Miletopolis, because peopled by a Milesian colony, and is now supposed to be Oczakow. Strab. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.——II. A town of Bithynia. Mela, 1, c. 19.——III. A town of Gallia Narbonensis. Mela, 2, c. 5.——IV. The capital of Sardinia. Claudian.

Olchinium, or Olcinium, now Dulcigno, a town of Dalmatia, on the Adriatic, Liv. 45, c. 26.

Oliaros, or Olīros, one of the Cyclades, about 16 miles in circumference, separated from Paros by a strait of seven miles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 126.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.—Plin. 4, c. 12. The situation of this island in regard to Paros, caused it to be designated by the name of Antiparos, which still remains to it in the slightly altered form of Antiparo. It is not included by Strabo among the Cyclades.

Olēnus, or Olenum, I. a town of Peloponnesus, between Patræ and Cyllene. The goat Amalthæa, which was made a constellation by Jupiter, is called Olenia, from its residence there. Paus. 7, c. 22.—Ovid. Met. 3.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.——II. Another in Ætolia.

Olisipo, now Lisbon, a town of ancient Spain on the Tagus, surnamed Felicitas Julia, (Plin. 4, c. 22.) called by some Ulyssippo, and said to be founded by Ulysses. Mela, 3, c. 1.—Solinus, 23. The fable of the founding of Olisipo was not by any means ancient, as the town itself was probably not older than the time of the Roman dominion in Lusitania.

Olitingi, a town of Lusitania. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Ollius, a river rising in the Alps and falling into the Po, now called the Oglio. Plin. 2, c. 103.

Olmius, a river of Bœotia, near Helicon, sacred to the Muses. Vid. Helicon. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 284.

Olpæ, "a fortress situated, as appears from Thucydides, on a height close to the shore of the Ambracian gulf, and not more than twenty-five stadia from Argos. The historian adds, that the Acarnanians held here a court of justice. A decisive victory was gained here by the Acarnanians and Amphilochians, under the command of Demosthenes, over the Ambraciots and Peloponnesians. Had it not been for this event, Olpæ would have remained unknown, as no other writer has ever mentioned it, with the exception of Stephanus Byz., who quotes from Thucydides. Modern maps point out some ruins on the site probably occupied by Olpæ." Cram.

Olympia, a town of Elis, on the left or southern bank of the Alpheus, opposite Pisa. The Eleans and Pisatæ long disputed the possession of this town, and of the temple, from which, together with the games there celebrated, it derived its sacred character. "The final struggle took place in the forty-eighth Olympiad, when the people of Pisa, as Pausanias affirms, supported by the Triphylians, and other neighbouring towns, which had revolted from Elis, made war upon that state. The Eleans, however, aided by Sparta, proved victorious, and put an end for ever to this contest by the destruction of Pisa and the other confederate towns. According to the Scholiast of Pindar, the city of Pisa was distant only six stadia from Olympia, in which case we might fix its site near that of Miracca, a little to the east of the celebrated spot called now Antilala; but Pausanias evidently leads us to suppose it stood on the opposite bank of the river. The Olympic games, as poets sung, were first instituted and solemnized by Hercules, who also planted the sacred grove called Altis, which he dedicated to Jupiter. The site was already celebrated as the seat of an oracle; but it was not until the Eleans had conquered the Pisatæ, and destroyed their city, that a temple was erected to the god with the spoils of the vanquished. This edifice was of Doric architecture, with a peristyle. It was sixty-eight feet in height from the ground to the pediment, ninety-five in width, and two hundred and thirty in length. Its roof, at each extremity of which was placed a gilt urn, was covered with slabs of Pentelic marble. The architect was a native of the country, named Libo. In the centre of one of the pediments, stood a figure of Victory with a golden shield, on which was sculptured a Medusa's head. Twenty-one gilt bucklers, the offering of the Roman general Mummius on the termination of the Achæan war, were also affixed to the outside frieze. The sculptures of the front pediments represented the race of Pelops and Œnomaus, with Myrtilus and Hippodamia; also Jupiter and the rivers Alpheus and Cladeus: these were all by Pæonius, an artist of Mende in Chalcide Thrace. In the posterior pediment Alcamenes had sculptured the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ. The other parts of the building were enriched with subjects taken from the labours of Hercules. On entering the gates, which were of brass, the spectator passed the statue of Iphitus crowned by Ecechiria on the right; and advancing through a double row of columns supporting porticoes, reached the statue of Jupiter, the chef d'œuvre of Phidias. The god was represented as seated on his throne, composed of gold, ebony, and ivory, studded with precious stones, and further embellished with paintings and the finest carved work. The Olympian deity was pourtrayed by the great Athenian artist in the sublime attitude and action conceived by Homer. The figure was of ivory and gold, and of such vast proportions, that, though seated, it almost reached the ceiling, which suggested the idea that in rising it would bear away the roof. The head was crowned with olive. In the right hand it grasped an image of Victory, and in the left a sceptre, curiously wrought of different metals, on which was perched an eagle. Both the sandals and vesture were of gold; the latter was also enriched with paintings of beasts and flowers by Panænus, the brother, or as some say, the nephew of Phidias. An enclosure surrounded the whole, by which spectators were prevented from approaching too near; this was also decorated with paintings by the same artist, which are minutely described, together with the other ornamental appendages to the throne and its supporters, by Pausanias. Within the Altis, or sacred grove, was the temenus of Pelops, whom the Eleans venerated among heroes, as much as Jupiter among other gods. This consecrated precinct, situated to the right of the northern approach to the temple, was adorned with plantations and statues. The hero himself, as we learn from Pindar, reposed on the banks of the Alpheus, and near the altar of Jupiter. Olympia now presents scarcely any vestiges of the numerous buildings, statues, and monuments, so elaborately detailed by Pausanias. Chandler could only trace 'the walls of the cell of a very large temple, standing many feet high, and well built, the stones all injured, and manifesting the labour of persons who have endeavoured by boring to get at the metal with which they were cemented. From a massive capital remaining, it was collected that the edifice had been of the Doric order.' Mr. Revett adds, 'that this temple appears to be rather smaller than that of Theseus at Athens, and in no manner agrees with the temple of the Olympian Jove.' The ruins of this latter edifice, as Sir W. Gell reports, 'are to be seen toward the Alpheus, and fifty-five geographic paces distant from the hill of Saturn. There are several bushes which mark the spot, and the Turks of Lalla are often employed in excavating the stones. Between the temple and the river, in the descent of the bank, are vestiges of the hippodrome, or buildings serving for the celebration of the Olympic games. These accompany the road to Miracca on the right to some distance. The whole valley is very beautiful.'" Cram.

Olympias, a fountain of Arcadia, near the ruins of Trapezus, on the left bank of the river Alpheus. Speaking of a place called Bathos, Pausanias remarks, "there is a fountain here which is denominated Olympias, the water of which flows only every other year: and fire ascends near the fountain. The Arcadians report, that the battle between the giants and the gods was fought here, and not at Pellene in Thrace: in consequence of which they sacrifice here to lightning, storms, and thunder." Paus.

Olympus, now Lacha, a mountain of Greece, on the borders of Thessaly and Macedonia. The ancients supposed that it touched the heavens with its top; and, from that circumstance, they have placed the residence of the gods there, and have made it the court of Jupiter. It is about one mile and a half in perpendicular height, and is covered with pleasant woods, caves, and grottoes. On the top of the mountain, according to the notions of the poets, there was neither wind nor rain, nor clouds, but an eternal spring. Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, 6, &c.—Ovid. Met.—Lucan. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8. "Dr. Holland, who beheld it from Litochori at its foot, observes, 'We had not before been aware of the extreme vicinity of the town to the base of Olympus, from the thick fogs which hung over us for three successive days, while traversing the country; but on leaving it, and accidentally looking back, we saw through an opening in the fog a faint outline of vast precipices, seeming almost to overhang the place, and so aerial in their aspect, that for a few minutes we doubted whether it might not be a delusion to the eye. The fog, however, dispersed yet more on this side, and partial openings were made, through which, as through arches, we saw the sun-beams resting on the snowy summits of Olympus, which rose into a dark blue sky far above the belt of clouds and mist that hung upon the sides of the mountain. The transient view we had of the mountain from this point showed us a line of precipices of vast height, forming its eastern front toward the sea, and broken at intervals by deep hollows or ravines, which were richly clothed with forest trees. The oak, chesnut, beech, plane-tree, &c. are seen in great abundance along the base and skirts of the mountain; and towards the summit of the first ridge large forests of pine spread themselves along the acclivities, giving that character to the face of the mountain, which is so often alluded to by the ancient poets.'" Cram.

Olynthus, a celebrated town of Macedonia. It stood "at the head of the gulf which separates the peninsula of Pallene from that of Sithonia, and was founded probably by the Chalcidians and Eretrians of Eubœa. Herodotus relates, that it was afterwards held by the Bottiæi, who had been expelled from the Thermæan gulf by the Macedonians; but on the revolt of Potidæa, and other towns on this coast, from the Persians, it was besieged and taken by Artabazus, a commander of Xerxes, who put all the inhabitants to the sword, and delivered the town to Critobulus of Torone and the Chalcidians. Perdiccas, some years after, persuaded the Bottiæi and Chalcidians to abandon their other towns, and make Olynthus their principal city, previous to their engaging in hostilities with the Athenians. In this war the Olynthians obtained some decisive advantages over that republic; and the expedition of Brasidas enabled them effectually to preserve their freedom and independence, which was distinctly recognised by treaty. From this time the republic of Olynthus gradually acquired so much power and importance among the northern states of Greece, that it roused the jealousy and excited the alarm of the more powerful of the southern republics, Athens and Lacedæmon. The Olynthians, apparently proceeding on the federal system, afterwards so successfully adopted by the Achæans, incorporated into their alliance all the smaller towns in their immediate vicinity; and by degrees succeeded in detaching several important places from the dominions of Amyntas king of Macedon, who had not the power of protecting himself from these encroachments. At length, however, a deputation from the Chalcidic cities of Apollonia and Acanthus, whose independence was at that time immediately threatened by Olynthus, having directed the attention of Sparta, then at the height of its political importance, to this rising power, it was determined in a general assembly of the Peloponnesian states to despatch an army of ten thousand men into Thrace. The Olynthians found themselves unable to cope with their powerful and persevering antagonists, and were at length forced to sue for peace; which was granted on condition that they should acknowledge their dependance on Sparta, and take part in all its wars. We afterwards find Philip and the Olynthians in league against Athens, with the view of expelling that power from Thrace. Of the circumstances which induced this republic to abandon the interest of Macedon in favour of Athens, we are not well informed; but the machinations of the party hostile to Philip led to a declaration of war against that monarch; and the Athenians were easily prevailed upon by the eloquence of Demosthenes to send forces to the support of Olynthus, under the command of Chares. On obtaining possession of this important city, Philip gave it up to plunder, reduced the inhabitants to slavery, and razed the walls to the ground. Olynthus was sixty stadia from Potidæa, and within sight of that town, as we learn from Thucydides. Xenophon mentions a river that flowed near it, but of which he does not give us the name. The ruins of Olynthus are now called Agios Mamas." Cram.

Olyras, a river near Thermopylæ, which, as the mythologists report, attempted to extinguish the funeral pile on which Hercules was consumed. Strab. 9.

Omphalos, a place of Crete, sacred to Jupiter, on the border of the river Triton.

Onchestus, a town of Bœotia. In the time of Pausanias this place was in ruins. It is thus described by that author. "The ruins of the city Onchestus are about fifteen stadia distant from this mountain; and they say that Onchestus the son of Neptune once dwelt in this city. At present, indeed, a temple and statue of Onchestian Neptune remain: and there is likewise a grove here which is celebrated by Homer. On turning from the temple of the Cabiri to the left hand, and proceeding to the distance of about fifty stadia, you will arrive at the city Thespiæ." Paus. 9, c. 26.

Oneium. "Oneium was a fortress situated in the chain of the Oneian mountains, and commanding the pass which led through them. This place must be sought for in the mountains above Mertese, and near the village of Hexamili Apano." Cram.

Onugnathos, a promontory of Laconia, now separated from the main land, and forming the Isola de Servi, in the Sinus Laconicus, towards the island of Cythera. "This promontory, which is distant from Asopus about two hundred stadia, extends itself into the sea, and is called the jaw-bone of an ass. It contains a temple of Minerva, which is without a statue and a roof, and is said to have been made by Agamemnon. There is also a monument here of Cinadus, who was the pilot of Menelaus." Paus.

Ophiades, an island on the coast of Arabia, so called from the great number of serpents found there. It belonged to the Egyptian kings, and was considered valuable for the topaz it produced. Diod. 3.

Ophis, a small river of Arcadia, which falls into the Alpheus.

Ophiusa, the ancient name of Rhodes.——A small island near Crete.——A town of Sarmatia.——An island near the Baleares so called from the number of serpents which it produced (ὄφις serpens.) It is now called Formentera.

Opici, a people of the south of Italy. "The Opici, or Osci, who seem to have occupied the central region of Italy, extended themselves largely both west and east. In the first direction they formed the several communities distinguished by the name of Latins, Rutuli, Volsci, Campani, and Sidicini. In the central districts they constituted the Sabine nation, from whom were descended the Picentes, as well as the Æqui, Marsi, Hernici, Peligni, Vestini, and Marrucini. From the Opici again, in conjunction with the Liburni, an Illyrian nation who had very early formed settlements on the eastern coast of Italy, we must derive the Apuli and Daunii, Peucetii and Pœdiculi, Calabri, Iapyges, and Messapii." Cram.

Opis, a town on the Tigris, afterwards called Antiochia. Xenoph. Anab. 2.

Opitergini, a people near Aquileia, on the Adriatic. Their chief city is called Opitergium, now Oderzo. Lucan. 4, v. 416.

Opus, (opuntis,) "one of the most ancient cities of Greece, celebrated by Pindar as the domain of Deucalion and Pyrrha. Strabo says that Opus was fifteen stadia from the sea, and that the distance between it and Cynus, its emporium, was sixty stadia. Livy places Opus one mile only from the sea. The position of this town has not been precisely determined by the researches of modern travellers; but its ruins are laid down in Lapie's map a little to the south-west of Alachi, and east of Talanta. The bay, which the sea forms on this part of the coast, was known by the name of Opuntius Sinus. The form of government adopted by the Opuntians was peculiar, since as we learn from Aristotle, they intrusted the sole administration to one magistrate. Plutarch commends their piety and observance of religious rites. Herodotus informs us that they furnished seven ships to the Greek fleet at Artemisium. They were subsequently conquered by Myronides the Athenian general." Cram.

Orates, a river of European Scythia. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 47. As this river is not now known, Vossius reads Crates, a river which is found in Scythia. Val. Flacc. 4, v. 719.—Thucyd. 4.

Orbelus, a mountain of Thrace or Macedonia, which formed part of the great chain separating Pæonia from Dardania and Mœsia. It will be seen, however, that this appellation was sometimes applied also to the ridge more usually called Hæmus and Rhodope. Diodorus states that Cassander established, in the district around mount Orbelus, now Egrisou Dagh, a body of Illyrian Autariatæ, who had wandered from their country and infested Pæonia." Cram.

Orcades, islands on the northern coasts of Britain, now called the Orkneys. They were unknown till Britain was discovered to be an island by Agricola, who presided there as governor. Tacit. in Agric.—Juv. 2, v. 161.

Orchomĕnus, or Orchomĕnum, I. a town of Bœotia, at the west of the lake Copais. It was anciently called Minyeia, and from that circumstance the inhabitants were often called Minyans of Orchomenus. There was at Orchomenus a celebrated temple, built by Eteocles, son of Cephisus, sacred to the Graces, who were from thence called the Orchomenian goddesses. The inhabitants founded Teos in conjunction with the Ionians, under the sons of Codrus. Plin. 4, c. 8.—Herodot. 1, c. 146.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—Strab. 9.——II. A town of Arcadia, at the north of Mantinea. Homer. Il. 2.——III. A town of Thessaly, with a river of the same name. Strab.

Ordovices, the people of North Wales in Britain, mentioned by Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53.

Orestæ, a people of Epirus. Vid. Orestis.

Orestæas. Vid. Hadrianopolis.

Orestēum, a town of Arcadia, about 18 miles from Sparta. It was founded by Orestheus, a son of Lycaon, and originally called Orestheium, and afterwards Orestetum, from Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, who resided there for some time after the murder of Clytemnestra. Paus. 8, c. 8.—Euripid.

Orestis, or Orestida, a part of Macedonia. "The Orestæ were situated apparently to the south-east of the Lyncestæ, and, like them, originally independent of the Macedonian kings, though afterwards annexed to their dominions. From their vicinity to Epirus, we find them frequently connected with that portion of northern Greece; indeed, Steph. Byz. terms them a Molossian tribe. At a later period the Orestæ became subject to the last Philip of Macedon; but, having revolted under the protection of a Roman force, they were declared free on the conclusion of peace between Philip and the Romans. The country of the Orestæ was apparently of small extent, and contained but few towns. Among these Orestia is named by Stephanus, who states it to have been the birthplace of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. Its foundation was ascribed by tradition to Orestes. This is probably the same city called by Strabo Argos Oresticum, built, as he affirms, by Orestes. The country of the Orestæ corresponds in many points with the territory of Castoria, a town of some extent, situated near the lake of Celetrum, to which it now gives its name. Celetrum is perhaps the Κελαιδιον of Hierocles." Cram.

Oretāni, a people of Spain; their country was in Tarraconensis, on the borders of Bætica, north of the Marianus mons. This region answers in a great measure to those parts of Estramadura and Castile which lie upon the Guadiana, between the Sierra Morena and the mountains of Toledo, the ancient capital Oretum being now denominated Oreto. Liv. 21, c. 11, l. 35, c. 7.

Orga, or Orgas, a river of Phrygia, falling into the Mæander. Strab.—Plin.

Oricum, or Oricus, a town of Epirus, on the Ionian Sea, founded by a colony from Colchis, according to Pliny. It was called Dardania, because Helenus and Andromache, natives of Troy or Dardania, reigned over the country after the Trojan war. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly esteemed by the Romans on account of its situation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 136.—Liv. 24, c. 40.—Plin. 2, c. 89.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 3, v. 187.

Oriens, in ancient geography, is taken for all the most eastern parts of the world, such as Parthia, India, Assyria, &c.

Oritæ, a people of India, who submitted to Alexander, &c. Strab. 15.

Oriundus, a river of Illyricum. Liv. 44. c. 31.

Ornea, a town of Argolis, famous for a battle fought there between the Lacedæmonians and Argives. Diod.

Ornithon, a town of Phœnicia, between Tyre and Sidon.

Orobii, a people of Cisalpine Gaul, north of the Insubres. "We are surprised at first to find a people with a Greek name in this part of Italy, but it is accounted for by the fact of a Greek colony having been settled in this district by Pompeius Strabo and Cornelius Scipio, and subsequently by J. Cæsar. The chief seat of this colony was Comum, as we learn from Strabo. It had been hitherto an inconsiderable place, but from that time it rose to a great degree of prosperity under the name of Novum Comum." Cram.

Oromēdon, a lofty mountain in the island of Cos. Theocrit. 7.

Orontes, a river of Syria, rising on the boundaries of Cœlosyria, and running along the base of mount Libanus upon the eastern side. At Antioch, the defiles of the mountains give it a passage to the sea, into which, turning almost directly south after a course of a few miles, it discharges itself. Its banks were formerly lined with flourishing towns, among which were Emessa, Epiphania, Apamea, Antioch, and the far-famed and beautiful Daphne. "The Orontes is undoubtedly the first of the Syrian rivers; yet were it not for the numerous bars which dam up its waters, it would be completely dry in summer. The water thus retained requires the aid of machinery to raise it for the supply of the adjoining plains. Hence it has received the modern name of Aasi, or the Obstinate." Malte-Brun. D'Anville supposes that its modern name alludes to its course, which, flowing north, is unlike that of almost all the eastern rivers of those parts, which, like the Euphrates, Tigris, &c. incline to the south. In Greek authors this river is sometimes called the Typhon, as in Pausanias and Strabo; and this name, connected with the mythology of the east, is said to have given place to that of Orontes the architect, by whom the first bridge was erected over its tumultuous and rapid stream. Pomp. Mel. Ed. Gron. According to Strabo, who mentions some fabulous accounts concerning it, the Orontes disappeared under ground for the space of five miles. The word Oronteus is often used as Syrius. Dionys. Perieg.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 248.—Strab. 16.—Paus. 8, c. 20.

Orōpus, I. a town of Bœotia, on the borders of Attica, near the Euripus, which received its name from Oropus, a son of Macedon. It was the frequent cause of quarrels between the Bœotians and the Athenians, whence some have called it one of the cities of Attica, and was at last confirmed in the possession of the Athenians, by Philip, king of Macedon, Amphiaraus had a temple there. Paus. 1, c. 34.—Strab. 9.——II. A small town of Eubœa.——III. Another in Macedonia.

Orospeda mons, a range of mountains in Hispania, accompanying the line of the coast from Calpe to the Portus Magnus, at which the shore diverges towards the north. Here, turning in the same direction, the mountains environ the springs of the Bætis. In antiquity, this ridge of hills divided the Bastuli Pæni from the Turduli and Turdetani, forming, in modern geography, the line of separation between Granada and Andalusia.

Ortygia, a small island of Sicily, within the bay of Syracuse, which formed once one of the four quarters of that great city. It was in this island that the celebrated fountain Arethusa arose. Ortygia is now the only part remaining of the once famed Syracuse, about two miles in circumference, and inhabited by 18,000 souls. It has suffered, like the towns on the eastern coast, by the eruptions of Ætna. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 694.—Hom. Od. 15, v. 403.——An ancient name of the island of Delos. Some suppose that it received this name from Latona, who fled thither when changed into a quail (ὀρτυξ) by Jupiter, to avoid the pursuits of Juno. Diana was called Ortygia, as being born there; as also Apollo. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 651. Fast. 5, v. 692.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 124.

Osca, a town of Spain, now Huesca in Arragon. Liv. 34, c. 10.

Osci, a people between Campania and the country of the Volsci, who assisted Turnus against Æneas. Some suppose that they are the same as the Opici, the word Osci being a diminutive or abbreviation of the other. The language, the plays, are ludicrous expressions of this nation, are often mentioned by the ancients, and from their indecent tendency some suppose the word obscœnum (quasi oscenum) is derived. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 14.—Cic. Fam. 7, ep. 1.—Liv. 10, c. 20.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 730. "It is universally agreed that the first settlers in Campania with whom history makes us acquainted are the Oscans. Of this most ancient Italian tribe we have already spoken in the account of Italy, and in other articles referring to that country. It will be seen from thence how widely diffused was the Oscan name, so much so, that the term Opici was at one time synonymous with that of Itali in the minds of the Greeks. It has also been observed, that the dissemination of this vast Italian family was commensurate with that of its language, of which we yet possess some few remains, and which is known to have been a dialect still in use in the best days of Roman literature: even when the Oscan name had disappeared from the rest of Italy, this language was retained by the inhabitants of Campania, though mingled with the dialects of the various tribes which successively obtained possession of that much prized country." Cram.

Osismii, a people of Gaul, in the western extremity of the country. They occupied the region north of the Corisopoti, the northern portion of Bretagne in the modern department of Finisterre.

Osrhoëne, a country of Mesopotamia, which received this name from one of its kings called Osrhoes. It was included principally between the Euphrates and the Chaboras.

Ossa, I. a lofty mountain of Thessaly, once the residence of the Centaurs. It was formerly joined to mount Olympus, but Hercules, as some report, separated them, and made between them the celebrated valley of Tempe. This separation of the two mountains was more probably effected by an earthquake, which happened, as fabulous accounts represent, about 1885 years before the Christian era. Ossa was one of those mountains which the giants, in their wars against the gods, heaped up one on the other to scale the heavens with more facility. Mela, 2, c. 3—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 155, l. 2, v. 225, l. 7, v. 244. Fast. 1, v. 307, l. 3, v. 441.—Strab. 9.—Lucan. 1 and 6.—Virg. G. 1, v. 281.——II. A town of Macedonia.

Ostia, a town built at the mouth of the river Tiber by Ancus Martius, king of Rome, about 16 miles distant from Rome. It had a celebrated harbour, and was so pleasantly situated that the Romans generally spent a part of the year there as in a country-seat. There was a small tower in the port, like the Pharos of Alexandria, built upon the wreck of a large ship which had been sunk there, and which contained the obelisks of Egypt with which the Roman emperors intended to adorn the capital of Italy. In the age of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour, and added much to the size of the small islands, which sheltered the ships at the entrance of the river. Ostia, and her harbour called Portus, became gradually separated, and are now at a considerable distance from the sea. Flor. 1, c. 4, l. 3, c. 21.—Liv. 1, c. 33.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Sueton.—Plin.

Othrys, a mountain, or rather a chain of mountains, in Thessaly, the residence of the Centaurs. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 7, c. 129.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675. This mountain, "which, branching out of Tymphrestus, one of the highest points in the Pindian chain, closed the great basin of Thessaly to the south, and served at the same time to divide the waters which flowed northwards into the Peneus from those received by the Sperchius. This mountain is often celebrated by the poets of antiquity. At present it is known by the different names of Hellovo, Varibovo and Goura." Cram.

Oxeæ, the most western of the Echinades. By some this little group is supposed to be the same as those denominated Thoæ by Homer; and Dulichium is supposed by others to be the principal one in size and importance. They are now called Curzolari, the chief or largest among them retaining still the name of Oxia.

Oxus, a river of Asia towards the most northern parts which the ancients pretended to know, and which indeed they knew but inaccurately. In antiquity it rose in the mountains called Imaus, and, flowing almost west to the confines of Parthia, formed the boundary between Bactriana and Margiana on the south, and Sogdiana on the north. So far the notions of the ancients appear to have been generally accurate and uniform. Dionysius Periegetes, however, places it in Sogidiana, and Polybius seems to infer that its current was farther south than the borders of that country, and belonged to Bactriana. Arrived at the north-eastern limit of Margiana, the Oxus turns, with an inclination to the north, through the country of the Chorasmii, the modern Kharasm. Here the notions of the most authentic of the Greek and Roman geographers become confused in relation to the course and mouth of this river. The greater number describing its line as east and west, declare that it falls into the Caspian Sea; but Mela, and even Dionysius Periegetes, appear to have been aware of its northern bend, though they do not express a different opinion from the others in regard to the sea which receives the tribute of its waters. Many moderns have been disposed, from these varying accounts, to suppose that the Oxus, which, with the name of Gihon, now flows into the sea of Aral, must have altered its course among the changes of ages; but the calculations of Malte-Brun evince the identity of the course of this river from the accounts of the ancients themselves, at the present time and in the times to which those authorities relate. Herodotus, according to D'Anville, seems to have referred to this river under the name of Araxes. In the geography of modern Asia the Gihon belongs, for the former part of its course, to Bokkara, and for the latter to Kharasm, both in Tartary. In treating Kharasm, Malte-Brun has the following remarks on this river: "The large river Gihon, or Amoo, which crosses this country, is, according to the historians of Alexander, six or seven stadia broad. It is too deep to be forded. A similar description of it is given by the Arabian geographers; the latter speak of inundations occasioned by it. When it arrives at the base of the Weisluka mountains, in Khowaresm, the Gihon is separated into several canals of irrigation, preserving two principal branches. The small arm of the Gihon is the only one which contains water. The other, when the water is high, spreads over a marshy flat, through which it passes; and, like all rivers which have indifferent banks, it is sometimes left dry at several parts of its course."

Oxydracæ, a nation of India. They occupied the country now Outche, a part of *Moolt*an, between the Acesines and the Indus, and furnished large contributions, both in men and chariots, to Alexander in his eastern expedition. Curt. 9, c. 4.

Oxyrynchus, a town of Egypt, now Behnesa, some distance west of the Nile on the canal of Joseph. Its name was derived from the peculiar worship which the inhabitants were accustomed to pay to a certain species of fish with a pointed nose. D'Anville.

P.

Pachinus, or Pachynus, now Passaro, a promontory of Sicily, projecting about two miles into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, at the south-east corner of the island, with a small harbour of the same name. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7. —Virg. Æn. 3, v. 699.—Paus. 5, c. 25.

Pactolus, a celebrated river of Lydia, rising in mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus, after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas washed himself when he turned into gold whatever he touched; and from that circumstance it ever after rolled golden sands, and received the name of Chrysorrhoas. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo observes, that it had no golden sands in his age. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 18.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 86.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

Padinum, now Bondeno, a town on the Po, where it begins to branch into different channels. Plin. 3, c. 15.

Padus, (now called the Po,) a river in Italy. Vid. Eridanus.

Pæmani, a people of Belgic Gaul, supposed to dwell in the present country at the west of Luxemburg. Cas. G. 2, c. 4.

Pæones. "The Pæonians were a numerous and ancient nation, that once occupied the greatest part of Macedonia, and even a considerable portion of what is more properly called Thrace, extending along the coast of the Ægean as far as the Euxine. This we collect from Herodotus's account of the wars of that people with the Perinthians, a Greek colony settled on the shores of the Propontis, at no great distance from Byzantium. Homer, who was apparently well acquainted with the Pæonians, represents them as following their leader Asteropæus to the siege of Troy in behalf of Priam, and places them in Macedonia, on the banks of the Axius. We know also from Livy that Emathia once bore the name of Pæonia, though at what period we cannot well ascertain. From another passage in the same historian, it would seem that the Dardani of Illyria had once exercised dominion over the whole of Macedonian Pæonia. This passage seems to agree with what Herodotus states, that the Pæonians were a colony of the Teucri, who came from Troy, that is, if we suppose the Dardani to be the same as the Teucri, or at least a branch of them. But these transactions are too remote and obscure for examination. Herodotus, who dwells principally on the history of the Pæonians around the Strymon, informs us, that they were divided into numerous small tribes, most of which were transplanted into Asia by Megabyzus, a Persian general, who had made the conquest of their country by order of Darius. The circumstances of this event, which are given in detail by Herodotus, will be found in his fourth book, c. 12. It appears, however, from that historian, that these Pæonians afterwards effected their escape from the Persian dominions, and returned to their country. Those who were found on the line of march pursued by Xerxes were compelled to follow that monarch in his expedition. Herodotus seems to place the main body of the Pæonian nation near the Strymon, but Thucydides with Homer extends their territory to the river Axius. But if we follow Strabo and Livy, we shall be disposed to remove the western limits of the nation as far as the great chain of mount Scardus and the borders of Illyria. In general terms then we may affirm, that the whole of northern Macedonia, from the source of the river Erigonus, which has been stated to rise in the chain above mentioned, to the Strymon was once named Pæonia. This large tract of country was divided into two parts by the Romans, and formed the second and third regions of Macedonia. The Pæonians, though constituting but one nation, were divided into several tribes, each probably governed by a separate chief." Cram.

Pæonia. Vid. Pæones.

Pæsos, a town of the Hellespont, called also Apæsos, situated at the north of Lampsacus. When it was destroyed, the inhabitants migrated to Lampsacus, where they settled. They were of Milesian origin. Strab. 13.—Homer. Il. 2.

PÆSTUM, a town of Lucania, called also Neptunia and Posidonia by the Greeks, where the soil produced roses which blossomed twice a year. "Pæstum stands in a fertile plain, bounded on the west by the Tyrrhene Sea, and about a mile distant on the south by fine hills, in the midst of which Acropolis sits embosomed; on the north, by the bay of Salerno and its rugged border; while to the east the country swells into two mountains, which still retain their ancient names Callimari and Cantena; and behind them towers Mont Alburnus itself with its pointed summits. A stream called the Solofone (which may probably be its ancient appellation) flows under the walls, and by spreading its waters over its lower borders, and thus producing pools that corrupt in hot weather, continues, as in ancient times, to infect the air, and render Pæstum a dangerous residence in summer. Obscurity hangs over, not the origin only but the general history of the city, though it has left such magnificent monuments of its existence. The mere outlines have been sketched perhaps with accuracy; the details are probably obliterated for ever. According to the learned Mazzocchi, Pæstum was founded by a colony of Dorenses or Dorians, from Dora, a city of Phœnicia, the parent of that race and name, whether established in Greece or in Italy. It was first called Poseian or Posian, which in Phenician signifies Neptune, to whom it was dedicated. It was afterwards invaded, and its primitive inhabitants expelled by the Sybarites. This event is supposed to have taken place about five hundred years before the Christian era. Under its new masters Pæstum assumed the Greek appellation Posidonia, of the same import as its Phenician name, because a place of great opulence and magnitude, and is supposed to have extended from the present ruin southward to the hill, on which stands the little town still called from its ancient destination Acropoli. The Lucanians afterwards expelled the Sybarites, and checked the prosperity of Posidonia, which was in turn deserted, and left to moulder away imperceptibly; vestiges of it are still visible all over the plain of Spinazzo or Saracino. The original city then recovered its first name, and not long after was taken, and at length colonized by the Romans. From this period Pæstum is mentioned almost solely by the poets, who, from Virgil to Claudian, seem all to expatiate with delight amid its gardens, and grace their composition with the bloom, the sweetness, and the fertility of its roses. But unfortunately the flowery retreats, seem to have had few charms in the eyes of the Saracens, and if possible, still fewer in those of the Normans, who, each in their turn, plundered Pæstum, and at length compelled its remaining inhabitants to abandon their ancient seat, and to take shelter in the mountains. To them Capaccio Vecchio and Novo are supposed to owe their origin; both these towns are situate on the hills: the latter is the residence of the bishop and chapter of Pæstum. It will naturally be asked to which of the nations that were successively in possession of Pæstum the edifices which still subsist are to be ascribed; not to the Romans, who never seem to have adopted the genuine Doric style: the Sybarites are said to have occupied the neighbouring plain; the Dorians therefore appear to have the fairest claim to these majestic and everlasting monuments. But at what period were they erected? to judge from their form we must conclude that they are the oldest specimens of Grecian architecture now in existence. In beholding them and contemplating their solidity bordering upon heaviness, we are tempted to consider them as an intermediate link between the Egyptian and Grecian manner, and the first attempt to pass from the immense masses of the former to the graceful proportions of the latter. In fact the temples of Pæstum, Agrigentum, and Athens, seem instances of the commencement, the improvement, and the perfection of the Doric order." Eustace.

PAGASÆ, or PAGASA, a town of Magnesia in Thessaly, on the Pagasæus Sinus, with an harbour and promontory of the same name. The ship Argo was built there, as some suppose, and, according to Propertius, the Argonauts set sail from that harbour. From that circumstance, not only the ship Argo, but also the Argonauts themselves, were ever after distinguished by the epithet of Pagasæus. Pliny confounds Pagasæ with Demetrias, but they are different, and the latter was peopled by the inhabitants of the former, who preferred the situation of Demetrias for its conveniences. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 1, l. 8, v. 349.—Lucan. 2, v. 715, l. 6, v. 400.—Mela, 2, c. 3 and 7.—Strab. 9.—Propert. 1, el. 20, v. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—Apollon. Rhod. 1, v. 238, &c.

PAGASETICUS, and PAGASITES SINUS, sometimes called likewise Pagasæus Sinus, the bay upon which the town of Pagasæ was situated. It is now the Gulf of Volo.

PALÆ, a town at the south of Corsica, now St. Bonifacio.

PALÆAPOLIS, a small island on the coast of Spain. Strab.

PALÆPAPHOS, the ancient town of Paphos, in Cyprus, adjoining to the new. Strab. 14.

PALÆPHARSALUS, the ancient name of Pharsalus in Thessaly. Cæs. B. A. 48.

PALÆPOLIS, a town of Campania, built by a Greek colony, where Naples afterwards was erected. Liv. 8, c. 22.

PALÆSTE, a village of Epirus, near Oricus where Cæsar first landed with his fleet. Lucan 5, v. 460.

PALÆSTINA, a country of Asia, south of Cœlosyria, and having on the west that part of the Mediterranean called in the sacred writings the Great Sea, which extended between Asia Minor and the coast of Africa. On the south was Arabia Petræa, on the east the spacious barrens of Arabia Deserta. "It is agreed that the name of Palæstina is derived from the Philistines. For notwithstanding that the Hebrew people established themselves in Canaan, the Philistines maintained possession of a maritime country, which extended to the limits of Egypt. And there is reason to believe that it was the Syrians who, by a greater attachment to this people than to a nation originally foreign in the country, have given occasion to the extension of the name of Palæstine, which is found in history at the time of Herodotus, and which the Jewish writers have since adopted in the same extent. In the first years of the fifth century, this name was communicated to three provinces; first, second, and third. And the last occupied Arabia Petrea." D'Anville. The first occupations to be noticed, in the consideration of this country, are those called the Jewish and Canaanitish, neither of which belong in strictness to classical geography. According to the former, a number of people, for the greater part of unknown origin and race, possessed in various apportionments the whole of Palestine; and according to the other, the 12 tribes, so distinguished in Scripture, disributed among themselves the same extent of territory. On the west, however, the Philistines disputed with them the possession of the coast from Joppa to the borders of Arabia. Over all the tribes the power and dominion were vested in the first anointed king, and from him transferred to the unambitious father of the Jewish race of monarchs, the lowly and virtuous David. "The despotism exercised by Solomon created a strong re-action, which was immediately felt on the accession of his son Rehoboam. This prince, rejecting the advice of his aged counsellors, and following that of the younger and more violent, soon had the misfortune to see the greater part of his kingdom wrested from him. In reply to the address of his people, who entreated an alleviation of their burdens, he declared, that instead of requiring less at their hands he should demand more. 'My father made your yoke heavy, I will add to your yoke; my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.' Such a resolution, expressed in language at once so contemptuous and severe, alienated from his government ten tribes, who sought a more indulgent master in Jeroboam, a declared enemy of the house of David. Hence the origin of the kingdom of Israel, as distinguished from that of Judah; and hence, too, the disgraceful contentions between these kindred states, which acknowledged one religion, and professed to be guided by the same law. Arms and negotiation proved equally unavailing, in repeated attempts which were made to reunite the Hebrews under one sceptre: till at length, about two hundred and seventy years after the death of Solomon, the younger people were subdued by Shalmaneser, the powerful monarch of Assyria, who carried them away captive into the remoter provinces of his vast empire. Jeroboam had erected in his kingdom the emblems of a less pure faith, to which he confined the attention of his subjects; while the frequent wars that ensued, and the treaties formed on either side with the Gentile nations on their respective borders, soon completed the estrangement which ambition had begun. Little attached to the native line of princes, the Israelites placed on the throne of Samaria a number of adventurers, who had no qualities to recommend them besides military courage and an irreconcilable hatred towards the more legitimate claimants of the house of David. The kingdom of Judah, less distracted by the pretensions of usurpers, and being confirmed in the principles of patriotism by a more rigid adherence to the laws of Moses, continued, during one hundred and thirty years, to resist the encroachments of the two rival powers, Egypt and Assyria, which now began to contend in earnest for the possession of Palestine. Several endeavours were made even after the destruction of Samaria, to unite the energies of the Twelve Tribes, and thereby to secure the independence of the sacred territory a little longer. But a pitiful jealousy had succeeded to the aversion generated by a long course of hostile aggression; while the overwhelming hosts, which incessantly issued from the Euphrates and the Nile to select a field of battle within the borders of Canaan, soon left to the feeble councils of Jerusalem no other choice than that of an Egyptian or an Assyrian master. A siege, which appears to have continued fifteen or sixteen months, terminated in the final reduction of the holy city, and in the captivity of Zedekiah, who was treated with the utmost severity. His two sons were executed in his presence, after which his eyes were put out; when, being loaded with fetters, he was carried to Babylon and thrown into prison. The event now alluded to took place exactly six centuries before the Christian era; and hence the return of the Jews to the Holy Land must have occurred about the year 530 prior to the same great epoch. Under the Persian satraps, who directed the civil and military government of Syria, the Jews were permitted to acknowledge the authority of their own high-priest, to whom, in all things pertaining to the law of Moses, they rendered the obedience which was due to the head of their nation. Their prosperity, it is true, was occasionally diminished or increased by the personal character of the sovereigns who successively occupied the throne of Cyrus; but no material change in their circumstances took place until the victories of Alexander the Great had laid the foundation of the Syro-Macedonian kingdom in Western Asia, and given a new dynasty to the crown of Egypt. The struggles which ensued between these powerful states frequently involved the interests of the Jews, and made new demands upon their allegiance; although it is admitted, that as each was desirous to conciliate a people who claimed Palestine for their unalienable heritage, the Hebrews at large were, during two centuries, treated with much liberality and favour. But this generosity or forbearance was interrupted in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, alarmed by the report of insurrections, and harassed by the events of an unsuccessful war in Egypt, directed his angry passions against the Jews. The severities of Antiochus, which had inflamed the resentment of the whole Jewish people, called forth in a hostile attitude the brave family of the Maccabees, whose valour and perseverance enabled them to dispute with the powerful monarch of Syria the sovereignty of Palestine. But the victorious Maccabees, who had delivered their country from the oppression of foreigners, encountered a more formidable enemy in the factious spirit of their own people. Alcimus, a tool of the Syrians, assumed the title of high-priest, and in virtue of his office claimed the obedience of all who acknowledged the institutions of Moses. In this emergency Judas courted the alliance of the Romans, who willingly extended their protection to confederates so likely to aid their ambitious views in the east; but before the republic could interpose her arms in his behalf, the Hebrew general had fallen in the field of battle." Russell's Palestine. After a long series of wars and domestic disasters, Palestine received from the Romans a monarch, in the person of Herod the Great, who, acknowledging allegiance to Rome, was permitted to exercise the functions of royalty in this land, now fast falling from its faith. In the reign of Augustus, with the deposition of Archelaus, the son of Herod, ended the Israelitish rule in Jerusalem, which then became in form, as it had long been in fact, a province of the empire, and Pontius Pilate succeeded as second governor of this dependancy. But thus shorn of even the show of independence, Palestine was not suffered to enjoy domestic peace in slavery; and the commotions and tumults which mark her history as a province, till the destruction of the city by Titus, are in no degree an illustration of the superiority of dependant to republican government in securing order and tranquillity. Under the Romans the distribution of Palestine was into Galilæa Superior and Galilæa Inferior, Samaria, Judæa, subdivided into Judæa Propria and Pentapolis and Idumæa, and Peræa beyond the Hermon mons, belonging to Arabia, and comprising the districts of Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, Batanæa, Auranitis, Ituræa, Decapolis, Peræa Propria, Ammonitis and Moabitis. Under Constantine, as all his empire had been subjected to a novel division; so also was a new distribution effected in the counties of Palestine, viewed perhaps with some favour by that emperor; though many authors, and among them Malte-Brun, refer these divisions to a much earlier period. Palestine was then divided into Palæstina Prima, including Samaria, Judæa Propria, and the country of the Philistines; Secunda, comprising Galilæa, Gaulonitis, and Decapolis; and Tertia, comprehending the countries of Idumæa and Arabia Petræa. The most remarkable geographical features of Palestine are treated of under the particular divisions to which they belong; the mountains of Libanus upon the northern frontier, the Hermon upon the east, with the Dead Sea and its tributary the sacred Jordan, as they belong to different parts, and indeed, in some measure, to the whole, may be separately particularized. The interest that attaches to the name of the Promised Land, by which we recognise this country in the inspired writings as the country of the chosen people, of their glory, their sufferings, and their destruction, after having ceased in a great measure during the period of its bondage, revives when we contemplate it as the country of the Crusades, of the enlightened and generous empire of Saladin, of the daring exploits of Richard of England, and as the brilliant field of glory for the chivalry of France; but the empire of the Turks has again deprived it of all consideration, and the civilized world has ceased to regard the population of that country in connexion with its former inhabitants and its earlier fortunes.

Palætyrus, the ancient town of Tyre, on the continent. Strab. 16.

Palātinus mons, a celebrated hill, the largest of the seven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the first foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there also he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hostilius, and Augustus, and all the succeeding emperors; from which circumstance the word Palatium has ever since been applied to the residence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddess Pales, or from the word Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of sheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the palantes, wandering, because Evander, when he came to settle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one society. There were some games celebrated in honour of Augustus, and called Palatine, because kept on the hill. Dio. Cass. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.—Liv. 1, c. 7 and 33.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 822.—Juv. 9, v. 23.—Martial. 1, ep. 71.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 3.—Cic. in Catil. 1.

Palantium, a town of Arcadia.

Palibothra, a city of India, supposed now to be Patna, or according to others. Allahabad. Strab. 15.

Palicōrum, or Palicōrum Stagnum, a sulphureous pool in Sicily.

Paliurus, now Nahil, a river of Africa, with a town of the same name at its mouth, at the west of Egypt, on the Mediterranean. Strab. 17.

Pallantēum, a town of Italy, or perhaps more properly a citadel, built by Evander, on mount Palatine, from whence its name originates. Virgil says it was called after Pallas, the grandfather of Evander; but Dionysius derives its name from Palantium, a town of Arcadia. Dionys. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 54 and 341.

Pallantia, a town of Spain, now Palencia, on the river Cea. Mela, 2, c. 6.

Pallēne, a peninsula of Macedonia, between the Toronaic and the Thermaic gulfs. "It is said to have anciently borne the name of Phlegra, and to have witnessed the conflict between the gods and the earth-born Titans. This peninsula is connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus of little more than two miles in breadth, on which formerly stood the rich and flourishing city of Potidæa, founded by the Corinthians, though at what period is not apparent; it must, however, have existed some time before the Persian war, as we know from Herodotus that it sent troops to Platæa, having already surrendered to the Persians on their march into Greece." Cram.

Palmaria, a small island opposite Tarracina, in Latium. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Palmȳra, the capital of a district of country, called from this place the Palmyrene, in Syria, between Arabia Deserta, the Euphrates, and mount Libanus. "From Hamath, or rather from Famieh, an ancient Roman road leads to Palmyra, the Tadmor of Solomon, and the residence of the immortal Zenobia and the elegant Longinus. This ancient city is 180 miles to the south-east of Aleppo, and an equal distance from Damascus, in a small district surrounded with deserts. The eye of the traveller is all at once arrested by a vast assemblage of ruins; arches, vaults, temples, and porticos, appear on every hand: one colonnade, 4000 feet long, is terminated by a beautiful mausoleum. Time has partially preserved the peristyles, the intercolumnations, and tablatures; the elegance of the design equals throughout the richness of the materials. These magnificent ruins present a sad contrast with the hovels of wild Arabs, now the only inhabitants of a city which in former times emulated Rome. Every spot of ground intervening between the walls and columns is laid out in plantations of corn and olives, enclosed by mud walls. There are two rivers, the waters of which, when judiciously distributed, must have conduced greatly to the subsistence and comfort of the ancient inhabitants, but are now allowed to lose themselves in the sand." Malte-Brun.

Pamīsos, I. a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus. Herodot. 7, c. 129.—Plin. 4, c. 8. ——II. Another of Messenia in Peloponnesus.

Pamphȳlia, a province of Asia Minor, anciently called Mopsopia. It was bounded by Phrygia on the north, by a part of the same country and by Lycia on the west, by the sea upon the south, and by Cilicia on the east. The principal river of this district was the Cataractes, and in the northern parts the Taurus mountains separated from Pamphylia proper that part of Pisidia which was called Isauria. The parts on the sea-coast were bounded on the north by a district called Pisidia, which is sometimes considered a separate country. It abounded with pastures, vines, and olives, and was peopled by a Grecian colony. Strab. 14.—Mela, 1.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Plin. 5, c. 26.—Liv. 37, c. 23 and 40.

Panchæa, Panchēa, I. or Panchaia, an island of Arabia Felix, where Jupiter Triphylius had a magnificent temple.——II. A part of Arabia Felix, celebrated for the myrrh, frankincense, and perfumes which it produced. Virg. G. 2, v. 139, l. 4, v. 379.—Culex. 87.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 309.—Diod. 5.—Lucret. 2, v. 417.

Pandataria, an island on the coast of Lucania, now called Santa Maria.

Pandosia, I. a town of Laconia, on the right bank of the Aciris, near the ruins of Heraclea. "Plutarch, in his life of Pyrrhus, states that the first battle in which that monarch defeated the Romans was fought between Heraclea and Pandosia, and other writers affirm that the action took place near the former town. The bronze tables of Heraclea also distinctly mention Pandosia as being in its neighbourhood; a great question, however, has arisen among topographers relative to this place, which remains still undecided. Are we to identify this city with the well-known Pandosia, which Strabo and Livy allude to in speaking of Alexander, king of Epirus, who met his death in its vicinity? We apprehend we ought to decide in the negative. And this is likewise the opinion of Mazzocchi, Holstenius, and other modern antiquaries. Romanelli, however, endeavours to adapt all the citations of ancient writers to one and the same city, which he places at Anglona." Cram.——II. Another, in the country of the Brutii, near Cosentia, well known "in history as having witnessed the defeat and death of Alexander, king of Epirus. Cluverius discovered, with his usual penetration, that this Pandosia must have belonged to the Brutii; but he was not aware of the existence of the Lucanian town of the same name, as the Heraclæan Tables, which principally attest that fact, had not yet been discovered. The precise position, however, which ought to be assigned to the Brutian Pandosia, remains yet uncertain. The early Calabrian antiquaries placed it at Castel Franco, about five miles from Cosenza. D'Anville lays it down, in his map of ancient Italy, near Lao and Cirella, on the confines of Lucania. Cluverius supposes that it may have stood between Consentia and Thurii; but more modern critics have, with greater probability, sought its ruins in a more westerly direction, near the village of Mendocino, between Consentia and the sea, a hill with three summits having been remarked there, which answers to the fatal height pointed out by the oracle, together with the rivulet Maresanto, or Arconti." Cram.

Pangæus, a mountain of Thrace, anciently called Mons Caraminus, and joined to mount Rhodope near the sources of the river Nestus. It was inhabited by four different nations. It was on this mountain that Lycurgus, the Thracian king, was torn to pieces, and that Orpheus called the attention of the wild beasts, and of the mountains and woods, to listen to his song. It abounded in gold and silver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 16, &c. l. 7, c. 113.—Virg. G. 4, v. 462. —Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 739.—Thucyd. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 679, l. 7, v. 482.

Panionium, a place at the foot of mount Mycale, near the town of Ephesus in Asia Minor, sacred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the states of Ionia assembled, either to consult for their own safety and prosperity, or to celebrate festivals, or to offer a sacrifice for the good of all the nation; whence the name πανιώνιον, all Ionia. The deputies of the twelve Ionian cities which assembled there were those of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Ephesus, Lebedos, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Phorcæa, Teos, Chios, Samos, and Erythræ. If the bull offered in sacrifice bellowed, it was accounted an omen of the highest favour, as the sound was particularly acceptable to the god of the sea, as in some manner it resembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 148, &c.—Strab. 14. —Mela, 1, c. 17.

Panius, or Paneus, a mountain belonging to the ridge called Anti-Libanus. It gave rise to the head-springs of the Jordan (Vid. Jordanes), and on it between these fountains, stood the city of Paneas. "On the partition of the states of Herod among his children, Philip, who had the Trachonitis, gave to the city of Paneas the name of Cæsarea, to which was annexed by distinction the surname of Philippi. It did not, however, prevent the resumption of its primitive denomination, pronounced Banias, more purely than Belines, as it is written by the historians of the crusades." D'Anville.

Pannŏnia, a large country of Europe, bounded on the east by the country of the Jazyiges Metanastæ, on the north by the Upper Danube, on the west by Noricum, and by Illyricum on the south, corresponding in modern geography to Hungary west of the Danube, Slavonia, and Croatia. "In the war which Augustus, then called Octavius, waged with the Iapydes and the Dalmatians of Illyricum, the Roman arms had penetrated to the Pannonians. But it was reserved for Tiberius, who commanded in these countries, to reduce Pannonia into a province. It was divided in the time of the Antonines into Superior and Inferior; and the mouth of the river Arrabo, or Raab, in the Danube, formed the separation of it, according to Ptolemy. Afterwards we find employed the terms first and second, as in the other provinces of the empire; and in a later age a third, under the name of Valeria, between the former two. This second, occupying the banks of the Drave and Save, obtained the name of Savia, which now gives to a canton of this country the name of Po-Savia; expressing, in the Slavonic language, a situation adjacent to the Save. Among the several people which are named in the extent of Pannonia, the Scordisci and the Taurisci are particularly noted. Gauls by origin, and far removed from their ancient dwelling as the Boii, they were separated by Mons Claudius, which appears to extend between the Drave and the Save." D'Anville. In the latter days of the Empire, Pannonia became successively the possession of almost every barbarous nation that now tumultuously thronged within the limits of the Danube. The Goths and Vandals were in turn dislodged, and the Lombards, on their invasion of Italy under Alboin, left to an equally barbarous race, the Hungarians, this country, no longer the subject of imperial protection, or the object of imperial care; and no nation in Europe at the present day consists of a more heterogeneous population. "Different nations are united in Hungary round the ancient cross of St. Stephen; the Magiars came thither on their swift horses from the banks of the Wolga; the Slowak descended from the Carpathian mountains or Norican Alps; the Germans and Wallachian shepherds advanced along the Danube; all of European origin, although distinguished by their national and picturesque costumes; all Christians, although differing from each other in their rites and observances." Malte-Brun. The same author elsewhere remarks, "the Magiars or Hungarians form three fourths of the population in the Trans-Danubian circle, and the western frontiers are chiefly inhabited by Germans. The Vandals are most numerous in the counties of Szalad and Szumeg, some of them are scattered over different parts of Oedenburg and Eisenburg. Their name has excited attention from the fact that the ancient Vandals, who fled for refuge to Pannonia, continued during forty years citizens of Rome; they committed afterwards dreadful devastations, but according to the general opinion they were of Gothic origin. The Vandals of Hungary call themselves Slovenes, their dialect is almost the same as that of other Slavonic tribes, they appear to have been a colony of the Windes or Wendes in Styria, and differ at present from them only by their adherence to protestantism." The principal rivers of Pannonia, besides the Danube, were the Savus, the Dravus, and the Arrabona; while the Claudius mons and the mons Pannonius constituted another geographical feature. The chief towns were Carnuntum in the north, and Sirmium on the Savus in the south.

PANOPŌLIS, the city of Pan, a town of Egypt, called also Chemmis. Pan had there a temple, where he was worshipped with great solemnity, and represented in a statute, fascino longissimo et erecto. Diod. 5.—Strab. 17.

PANORMUS, I. now called Palermo, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians, on the north-west part of the island, with a good and capacious harbour. It was the strongest hold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and it was at last taken with difficulty by the Romans. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ital. 14, v. 262.——II. A town of the Thracian Chersonesus.——III. A town of Ionia, near Ephesus.——IV. Another in Crete.——V. In Macedonia.——VI. Achaia.——VII. Samos.

PANTAGYAS, a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which falls into the sea, after running a short space in rough cascades over rugged stones and precipices. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.—Ital. 14, v. 232.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 471.

PANTANUS LACUS, the lake of Lesina, is situated in Apulia, at the mouth of the Frento. Plin. 3, c. 12.

PANTHEON, a celebrated temple at Rome, built by Agrippa in the reign of Augustus, and dedicated to all the gods, whence the name πᾶς θεος. It was struck with lightning some time after, and partly destroyed. Adrian repaired it, and it still remains at Rome, converted into a Christian temple, the admiration of the curious. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Marcell. 16, c. 10. "The Pantheon is supposed by many antiquaries to be of republican architecture, and of course more ancient than the portico, which, as its inscription imports, was erected by Agrippa about thirty years before the Christian era. But whether the temple was built at the same time, or perhaps one hundred years before its portico, is a matter of little consequence, as it is on the whole the most ancient edifice that now remains in a state of full and almost perfect preservation. The square of the Pantheon, or Piazza della Rotonda, is adorned with a fountain and an obelisk, and terminated by the portico of Agrippa. This noble colonnade consists of a double range of Corinthian pillars of red granite. Between the middle columns, which are a little further removed from each other than the others, a passage opens to the brazen portals, which, as they unfold, expose to view a circular hall of immense extent, crowned with a lofty dome, and lighted solely from above. It is paved and lined with marble. Its cornice of white marble is supported by sixteen columns and as many pilasters of Giallo antico; in the circumference there are eight niches, and between these niches are eight altars adorned each with two pillars of less size but of the same materials. The niches were anciently occupied by statues of the great deities; the intermediate altars served as pedestals for the inferior powers. The proportions of this temple are admirable for the effect intended to be produced; its height being equal to its diameter, and its dome not an oval but an exact hemisphere. The Pantheon was converted into a church by Pope Boniface IV. about the year 609, and has since that period attracted the attention and enjoyed the patronage of various pontiffs." Eustace.

PANTICAPÆUM, now Kerché, a town of Taurica Chersonesus, built by the Milesians, and governed some time by its own laws, and afterwards subdued by the kings of Bosphorus. It was, according to Strabo, the capital of the European Bosphorus. Mithridates the great died there. Plin.—Strab.

PANTICAPES, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herodot. 4, c. 54.

PAPHLAGŌNIA, a country of Asia Minor. It was separated by the Parthenius from Bithynia on the west; the mountains of Galatia lay upon its south; on the south-east the river Halys forms its dividing line towards Pontus; and the waters of the Euxine washed it on the north and north-east, from the mouth of the Parthenius to that of the Halys. "Till the time of the Trojan war this country was occupied by the Heneti, who are pretended to have afterwards passed into Italy, in confounding their name with that of the Veneti. There is an ambiguity concerning the limits of Paphlagonia and Galatia. Gangra was the metropolis of the former province under the lower empire; yet the local position of this city, and the circumstance of its having been the residence of a Galatian prince, as king Dejotarus, seem to favour the claim of Galatia during the ages of antiquity." D'Anville.

PAPHOS, a famous city of the island of Cyprus, founded, as some suppose, about 1184 years before Christ, by Agapenor, at the head of a colony from Arcadia. The goddess of beauty was particularly worshipped there, and all male animals were offered on her altars, which, though 100 in number, daily smoked with the profusion of Arabian frankincense. The inhabitants were very effeminate and lascivious, and the young virgins were permitted by the laws of the place, to get a dowry by prostitution. Strab. 8, &c.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 8.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 419, &c. l. 10, v. 51, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 30, v. 1.—Tacit. A. 3, c. 62, H. 2, c. 2. "There were two cities of the name of Paphos: the more ancient, which had received Venus when issuing from the foam of the sea; and a new one which has prevailed, preserving its name under the form of Baſo, or Baſa." D'Anville.

PARADISUS, a town of Syria or Phœnicia. Plin. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 16.——In the plains of Jericho there was a large palace, with a garden beautifully planted with trees, and called Balsami Paradisus.

PARETACÆ, or TACENI, a people between Media and Persia, where Antigonus was defeated by Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum. 8.—Strab. 11 and 16.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

PARÆTONIUM, a town of Egypt, at the west of Alexandria, where Isis was worshipped. The word Parætonius is used to signify Egyptian, and is sometimes applied to Alexandria, which was situate in the neighbourhood. Strab. 17.—Flor. 4, c. 11.—Lucan. 3, v. 295, l. 10, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 712. A. 2, el. 13, v. 7.

PARISII, a people of Gaul. In the distribution of this country, according to the Commentaries, the Parisii belong to Celtica and Belgica, their possessions occupying either bank of the Seine. Their capital was Lutetia, called from them Parisiorum, the city of Paris. Vid. Lutetia. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 3.

PARSUS, a river of Pannonia, falling into the Danube. Strab.

PARIUM, now Camanar, a town of Asia Minor, on the Propontis, where Archilochus was born, as some say. Strab. 10.—Plin. 7, c. 2, l. 36, c. 5.

PARMA, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, belonging in the early ages to the Boii. It stood on the Via Æmylia, by a little river of the same name, and which, like itself, has retained its old appellation. This town was of great antiquity, being founded by the Gauls, or perhaps, even before their invasion, by the Tuscans. In the civil wars Parma espoused the cause of Antony, and suffered greatly on the final success of his worthless competitor. The poet Cassius and the critic Macrobius were born there. It was made a Roman colony A. U. C. 569. Cic. Philip. 14.—Liv. 39, c. 55.

PARNASSUS, a mountain of Phocis, anciently called Larnossos, from the boat of Deucalion (λαρναξ) which was carried there in the universal deluge. It received the name of Parnassus from Parnassus the son of Neptune, by Cleobula, and was sacred to the Muses, and to Apollo and Bacchus. The soil was barren, but the valleys and the green woods that cover its sides, rendered it agreeable, and fit for solitude and meditation. "Above Delphi rises this mountain, which extends from the country of the Locri Ozolæ to the extremity of Phocis, in a north-easterly direction, where it joins the chain of Œta. Towards the south-east it is connected with those of Helicon and the other Bœotian ridges. Parnassus is the highest mountain of central Greece, and retains its snows for the greater part of the year; hence the epithets so universally applied to it by the poets. The name of Parnassus does not occur in the Iliad, but it is frequently mentioned in the Odyssey, where Ulysses recounts his adventure in hunting a bore with Autolycus, and his sons. Its summit was especially sacred to Bacchus. Two lofty rocks rise perpendicularly from Delphi, and obtained for the mountain the epithet of διπόρφος, or the two-headed. The celebrated Castalian fount pours down the cleft or chasm between these two summits, being fed by the perpetual snows of Parnassus." Cram.

PARNES, (etis,) "now Nozea, the highest mountain of Attica, rises on the northern frontier of that province, being connected with Pentelicus to the south, and towards Bœotia with Cithæron. 'It is intermingled,' says Dodwell, 'with a multiplicity of glens, crags, and well wooded rocks and precipices, and richly diversified with scenery, which is at once grand and picturesque; its summit commands a view over a vast extent of country.' Pausanias says that on mount Parnes there was a statue of Jupiter Parnethius, and an altar of Jupiter Semaleus. It abounded with wild boars and bears." Cram.

PAROPAMISUS, a ridge of mountains at the north of India, called the Stony Girdle, or Indian Caucasus. Strab. 15. This extensive chain belonged, for a great part of its course, to Aria, which it separated from Bactriana, and, running east into Scythia, covered all the north of India, as far as the sources of the river from which that country takes its name. This will make it correspond to the Hindoo Coosh mountains of Afghanistan, on the northern borders of Cabul, from which the Himalah mountains diverge towards the south; the Indus making its ways through the defiles which separate these lofty chains.

PAROREIA, I. a town of Thrace, near mount Hæmus. Liv. 39, c. 27.——II. A town of Peloponnesus.——III. A district of Phrygia Magna. Strab. 12.

PAROS, a celebrated island among the Cyclades, about seven and a half miles distant from Naxos, and twenty-eight from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about thirty-six or thirty-seven miles in circumference, a measure which some of the moderns have extended to fifty and even eighty miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minoa, Hiria, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Cabarnis, and Hyleassa. It received the name of Paros, which it still bears, from Paros, a son of Jason, or, as some maintain, of Parrhasius. The island of Paros was rich and powerful, and well known for its famous marble, which was always used by the best statuaries. The best quarries were those of Marpesus, a mountain where still caverns, of the most extraordinary depth, are seen by modern travellers, and admired as the source from whence the labyrinth of Egypt and the porticos of Greece received their splendour. According to Pliny, the quarries were so uncommonly deep, that, in the clearest weather, the workmen were obliged to use lamps; from which circumstance the Greeks have called the marble Lychnites, worked by the light of lamps. Paros is also famous for the fine cattle which it produces, and for its partridges and wild pigeons. The capital city was called Paroa. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians, and afterwards a colony of Cretans settled in it. The Athenians made war against it, because it had assisted the Persians in the invasion of Greece, and took it, and it became a Roman province in the age of Pompey. Archilochus was born there. The Parian marbles, perhaps better known by the appellation of Arundelian, were engraved in this island in capital letters, B. C. 264, and, as a valuable chronicle, preserved the most celebrated epochas of Greece from the year 1582 B. C. These valuable pieces of antiquity were procured originally by M. de Peirisc, a Frenchman, and afterwards purchased by the earl of Arundel, by whom they were given to the university of Oxford, where they are still to be seen. Prideaux published an account of all the inscriptions in 1676. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—C. Nep. in Milt. & Alc.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 593. G. 3, v. 34.—*Ovid. Parrhasii. "The Parrhasii were an Arcadian people, apparently on the Laconian frontier; but the extent and position of their territory is not precisely determined. Thucydides says their district was under the subjection of Mantinea, and near Sciritis of Laconia. But Pausanias seems rather to assign to the Parrhasi a more western situation; for he names as their towns, Lycosura, Thocnia, Trapezus, Acacesium, Macaria, and Dasea, all which were to the west and north-west of Megalopolis." Cram.

Parthenius, I. a river of Paphlagonia, which, after separating Bithynia, falls into the Euxine Sea near Sesamum; it received its name either because the virgin Diana (παρθενος) bathed herself there, or perhaps it received it from the purity and mildness of its waters. Herodot. 2, c. 104.—Plin. 6, c. 2.——II. A mountain which formed the boundary between the territories of Argolis and Arcadia. Upon this mountain it was that Philippides, the Athenian courier, was said to have been met by the god Pan, while on his way to solicit the aid of Sparta against the Persians.——III. A river of European Sarmatia. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 49.

Parthia, a country of Asia, bounded on the east by Margiana, on the north by the country of the Derbicæ, west by Hyrcania, and south by Aria. This was the proper country of the Parthi, while subjects of the Persian kings; nor was it till about the year of Rome 504 that they established an independent empire, destined to make head against the Romans themselves, oppressors of the world. Under Arsaces this new state commenced, that leader rejecting the claim of the Syrian king, and establishing the independence of this, then inconsiderable province. The ninth in succession from Arsaces engaged in war with the Romans, and had the honour of capturing the Roman standards, which the ambition of Rome and of Crassus had carried in the hope of planting them among these independent tribes. Nor did the usurping empire of Europe ever succeed in reducing this people, whose government existed from the period mentioned above, till the year of our era 224, when it was destroyed by the Persians, and Parthia became again a province of the Persian monarchy. In the greatest stretch of their empire, the Parthi possessed an extensive territory, to which they never imparted their name; and the greatest surface of country which bore the appellation of Parthia, may perhaps be described within the following boundaries: Aria on the east, Hyrcania on the north, the country of the Median Parætaceni on the west, and the Carmanian deserts on the south. Some suppose that the present capital of the country is built on the ruins of Hecatompylos. According to some authors, the Parthians were Scythians by origin, who made an invasion on the more southern provinces of Asia, and at last fixed their residence near Hyrcania. The Parthians were naturally strong and warlike, and were esteemed the most expert horsemen and archers in the world. The peculiar custom of discharging their arrows while they were retiring full speed, has been greatly celebrated by the ancients, particularly by the poets, who all observe that their flight was more formidable than their attacks. This manner of fighting, and the wonderful address and dexterity with which it was performed, gained them many victories. The following extract from Malte-Brun contains the opinion of that learned writer in regard to the origin of the Parthi. "The Parthians, who, two centuries after the death of Alexander, re-established in great glory the independence of Persia, were Scythians or Sacæ, according to some authors of middling authority. Herodotus and other writers of greater weight, mention them simply as inhabitants of a province of eastern Persia. Nothing in their habits nor in the names of their kings gives any indication of a Scythian origin. In short, we may consider it as clear, that up to the great revolution effected by the Arabians, and the Mahometan religion, Iran, or Persia, has, in general, been peopled by the same indigenous race, divided into different nations, and speaking the same language, though with differences of dialect." Strab. 2, c. 6, &c.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—*Virg. PARTHYÆNE, a province of Parthia, according to Ptolemy, though some authors support that it is the name of Parthia itself.

PARGADRES, now Ildiz Dagi, a part of the mountain range that separates the territories of Pontus and Cappadocia.

PASARGADA, a town of Persia, near Carmania, founded by Cyrus on the very spot where he had conquered Astyages. The kings of Persia were always crowned there, and the Pasargadæ were the noblest families of Persia, in the number of which were the Achæmenides. "Cyrus had there his tomb; and a city which preserves the name of Pasa, or Fasa, with the surname of Kuri, according to the Persians, shows us the position of Pasargades, or Pasagardes; for the name is also thus written: and the modern termination of Gherd, to the names of many places in Persia, may authorize this diversity." D'Anville.—Strab. 15.—Plin. 8, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 125.—Mela, 3, c. 8.

PASSARON, a town of Epirus, where, after sacrificing to Jupiter, the kings swore to govern according to law, and the people to obey and to defend the country. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Liv. 45, c. 26 and 33.

PATALA, a harbour at the mouth of the Indus, in an island called Patale. The river here begins to form a Delta like the Nile. Pliny places this island within the torrid zone. Plin. 2, c. 73.—Curt. 9, c. 7.—Strab. 15.—Arrian. 6, c. 17.

PATARA, (orum,) now Patera, a town of Lycia, situate on the eastern side of the mouth of the river Xanthus, with a capacious harbour, a temple, and an oracle of Apollo, surnamed Patareus, where was preserved and shown in the age of Pausanias, a brazen cap which had been made by the hands of Vulcan, and presented by the god to Telephus. The god was supposed by some to reside for the six winter months at Patara, and the rest of the year at Delphi. The city was greatly embellished by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who attempted in vain to change its original name into that of his wife Arsinoe. Liv. 37, c. 15.—Strab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 41.—Horat. 3, od. 14, v. 64.—*Ovid. PATAVIUM, a city of Italy, at the north of the Po, on the shores of the Adriatic, now called Padua, and once said to be capable of sending 20,000 men into the field. Vid. Padua. It is the birth-place of Livy, from which reason some writers have denominated Patavinity those peculiar expressions and provincial dialect, which they seem to discover in the historian's style, not strictly agreeable to the purity and refined language of the Roman authors who flourished in or near the Augustan age. Martial. 11, ep. 17, v. 8.—Quintil. 1, c. 5, 56, l. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 10, c. 2, l. 41, c. 27.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

PATMOS, an island in the Icarian Sea, south of Samos and Icaria, with a small town of the same name, situate at the south of Icaria, and measuring 30 miles in circumference according to Pliny, or only 18 according to modern travellers. It has a large harbour, near which are some broken columns, the most ancient in that part of Greece. The Romans generally banished their culprits there, and here St. John, an exile, delivered the sublime inspirations of the Apocalypse. It is now called Palmosa. Strab.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

PATRÆ, a town of Achaia, on that part of the Sinus Corinthiacus which lay between Achaia and Ætolia, outside of the promontories Rhium and Antirrhium. This town, "which still retains its ancient appellation, is said to have been built on the site of three towns, called Aroe, Anthea, and Messatis, which had been founded by the Ionians when they were in possession of the country. On their expulsion by the Achæans, the small towns above mentioned fell into the hands of Patreus, an illustrious chief of that people; who, uniting them into one city, called it by his name. Patræ is enumerated by Herodotus among the twelve towns of Achaia. This was one of the first towns which renewed the federal system after the interval occasioned by the Macedonian domination throughout Greece. Its maritime situation, opposite to the coast of Ætolia and Acarnania, rendered it a very advantageous port for communicating with these countries; and in the Social War Philip of Macedon frequently landed his troops there in his expeditions into Peloponnesus. The Patræans sustained such severe losses in the different engagements fought against the Romans during the Achæan war, that the few men who remained in the city determined to abandon it, and to reside in the surrounding villages and boroughs. Patræ was however raised to its former flourishing condition after the battle of Actium by Augustus, who, in addition to its dispersed inhabitants, sent thither a large body of colonists chosen from his veteran soldiers, and granted to the city, thus restored under his auspices, all the privileges usually conceded by the Romans to their colonies. Strabo affirms, that in his day it was a large and populous town, with a good harbour. Chandler describes Patras 'as a considerable town at a distance from the sea, situated on the side of a hill, which has its summit crowned with a ruinous castle; a dry flat before it was once the port, which has been choked with mud. It has now, as in the time of Strabo, only an indifferent road for vessels.' According to Sir W. Gell, 'the remains of antiquity are few and insignificant, part of a Doric frieze, and a few small capitals of the Ionic and Corinthian orders are found in the streets.' At the church of St. Andrea is the well mentioned by Pausanias as the oracular fountain of Ceres." Cram.

PATROCLI, a small island on the coast of Attica. Paus. 4, c. 5.

PAXOS, a small island in the Ionian Sea. The modern name of this island is Paxo, and another in its immediate vicinity is called Antipaxo. They lie south-east of Corcyra.

PEDUM, a town of Latium, about ten miles from Rome, conquered by Camillus. The inhabitants were called Pedani. Liv. 2, c. 39, l. 8, c. 13 and 14.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, v. 2.

PEGÆ, I. a fountain at the foot of mount Arganthus in Bithynia, into which Hylas fell. Propert. 1, el. 20, v. 33.——II. A place belonging to Megaris, on that part of the Crissæan gulf which was called the Halcyonian Sea. "It was occupied by the Athenians before the Peloponnesian war, and used by them as a naval station, but was afterwards restored to the Megareans. Pausanias notices in this place the monument of Ægialeus, son of Adrastus, and a statue of Diana Sospita. The modern site of Psato, not far from Livadostro, in a gulf formed by a projection of Cithæron, is generally supposed to answer to the ancient Pagæ." Cram.

Pegăsium Stagnum, a lake near Ephesus, which arose from the earth when Pegasus struck it with his foot.

Pelagonia, one of the divisions of Macedonia at the north. "The Pelagones, though not mentioned by Homer as a distinct people, were probably known to him, from his naming Pelegon, the father of Asteropæus, a Pæonian warrior. They must at one period have been widely spread over the north of Greece, since a district of upper Thessaly bore the name of Pelagonia Tripolitis, and it is ingeniously conjectured by Gatterer, in his learned commentary on ancient Thrace, that these were a remnant of the remote expedition of the Teucri and Mysi, the progenitors of the Pæonians, who came from Asia Minor, and conquered the whole of the country between the Strymon and Peneus. Frequent allusion is made of Pelagonia by Livy in his account of the wars between the Romans and the kings of Macedon. It was exposed to invasions from the Dardani, who bordered on its northern frontiers; for which reason the communication between the two countries was carefully guarded by the Macedonian monarchs. This pass led over the chain of mount Scardus. A curious account of the modern route is given in Dr. Browne's Travels: 'From Kuprulih in Servia we came by Ishar to Pyrlipe, first passing the high mountains of Pyrlipe, in Macedonia, which shine like silver as those of Cissura, and beside Moscovia glass, may contain good minerals in their bowels; the rocks of this mountain are the most craggy that I have seen, and massy stones lie upon stones without any earth about them; and upon a ridge of mountains, many steeples high, stands the strong castle of Marco Callowitz, a man formerly famous in these parts.' From thence the traveller journeyed through a plain country to Monastir or Tôli, a well-peopled and pleasantly situated town, which, I conceive, represents the ancient city of Pelagonia, the capital of the fourth division of Roman Macedonia. Although it must from this circumstance have been a considerable place, little else is known beyond the fact of its existence at a late period, as we find it noticed in the Synecdemus of Hierocles and the Byzantine historian Malchus, who speaks of the strength of its citadel." Cram.

Pelasgi, a people of Greece, supposed to be one of the most ancient in the world. Vid. Græcia.

Pelasgia, or Pelasgiotis, a country of Greece, whose inhabitants are called Pelasgi, or Pelasgiotæ. The name should be more particularly confined to a part of Thessaly, on the south bank of the Peneus and the coast of the Ægean Sea. The maritime borders of this part of Thessaly were afterwards called Magnesia, though the sea, or its shore, still retained the name of Pelasgicus Sinus, now the gulf of Volo. Pelasgia is also one of the ancient names of Epirus, as also of Peloponnesus. Vid. Græcia.

Pelasgicum, the most ancient part of the fortifications of the Athenian acropolis. Vid. Athenæ.

Pelēthrŏnii, an epithet given to the Lapithæ, because they inhabited the town of Pelethronium, at the foot of mount Pelion in Thessaly; or because one of their number bore the name of Pelethronius. It is to them that mankind is indebted for the invention of the bit with which they tamed their horses with so much dexterity. Virg. G. 3, v. 115.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 452.—Lucan. 6, v. 387.

Pĕligni, a people of Italy, who dwelt near the Sabines and Marsi, and had Corfinium and Sulmo for their chief towns. The most expert magicians were among the Peligni, according to Horace. Liv. 8, c. 6 and 29, l. 9, c. 41.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 8, v. 42.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 3, od. 19, v. 8.

Pelion, and Pelios, a mountain of Thessalia, "whose principal summit rises behind Iolcos and Ormenium, and which forms a chain of some extent, from the south-eastern extremity of the lake Bœbeis, where it unites with one of the ramifications of Ossa, to the extreme promontory of Magnesia. Homer alludes to this mountain as the ancient abode of the Centaurs, who were ejected by the Lapithæ. It was, however, more especially the haunt of Chiron, whose cave, as Dicæarchus relates, occupied the highest point of the mountain. In a fragment of Dicæarchus, which has been preserved to us, we have a detailed description of Pelion, and its botanical productions, which appear to have been very numerous, both as to the forest trees and plants of various kinds. According to the same writer, it gave rise to two rivulets named Crausindon and Brychon; the source of the former was towards its base, while the latter, after passing what he terms the Pelian wood, discharged its waters into the sea. On the most elevated part of the mountain was a temple dedicated to Jupiter Actæus; to which a troop of the noblest youths of the city of Demetrias ascended every year by appointment of the priest; and such was the cold experienced on the summit, that they wore the thickest woollen fleeces to protect themselves from the inclemency of the weather. It is with propriety therefore that Pindar applies to Pelicon the epithet of stormy." Cram.

Pella, a celebrated town of Macedonia, on the Ludias, not far from the Sinus Thermaicus, which became the capital of the country after the ruin of Edessa. Philip, king of Macedonia, was educated there, and Alexander the Great was born there, whence he is often called Pellæus Juvenis. The tomb of the poet Euripides was in the neighbourhood. The epithet Pellæus is often applied to Egypt or Alexandria, because the Ptolemies, kings of the country, were of Macedonian origin. Martial. 13, ep. 85.—Lucan. 5, v. 60, l. 8, v. 475 and 607, l. 9, v. 1016 and 1073, l. 10, v. 55.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 41.

Pellene, I. a town of Achaia, in the Peloponnesus, at the west of Sicyon. It was built by the giant Pallas, or, according to others, by Pellen of Argos, son of Phorbas, and was the country of Proteus the sea-god. Strab. 8.—Paus. 7, c. 26.—Liv. 33, c. 14. "Pellene was situated on a lofty and precipitous hill about sixty stadia from the sea. From the nature of its situation the town was divided into two distinct parts. Its name was derived either from the Titan Pallas, or Pellen, an Argive, who was son of Phorbas. It was celebrated for its manufacture of woollen cloaks, which were given as prizes to the riders at the gymnastic games held there in honour of Mercury." Cram.——II. Another in Laconia, between the Eurotas and the borders of Messenia, north-west of Sparta. It was the residence of "Tyndareus during his exile from Sparta. Polybius states that Pellene was in the district called Tripolis, which Livy places on the confines of Megalopolis. Pellene contained a temple of Æsculapius, and two fountains named Pellanis and Lancea. The ruins of this town probably correspond with those observed by Sir W. Gell, north of Peribolia, and near a beautiful source called Cephalobrisso, with the foundations of a temple, and fragments of white marble; further on, another fount and walls, and a gate in the walls which run up to a citadel rising in terraces." Cram.

PELOPONNĒSUS, a celebrated peninsula, which comprehends the most southern parts of Greece. It received its name from Pelops, who settled there, as the name indicates (πέλοπος νησος, the island of Pelops). It had been called before Argia, Pelasgia, and Argolis, and in its form, it has been observed by the moderns highly to resemble the leaf of the plane tree. Its present name is Morea, which seems to be derived either from the Greek word μορεα, or the Latin morus, which signifies a mulberry-tree, which is found there in great abundance. "It was bounded on the north by the Ionian Sea, on the west by that of Sicily, to the south and south-east by that of Libya and Crete, and to the north-east by the Myrtoan and the Ægæan. These several seas form in succession five extensive gulfs along its shores; the Corinthiacus Sinus, which separates the northern coast from Ætolia, Locris, and Phocis; the Messeniacus, now Gulf of Coron, on the coast of Messenia; the Laconicus, Gulf of Colokythia, on that of Laconia; the Argolicus, Gulf of Napoli; and lastly, the Saronicus, a name derived from Saron, which in ancient Greek signified an oak leaf, now called Gulf of Engia. 'The narrow stem from which it expands,' says Pliny, 'is called the isthmus. At this point the Ægæan and Ionian seas, breaking in from opposite quarters, north and east, eat away all its breadth, till a narrow neck of five miles in breadth is all that connects Peloponnesus with Greece. On one side is the Corinthian, on the other the Saronic gulf. Lechæum and Cenchreæ are situated on opposite extremities of the isthmus, a long and hazardous circumnavigation for ships, the size of which prevents their being carried over-land in wagons. For this reason various attempts have been made to cut a canal across the isthmus by king Demetrius, Julius Cæsar, Caligula, and Nero, but in every instance without success.' The principal mountains of Peloponnesus are those of Cyllene, Zyria, and Erymanthus, Olenos, in Arcadia, and Taygetus, St. Elias, in Laconia. Its rivers are the Alpheus, now Rouphia, which rises in the south of Arcadia, and after traversing that province from south-east to north-west, enters ancient Elis, and discharges itself into the Sicilian Sea; the Eurotas, now called Ere, which takes its course in the mountains that separate Arcadia from Laconia, and, confining its course within the latter province, falls into the Laconicus Sinus: and the Pamisus, Pirnatza, a river of Messenia, which rises on the confines of Arcadia, and flows into the gulf of Coron, the ancient Messeniacus Sinus. The Peloponnesus contains but one small lake, which is that of Stymphalus, Zaracca, in Arcadia. According to the best modern maps, the area of the whole peninsula may be estimated at 7800 square mile; and, in the more flourishing period of Grecian history, an approximate computation of the population of its different states furnishes upwards of a million as the aggregate number of its inhabitants. Peloponnesus was inhabited in the time of Herodotus by seven distinct people, all of whom he regards of different origin. These were the Arcadians, Cynurians, Achæans, Dorians, Ætolians, Dryopes, and Lemnians. The two first only are considered by him as indigenous, the others being known to have migrated from other countries. The Arcadians are universally acknowledged by ancient writers to have been the oldest nation of the Peloponnese, a fact which is confirmed by the testimony of Herodotus; but allowing their priority of existence in the peninsula, we have yet to discover the primeval stock from whence they sprang, since they must have migrated thither from some other country. Vid. Græcia. From the mountainous and secluded nature of their country, they appear to have preserved to the latest period their race unmixed with the surrounding nations. The Cynurians occupied a small tract of country on the borders of Argolis and Laconia, and became, from their situation, a constant object of contention to these two states. Herodotus observes, that this really indigenous people was for some time supposed to be of Ionian origin, though, from their long subjection to Argos, they were afterwards considered as Dorians. The Achæans never quitted the Peloponnese, but often changed their abode, till they finally settled in the province which from them took the name of Achaia. Under the Dorians, who came, as we have already ascertained, from Doris, near Parnassus, with the Heraclidæ, must be ranged the Corinthians, Argives, Laconians and Messenians, which include the most powerful and celebrated states of the peninsula. The Ætolians occupied Elis, after having expelled the Epeans, the original inhabitants of the country. The Dryopes, who were anciently settled in northern Greece, formed at an uncertain period some few settlements on the coast of Argolis and Laconia. The Lemnians are stated by Herodotus to have occupied the Parorea, better known in Grecian history by the name of Triphylia. These were the Minyæ, who had been expelled from Lemnos by the Tyrrheni Pelasgi, and part of whom colonized the island of Thera. To this list of Peloponnesian nations we must add the Caucones, who were looked upon by many as of Pelasgic origin. Nor is it improbable that we should assign to the Leleges a place among these primitive tribes of the Peloponnesus, since the Lacedæmonians, according to Pausanias, regarded them as the first possessors of Laconia. Thus it appears that the Peloponnesus, like the rest of Greece, was originally inhabited by various barbarous tribes, under the names of Caucones, Leleges, and Pelasgi, who became gradually blended with the foreign population introduced by successive migrations from the time of Pelops to the invasion of the Dorians and Heraclidæ. From this period these may be said to have totally disappeared, with the exception of the Arcadians, who alone could fairly boast of being the autochthones of the peninsula. In the time of Thucydides the Peloponnesus appears to have been divided into five portions, for, speaking of the Lacedæmonians, the historian observes, of the five parts of the Peloponnesus they occupy two, and are also at the head of its whole confederacy. But this division would compel us, as Pausanias justly remarks, to consider Elis as part of Arcadia, or Achaia; whereas, both historically and geographically, it is entitled to a separate place in the description of Greece." Cram.

Pelopēa Mœnia, is applied to the cities of Greece, but more particularly to Mycenæ and Argos, where the descendants of Pelops reigned. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 193.

Pelōrum, (v. is-dis, v. ias-iados,) now Cape Faro, one of the three great promontories of Sicily, on whose top was erected a tower to direct the sailor on his voyage. It lies near the coast of Italy, and received its name from Pelorus, the pilot of the ship which carried away Annibal from Italy. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the straits of Charybdis, and as he was ignorant of the coast, he asked the pilot of the ship the name of the promontory which appeared at a distance. The pilot told him it was one of the capes of Sicily, but Annibal gave no credit to his information, and murdered him on the spot, on the apprehension that he would betray him into the hands of the Romans. He was, however, soon convinced of his error, and found that the pilot had spoken with great fidelity; and, therefore, to pay honour to his memory, and to atone for his cruelty, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and ordered that the promontory should bear his name, and from that time it was called Pelorum. Some suppose that this account is false, and they observe that it bore that name before the age of Annibal. Val. Max. 9, c. 8. —Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 411 and 687.—*Ovid. Peltæ, a town of Phrygia, south-east of Cotyæium. According to D'Anville, "Peltæ and an adjacent plain may be the same with what is now called Uschak."

Pēlūsium, now Tineh, a town of Egypt, situate at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile, called from it Pelusian. It is about 20 stadia from the sea, and it has received the name of Pelusium from the lakes and marshes (πηλος) which are in its neighbourhood. It was the key of Egypt on the side of Phœnicia, as it was impossible to enter the Egyptian territories without passing by Pelusium, and on that account it was always well fortified and garrisoned. It produced lentils, and was celebrated for the linen stuffs made there. It is now in ruins. Pelusium was said "by Ammianus to be the work of Peleus, father of Achilles, commanded by the gods to purge himself in the lake adjoining for the murder of his brother Phocus. Accounted the chief door of Egypt towards the land, as Pharos was to those that came by sea; the metropolis of the province of Augustamnica, the birth-place of Ptolemy the geographer, and the episcopal see of St. Isidore, surnamed Pelusiotes. Out of the ruins hereof, (if not the same under another title,) rose Damiata, memorable for the often sieges laid to it by the Christian armies." *Heyl. Pēnēus, I. a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Pindus, and falling into the Thermean gulf, after a wandering course between mount Ossa and Olympus, through the plains of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. The Peneus anciently inundated the plains of Thessaly, till an earthquake separated the mountains Ossa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe, where the waters formerly stagnated. From this circumstance, therefore, it obtained the name of Araxes, ab αρασσω scindo. Daphne, the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologists, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition arises from the quantity of laurels which grow near the Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Virg. G. 4, v. 317.—Diod. 4.——II. Also a small river of Elis in Peloponnesus, better known under the name of Araxes. It is now Igliaco, and is, according to modern travellers, a broad and rapid stream. Cram.—Paus. 6, c. 24.—Strab. 8 and 11.

Pentapŏlis, I. a town of India.——II. A part of Africa near Cyrene. It received this name on account of the five cities which it contained; Cyrene, Arsinoe, Berenice, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia. Plin. 5, c. 5.——III. Also part of Palestine, containing the five cities of Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron.

Pentelĭcus, a mountain of Attica. "Mount Pentelicus, celebrated in antiquity for the beautiful marble which its quarries yielded, still retains its name. It surpasses in elevation the chain of Hymettus, with which it is connected. Pausanias reports that a statue of Minerva was placed on its summit. 'Pentelikon,' says Dodwell, 'is separated from the northern foot of Hymettus, which in the narrowest part is about three miles broad. It shoots up into a pointed summit; but the outline is beautifully varied, and the greater part is either mantled with woods or variegated with shrubs. Several villages, and some monasteries and churches, are seen near its base.' The same traveller gives a very interesting account of the Pentelic quarries, which he visited and examined with attention. According to Sir W. Gell, the great quarry is 41 minutes distant from the monastery of Penteli, and affords a most extensive prospect from Cithæron to Sunium." Cram.

Pepărēthos, a small island of the Ægean

Sea, on the coast of Macedonia, about 20 miles in circumference. It abounded in olives, and its wines have always been reckoned excellent. They were not, however palatable before they were seven years old. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 470.—Liv. 28, c. 5, l. 31, c. 28.

Perea, I. a part of Caria, opposite to Rhodes, Liv. 32, c. 33.——II. "That part of Palestine which lies between the river Jordan and the mountains of Arnon, east and west; and reacheth from Pella in the north, to Petra, the chief town of Arabia Petræa, in the south. By Pliny it is made to bend more towards Egypt Petræa, (says he,) is the furthest part of Judea, neighbouring Arabia and Egypt, interspersed with rough and craggy mountains, and parted from the rest of the Jews by the river Jordan. So called from the Greek word πέραν, in regard to the situation of it on the other side of that river; and not improperly might be rendered by Trans-Jordana. Blessed with a rich soil, and large fields beset with divers trees, especially of olives, vines, and palms. The habitation in times past of the Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, as also of the two tribes of Gad and Reuben." Heyl. Cosm.

Percope. Vid. Percote.

Percote, a town on the Hellespont, between Abydos and Lampsacus, near the sea-shore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themistocles, to maintain his wardrobe. It is sometimes called Percope. Herodot. 1, c. 117.—Hom.

Perga, a town of Pamphylia. Vid. Perge. Liv. 38, c. 57.

Pergamus, Pergama, (Plur.) the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often used for Troy. It was situated in the most elevated part of the town, on the shores of the river Scamander. Xerxes mounted to the top of this citadel when he reviewed his troops as he marched to invade Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 466, &c.

Pergamus, now Bergamo, a town of Mysia, on the banks of the Caycus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philæterus. a eunuch, whom Lysimachus, after the battle of Ipsus, had intrusted with the treasures which he had obtained in the war. Philæterus made himself master of the treasures, and of Pergamus in which they were deposited, B. C. 283, and laid the foundations of an empire, over which he himself presided for 20 years. His successors began to reign in the following order: his nephew Eumenes ascended the throne 263 B. C.; Attalus, 241; Eumenes the second, 197; Attalus Philadelphus, 159; Attalus Philomator, 138, who, B. C. 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom, as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was disputed by an usurper, who claimed the empire as his own, and Aquilius, the Roman general, was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their submission by poisoning the waters which were conveyed to their houses, till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependant province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200,000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permission of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library, till it was most fatally destroyed by the Saracens, A. D. 642. Parchment was first invented and made use of at Pergamus, to transcribe books, as Ptolemy king of Egypt had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumstance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the physician, and Apollodorus the mythologist, were born there. Æsculapius was the chief deity of the country. Plin. 5 and 15.—Isid. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 29, c. 11, l. 31, c. 46.—Plin. 10, c. 21, l. 13, c. 11.

Perrhæbia, a part of Thessaly situate on the borders of the Peneus, extending between the town of Atrax and the vale of Tempe. The inhabitants were driven from their possessions by the Lapithæ, and retired into Ætolia, where part of the country received the name of *Perrhæbia. Persæ, the inhabitants of Persia. Vid. Persia.

Persĕpŏlis, a celebrated city, the capital of the Persian empire. It was laid in ruins by Alexander after the conquest of Darius. The reason of this is unknown. Diodorus says that the sight of about 800 Greeks, whom the Persians had shamefully mutilated, so irritated Alexander, that he resolved to punish the barbarity of the inhabitants of Persepolis, and of the neighbouring country, by permitting his soldiers to plunder their capital. Others suppose that Alexander set it on fire at the instigation of Thais, one of his courtezans, when he had passed the day in drinking, and in riot and debauchery. The ruins of Persepolis, now Estaker, or Tchel-Minar, still astonish the modern traveller by their grandeur and magnificence. "Thirty miles north-west of Shiraz and about ten to the east of the town of Mayn, are the famous ruins of Istakhar, or Persepolis, the ancient capital of Persia, in which Alexander triumphed, and in a moment of mad festivity gave way to the suggestions of a spirit of wanton destruction of which he almost instantly repented. This city was destroyed ultimately by the fanatic Arabs, as is shown in a memoir by M. Langles, contained in his Collection of Travels. We have no satisfactory means of ascertaining the period at which Persepolis was founded. The best are perhaps those suggested by the appearance of the most conspicuous remains found on the spot. Accordingly, Sir Robert Ker Porter, in applying to this subject the exertions of an inquiring mind, aided by extensive erudition and correct taste, observed that the most remarkable objects contained in it, viz. the Shehel-minar, of 'Forty Columns,' produced in him the impression, that both as a whole, and in their details, they bore a strong resemblance to the architectural taste of Egypt; a resemblance sufficiently accounted for by the early hostile intercourse between the two countries and their interchanges of inhabitants by captivity. About forty years before the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, Nebuchadnezzar overran the whole of Egypt, and returned with the rich spoils of the country and a multitude of captives. Cambyses, king of Persia, the friend and kinsman of the conqueror, was likely to share in the ingenuity and talents of the ingenious among the captives of the former; and when Cyrus afterwards added Babylon to his empire, he would then transfer them to his own country, and employ them in the superb edifices of Persepolis. Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, in his expeditions against Amasis and Psammeticus, kings of Egypt, carried off the richest ornaments of its edifices to decorate his palaces of Susa and Persepolis, and took along with him Egyptian workmen to place them properly in their new stations. Other princes followed the example, and Persepolis became the most splendid city in the east. The remains of the Shehel-minar continue to bear testimony to this fact. To describe them fully in this place would far exceed our bounds, and we must refer the reader to the account given by the traveller now mentioned, which, in graphic description, ingenious research, and irresistible interest, is not exceeded by any writing in existence. From his ample details we can only select a few lines as a specimen. The royal palace of forty pillars, or Shehel-minar, consists of a number of buildings, forming both a palace of ample magnitude, and a citadel, or bulwark for the capital, on a situation of a most commanding character. This situation consists of an artificial plain or platform, cut out of a mountain, and having a higher part of the same mountain connected with its eastern side, being on the other three sides at a great elevation in a perpendicular precipice from the plain beneath. On the royal mountain to the east are the ancient sepulchres of the kings, consisting of artificial excavations. The extent, of the faces of the square are 1425 feet in length on the west side, 802 on the south, and 926 on the north; part of the steep is faced up with gigantic square blocks of dark gray marble, without mortar, but fitted with such precision as to appear part of the solid mountain. The general height seems to have been about fifty feet, though now much lowered by the accumulation of ruins beneath. The only road to the summit is by an ascent of steps on the western side, forming a double flight. The steps are broad and shallow, and ten or fourteen of them are cut out of one block of marble. The ascent is so beautiful and easy, that they may be ascended and descended on horseback with the utmost facility. On ascending the platform, the first objects that meet the eye are the remains of two colossal bulls, of a noble form and attitude, indicated that they were intended as symbolical representations of power. These are sculptured on the lofty sides of the enormous portal. Other symbolical representations in basso-relievo are found in different places of huge size, and rather strange mixtures of the forms of different animals. From the great platform, different others rise, distinguished by ruins, differing somewhat in their character and the apparent destination of the buildings. On one of these are the striking ruins of the magnificent palace of Forty Pillars. Only a few of the pillars are standing entire, at different places, but the bases and other remains of the rest still exhibit something of the original arrangement. The former capitals and decorations of those which stand, and of many of the fragments, lying on the surface of the heap of rubbish, are beautiful and elegant, the taste different from the Grecian, yet correct and commanding in the highest degree, and executed with a delicacy which cannot be excelled; 'I gazed at them,' says this traveller, 'with wonder and delight. Besides the admiration which the general elegance of their form, and the exquisite workmanship of their parts excited, I never was made so sensible of the impression of perfect symmetry, comprising also in itself that of perfect beauty.'" Malte-Brun.—Curt. 5, c. 7.—Diod. 17, &c.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 14.

Persia, a celebrated kingdom of Asia, which in its ancient state extended from the Hellespont to the Indus, above 2800 miles, and from Pontus to the shores of Arabia, above 2000 miles. As a province, Persia was but small, and, according to the description of Ptolemy, it was bounded on the north by Media, west by Susiana, south by the Persian gulf, and east by Carmania. "The whole of Persia is a highly elevated country, as is proved by the great abundance of snow. This plateau joins that of Armenia and Asia Minor on the west, and becomes confounded with that of central Asia on the east. This is the chain of high lands which the ancients called Taurus, a general term which they applied to any thing gigantic. Taurus divided Asia into two, or rather, according to Strabo, into three parts. The first lies on the north of the mountains. The second is on the top of the Taurus, lying between the different chains of mountains of which it consists, and the third is that which is situated to the south. This mode of division is founded on an accurate observation of the leading differences of climate and of produce. But the ancients knew that the numerous chains of mountains comprehended under the general name of Taurus were 'divided by many valleys and elevated plains.' Strab. They also knew that several of the mountains of Persia, after rising abruptly from the middle of the plain, gradually became flat at the summit, and presented an absolute plain. These observations are confirmed by modern travellers. The mountains of Persia, according to M. Olivier, do not seem to form any continued chain, nor to have any leading direction. But the plateau itself on which this heap of mountains is reared, must have two declivities, one towards the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, and the other towards the Caspian Sea. It is on the south side of the basin of the river Kur that we must look for the northern continuation of mount Taurus. The Ararat, and the chain to which it belongs, join the high mountains which separate the lake Van from the lake Oormia. These last are a part of the Niphates of the ancients. But to the south of the river Araxes there is a chain of very cold mountains, the south side of which embraces Adjerbidjan, the ancient Atropatene. These mountains defied the arms of Alexander the Great; from their sides the Alpons go off towards the east, a belt of high limestone mountains which runs parallel to the southern shore of the Caspian Sea. In the ancient Hyrcania, the sides of these mountains are described as not only steep towards the sea, but projecting 'in such a manner, that the rivers throw themselves into the sea, forming a liquid arch, under which men could pass on dry ground.' Strab. The political revolutions to which this country has constantly been a prey, have most frequently ended in a union of it under one sceptre. In the earliest dawn of history, we find it possessed by several independent nations; the Persians in the south, the Arians in the east, and the Medes in the centre; different barbarian hordes—as the Hyrcanians, Parthians, and Cadusians, on the north. It is a matter of doubt whether the ancient empires of Nineveh and Babylon ever included ancient Persia, that is, the ancient Fars, with Kerman and Laristan. History hangs in suspense about the truth of the marvellous expeditions of Semiramis; but we know that every momentary inroad figures as a conquest in the chaos of primitive history. The Medes, however, really subjugated the Persians. That people seem to have first carried their arms against the Scythians of Asia, in Tboran or the present Tartary, and against the Indians. Five centuries before the Christian era, Cyrus delivered his nation from the yoke, and gave it the sovereignty over the whole of western Asia. But on entering Europe, the little nation of the Greeks arrested the progress of the numberless armies of Asia. Soon after, united under Alexander, they overthrew the feeble colossus of the Persian power. After his death, when the discord of the victors gave rise to a multitude of separate kingdoms, the warlike tribe of the Parthians, about the year 248 before Christ, took possession of the provinces which form the modern Persia. The Greeks still maintained their ground in Bactriana. Demetrius, their king, subjugated and civilized Indostan. Eucratides, the first, reigned over a thousand cities. But the Scythians, or rather the new nations which succeeded to the Scythians, uniting with the Parthians, overthrew the Bactrian throne. The Parthians, under their king of the Ashkanian dynasty, the Arsacides of the Greek historians, successfully resisted the progress of the Roman power. Towards the year 220 of the Christian era, a private man in Persia, according to the Greek authorities, wrested the power out of the hands of the Parthians, and founded the dynasty of the Sassanides. But the oriental writers do not consider the modern Persians as distinct from the Parthians; and, according to them, Artaxerxes, or Ardshir, is descended from the royal blood of the Parthians. Whatever be the fact on this dark point, the Persian empire often struggled against that of Constantinople; and having a brilliant appearance under the sway of the wise Noosbervan, submitted to the Arabians, and to the Mahometan religion, about the year 636. Two centuries after this the kingdom of Persia was re-established in Khorasan; and, after several revolutions, recovered its original extent of territory. In the year 934 the house of Bouiah ascended the throne, Shiraz being the seat of government. Persia was included in the conquests of Gengis-Khan in 1220, and Tamerlane in 1392, and recovered its freedom again under the Sophis, who ascended the throne in 1506. Shah-Abbas, surnamed the Great, began in 1586 a reign of half a century, which was brilliant but tyrannical. In 1722 Persia was conquered by the Afghans. This event was followed in 1736 by the extinction of the family of the Sophis, and the elevation of Nadir, surnamed Thamas-Khouli-Khan, to the imperial throne. This ferocious, but able and fortunate prince, was a native of Khorasan. On the 20th of June 1747 he was killed, after a reign of eleven years, which was chiefly signalized by the rapid conquest of Indostan. This was the commencement of a period entirely new, by which the modern geographical division of the country was fixed. The weakness of Nadir-Shah's successors, and the dreadful war which devastated western Persia, gave to the Afghans an opportunity of consolidating a new empire, which embraced the whole of eastern Persia, and of which the city of Kaubul is the capital. Western Persia enjoyed some repose under the government of Kerim-Khan, who did not assume the title of Shah, contenting himself with that of vekil or regent. This good prince had served under Nadir, with whom he was a particular favourite. When the tyrant died he was at Shiraz. He took on him the reins of government, and was supported by the inhabitants of that city, who were charmed by his beneficence, and placed unbounded confidence in his justice. In return for this attachment, Kerim embellished their city with beautiful palaces, mosques, and elegant gardens; he repaired the high roads, and built the caravanseras. His reign was not soiled by any act of cruelty. His charity to the poor, and the efforts which he made for the re-establishment of trade, met with universal praise. He died about the year 1779, after a reign of sixteen years. The death of Kerim was followed by new disturbances and misfortunes, as his brothers attempted to take possession of the sovereignty to the exclusion of his children. At last, in 1784, Ali-Murat, a prince of the blood, obtained peaceful possession of the throne of Persia. In the meantime, a eunuch of the name Aga-Mohammed took independent possession of Mazanderan. Ali-Murat, in marching against this usurper, was killed by a fall from his horse. His son Jaafar succeeded to the sceptre, but he was defeated by Aga-Mohammed at Yezde-Kast, and withdrew to Shiraz. In 1792, Aga-Mohammed attacked that city, and Jaafar lost his life in an insurrection. The victor defaced the tomb of Kerim, and insulted his ashes. The heroic valour of Louthf-Ali, son of Jaafar, was opposed in several desperate engagements to the fortunes of the eunuch, but without success; and the latter became final master of the whole of western Persia. He named as his successor his own nephew, Baba-Khan, who, since 1796, has reigned peaceably under the name of Futte-Ali-Shah. This prince has been engaged in several wars against the Russians, and, that he might the more advantageously defend the northern provinces from that power, he established his residence at Tehran. The provinces which in 1810 were subject to him, were Erivan, Adzerbidjan, Ghilan, Mazanderan, western Khorazan, Irak-Adjemi, Persian Koordistan, Farsistan, and Kerman. The Arabian sheiks on the Persian Gulf were tributary to him, and respectful presents were sent to him by the ooali or prince of Mekran. Malte-Brun.

Persicum mare, or Persicus sinus, a part of the Indian ocean, on the coast of Persia and Arabia now called the Gulf of Balgora.

Persis, a province of Persia, bounded by Media, Carmania, Susiana, and the Persian gulf. It is often taken for Persia itself. "Its name in Scripture is Paras, which is nearly the same with that of Fars, according to the modern form, as the permutation in the initial of P to F is frequent in this country, where Ispahan, for example, is pronounced Isfahan. Elam, son of Shem, is the parent of this nation, according to the holy text." D'Anville.

Perusia, now Perugia, a city of Etruria, to the south-east of the Thrasimene lake. "From Justin we collect that Perusia was of Achæan, that is, of Pelasgic origin." Cram. It was "one of the most ancient and most distinguished cities of Etruria; the era of its foundation long preceded that of Rome, and, like the origin of Clusium, Cortona, &c. is almost lost in distance of time. In conjunction with all the other Etrurian states, it long resisted the Romans, and when subjected, or rather reconciled to them, it became a faithful and a courageous ally; it defied the power of Annibal, and flourished in peace and opulence till the reign of Augustus; when unfortunately it engaged in the rebellion of Lucius Antonius, uncle of the Triumvir, and, under his command, shut its gates against Augustus, who took it, and, as it is reported, wished to spare it; but one of its principal citizens setting fire to his own house, which he intended as a funeral pile for himself and his family, the flames communicated to the neighbouring buildings, and, spreading rapidly around, reduced the city to ashes. Perugia, however, rose immediately from its ruins; and on its restoration, by a strange inconsistency, chose for its patron Vulcan, a divinity to whom it seems to have had very few obligations, as the god had spared his own temple only in the general conflagration. In the Gothic war it displayed much spirit, and stood a siege of seven years against these barbarians. It afterwards, with the whole Roman state, submitted to the Pope, and with some intervals of turbulent independence has remained ever since attached to the Roman See. Perugia is now a large, clean, well-built, and well-inhabited city. Seated on the summit of a mountain, it commands from its ramparts, and particularly from its citadel, an extensive view over a vast range of country, fertile, varied with hill and dale, and enlivened with villages and towns. There are many churches, convents, and palaces in this city, most of which were adorned with the paintings of Pietro Perugino, the master of Raffaello. Perugia has an university supplied with able professors, and several academies, all of which can boast of illustrious names; and it is upon the whole an interesting city, capable of entertaining the curious and inquisitive traveller for several days." Eustace.

Pessinus (untis), a town of Phrygia, where Atys, as some suppose, was buried. "It appears to have been the Sangar, in the country occupied by the Tolistoboians," (D'Anville,) and was particularly famous for a temple and a statue of the goddess Cybele, who was from thence called Pessinuntia. Strab. 12.—Paus. 7, c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 10 and 11.

Petelinus lacus, a lake near one of the gates of Rome. Liv. 6, c. 20.

Petilia, a town in the Brutian territory, one of the settlements of Philoctetes, "which, in the opinion of the most judicious and best informed topographers, occupied the situation of the modern Strongoli. This small town, of whose earlier history we have no particulars, gave a striking proof of its fidelity to the Romans in the second Punic war, when it refused to follow the example of the other Brutian cities in joining the Carthaginians. In consequence of this resolution it was besieged by Hannibal, and, though unassisted by the Romans, it held out until reduced to the last extremity by famine; nor was it till all the leather in the town, and the grass in the streets, had been consumed for subsistence, that they at length surrendered. Ptolemy incorrectly classes it with the inland towns of Magna Græcia. It may be here observed, that Strabo has confounded this town with the Lucanian Petilia," although he "is the only author who seems to have given any hint of the existence of such a place. Strabo, in his general description of the inland towns of the Lucani, remarks, that the chief town of this people was Petelia, which could at that time boast of a considerable population; he adds, that it was built by Philoctetes, who had been forced by an adverse faction to quit Thessaly, his native country; and that on account of the strength of its position, the Samnites had been obliged to construct forts around it for the defence of their territory. It is observed by Antonini, the writer above alluded to, that Strabo here contradicts himself, by ascribing to Philoctetes the origin of a town of Lucania; whilst that hero is said in a few lines further on, to have occupied a part of the coast near Crotona, which was certainly in the territory of the Brutii. It will be seen, in fact, that all the ancient authors agree in the maritime situation of the colonies founded by the Grecian chieftain. This error of Strabo does not, however, affect the truth of his account with reference to to the Lucanian Petilia; and Antonini has adduced, in confirmation of the authority of that writer, so many inscriptions of early date, together with more recent documents, that it seems impossible to entertain further doubts on the subject. He has recognised the ruins of this ancient town precisely on the Monte della Stella." Cram.

Petræa, one of the divisions of Arabia, bounded on the north by Palestine, on the east by Arabia Deserta and part of the Sinus Persicus, on the south by a long ridge of mountains, which separate it from Arabia Felix, on the west by the isthmus which joins Africa to Asia, and part of the Red Sea. "It had this name from the rockiness of the soil hereof, or more properly from Petra, the chief city of it, called also by Ethicus, Sicaria, by the Hebrews Chus, generally translated Ethiopia; by William of Tyre, Arabia Secunda, Felix being reckoned for the first. By Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny, it is called Nabathæa, which name it had from Nabaioth, the eldest of the twelve sons of Ismael, though properly that name belonged only to those parts of it that lay next Judea. The people, for the most part were descended of the sons of Chus and Ismael, intermixed with the Midianites descended from Abraham by Keturah, and the Amalekites, descended probably from Amalek, the grandson of Esau, but all united at last in the name of Saracens. This name, derived, as some think from Sarra, signifying 'a desert,' and Saken, which signifieth 'to inhabit,' because they live for the most part in these desert places; as others say, from Sarak, signifying 'a robber.' This last is most suitable to their nature, and best liked by Scaliger." Heyl. Cosm.

Petrinum, a town of Campania. Horat. 1, ep. 5, v. 5.

Petrocorii, a people of Celtic Gaul, according to the divisions of that country as recorded by Cæsar. At a later period their territory formed part of Aquitania Secunda. "From the appellation of Petrocorii are formed the names of Perigord and Perigueux, though Vesuna, the primitive name of the capital, is still retained in the quarter of the city called la Visone." D'Anville.

Peuce, an island between the arms which form the mouth of the Danube, and whose modern name, Piczini, preserves an evident analogy to that of the Peucini, whom it is remarkable to find re-appear in the Lower Empire under the names of Picziniges and Patzinacites." D'Anville.—Strab. 7.—Lucan. 3, v. 202.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Peucētia, a part of Apulia, forming the territory of "the Peucetii, who, if the opinion of Dionysius of Halicarnassus is to be adopted, derived their name from Peucetius, son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, who, with his brother Œnotrus migrated to Italy seventeen generations before the siege of Troy. But modern critics have felt little disposed to give credit to a story, the improbability of which is so very apparent, whether we look to the country from whence these pretended settlers are said to have come, or the state of navigation at so remote a period. Had the Peucetii and Œnotri really been of Grecian origin, Dionysius might have adduced better evidence of the fact than the genealogies of the Arcadian chiefs, cited from Pherecydes. The most respectable authority he could have brought forward on this point would unquestionably have been that of Antiochus the Syracusan: but this historian is only quoted by him in proof of the antiquity of the Œnotri, not of their Grecian descent. The Peucetii are always spoken of in history, even by the Greeks themselves, as barbarians, who differed in no essential respect from Daunii, Iapyges, and other neighbouring nations. The name of Pœdiculi was given to the inhabitants of that portion of Peucetia which was more particularly situated on the coast between the Aufidus and the confines of the Calabri. It is stated by Pliny, that this particular tribe derived their origin from Illyria. The Peucetii appear then to have extended along the coast of the Adriatic, from the Aufidus to the neighbourhood of Brundusium, which belonged to Iapygia; and in the interior, their territory reached as far as Silvium in the Appenines, constituting principally what in modern geography is called Terra di Bari." Cram.

Phacusa, a town of Egypt, on the eastern mouth of the Nile.

Phæācia, an island of the Ionian Sea, near the coast of Epirus, anciently called Scheria, and afterwards Corcyra. The inhabitants, called Phæaces, were a luxurious and dissolute people, for which reason a glutton was generally stigmatized by the epithet of Phæax. When Ulysses was shipwrecked on the coast of Phæacia, Alcinous was then king of the island, whose gardens have been greatly celebrated. Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 24.—*Ovid. Phanæus, a promontory of the island of Chios, famous for its wines. It was called after a king of the same name, who reigned there. Liv. 36, c. 43.—Virg. G. 2, v. 98.

Pharæ, I. "one of the twelve cities of Achaia, was situated on the bank of the river Pirus, about 70 stadia from the sea, and 120 from Patræ. Pharæ, whose territory was exposed during the Social war to the frequent ravages of the Ætolians, on receiving no succour from the Achæan prætor, determined, as we learn from Polybius, no longer to furnish supplies for the service of the confederation. This city, which was afterwards annexed by Augustus to the colony of Patræ, possessed an extensive forum, where was placed an image of Mercury, and near it an oracle of the god; also a fountain named Hama, consecrated to the same divinity. On the banks of the Pirus, called Pierus by the Pharæans and sometimes Achelous, Pausanias observed a number of plane trees remarkable from their age and size, many of their trunks were hollow, and so capacious that persons might feast and recline within them. The inhabitants of this city were named Pharæi, while those of the Messenian Pharæ were called Pharatæ or Phariatæ. The ruins of Pharæ in Achaia were observed by Dodwell on the left bank of the Camenitza." Cram——II. Another in Messenia. Vid. Phcræ.

PHARNĀCIA, a town of Pontus, probably the same as Cerasus.

PHAROS, I. a small island in the bay of Alexandria, about seven furlongs distant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian shore with a causeway, by Dexiphanes, B. C. 284, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter and Philadelphus, by Sostratus, the son of Dexiphanes. This tower, which was called the tower of Pharos, and which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was built with white marble, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles. On the top, fires were constantly kept, to direct sailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of access. The building of this tower cost the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which are equivalent to above 165,000*l.* English, if Attic; or if Alexandrian, double that sum. There was this inscription upon it, King Ptolemy to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors; but Sostratus, the architect, wishing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the stones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above-mentioned inscription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name disappeared, and the following inscription then became visible; Sostratus the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors. The word Pharias is often used as Egyptian. Lucan. 2, v. 636, l. 3, v. 260, l. 6, v. 308, l. 9, v. 1005, &c. —*Ovid. PHARSĀLUS, "a city of Thessaly, so celebrated for the battle fought in its plains between the armies of Cæsar and Pompey, appears to have been situated in that part of the province which Strabo designates by the name of Thessaliotis. Although a city of considerable size and importance, we find no mention of it prior to the Persian invasion. Thucydides reports that it was besieged by the Athenian general Myronides after his success in Bœotia, but without avail. The same historian speaks of the services rendered to the Athenian people by Thucydides the Pharsalian, who performed the duties of proxenos to his countrymen at Athens; and he also states that the Pharsalians generally favoured that republic during the Peloponnesian war. Diodorus reports, that on one occasion Pharsalus was taken by Medius, tyrant of Larissa. Xenophon notices it as an independent republic, though it afterwards fell into the hands of Jason, tyrant of Pheræ. Several years afterwards it was occupied by Antiochus, king of Syria, but on his retreat from Thessaly it surrendered to the consul Acilius Glabrio. Livy seems to make a distinction between the old and new town, as he speaks of Palæo Pharsalus. Dr. Clarke in his Travels remarks there are but few antiquities at Pharsalus. The name of Phersalé alone remains to show what it once was. South-west of the town there is a hill surrounded with ancient walls, formed of large masses of a coarse kind of marble. Upon a lofty rock above the town, towards the south, are other ruins of greater magnitude, shewing a considerable portion of the walls of the Acropolis and remains of the Propylæa. According to Strabo, Pharsalus was situated near the river Enipeus, and not far from its junction with the Apidanus, which afterwards enters the Peneus." Cram.

PHARUSII, or PHAURUSII, a people of Africa, beyond Mauretania. According to Pliny, the Pharusii were said to have been Persians, who accompanied Hercules to Africa. Probably this same people are alluded to by Sallust, when he describes the Persian followers of Hercules. Mela, 1, c. 4.

PHARYBUS, a river of Macedonia, more properly styled Baphyrus.

PHASĒLIS, a city in the vicinity of the pass which mount Climax, in Lycia, forms with the sea. According to D'Anville, Fionda occupies the site of the ancient city. Some have assigned this city to Lycia, others to Pamphylia, and others to the Cilicians. This has perplexed geographers, as well as the fact that Lucan describes Phaselis as a small place, although Strabo calls it a city of note. Phaselis was originally inhabited by Lycians, and was therefore assigned to Lycia. But subsequently, as the Pamphylians extended their dominion over the seacoast, it was attributed to Pamphylia, although occupied by Lycians. At a still later period, induced by the convenience of their harbour, they devoted themselves to piracy, or else were prevailed on by the Cilicians to give protection to the pirates. Hence, having deserted the Lycians, or having been cast off by them, their city was called Cilician. After the reduction of this city by Publius Servilius, the population became very trifling; and hence the epithet parva bestowed upon it by Lucan. Mela, 1, 14. ed. Voss.

PHASIĀNA, a canton which was traversed by the Aras at its entrance in Armenia. It is now Pasiani, or Pasni, as the Turks call it. D'Anville.

PHASIS, I. a river of Colchis, rising in the mountains of Armenia, now called Faoz, and falling into the Euxine on the east. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, who entered it after a long and perilous voyage, from which reason all dangerous voyages have been proverbially intimated by the words of sailing to the Phasis. There were on the banks of the Phasis a great number of large birds, of which, according to some of the ancients, the Argonauts brought some to Greece, and which were called, on that account, pheasants. The Phasis was reckoned by the ancients one of the largest rivers of Asia. Plin. 10, c. 48.—Martial. 13, ep. 62.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Paus. 4, c. 44.—Orpheus. ——II. or Araxes, now the Aras.——III. A city of Colchis, at the mouth of the Phasis. It was of Greek foundation. D'Anville.

PHELLOE, "a fortress of Achaia, distant forty stadia from Ægira, in the mountains. Its territory produced wine, and the oak forests around abounded with stags and wild boars. It was remarkable also for the number of its springs and fountains; the town contained a temple of Bacchus, and another of Diana. Sir W. Gell is inclined to place Phelloe near the village of Zakoula, 'where there is a pass through a chasm in the mountain, and at the top of the pass on the right is a precipitous rock, on which the castle may have been situated." Cram.

PHENEUS, "a town of Arcadia, of some note and of great antiquity, since Hercules is said to have resided there after his departure from Tiryns, and Homer has mentioned it amongst the principal Arcadian cities. The citadel was placed on a lofty and steep rock, which was further strengthened by artificial works; it contained a temple of Minerva Tritonia, the vestiges only of which were apparent when Pausanias travelled in Arcadia. Below the citadel were the stadium and tomb of Iphiclus, and the temples of Mercury and the Eleusinian Ceres. Pheneum was surrounded by some extensive marshes, which are said to have once inundated the whole country, and to have destroyed the ancient town. These were principally formed by the river Aroanius, or Olbius, which descends from the mountains to the north of Pheneus, and usually finds a vent in some natural caverns or katabathra at the extremity of the plain; but when by accident these happened to be blocked up, the waters filled the whole valley, and, communicating with the Ladon and Alpheus, overflowed the beds of those rivers as far as Olympia. Pausanias reports, that vestiges of some great works undertaken to drain the Phenean marshes, and ascribed by the natives to Hercules, were to be seen near the city. There was a foss fifty stadia long, and in some places thirty feet deep. Pheneus is noticed by Polybius. The vestiges of this town according to Dodwell, are to be seen near the village of Phonia upon an insulated rock. The foundations of the walls only remain; the rest of the ruins consist of masses of rubbish and scattered blocks. The same antiquary informs us, that the katabathron of the Aroanius is at the foot of a steep and rocky mountain called Kokino-bouno. The lake is very small, and varies according to the season of the year." Cram.

PHERÆ, I. "one of the most ancient and important cities of Thessaly, the capital of Admetus and Eumetus. Subsequently to the heroic age we find the Pheræans assisting the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war, at which time they probably enjoyed a republican form of government. Some years after, Jason, a native of Pheræ, having raised himself to the head of affairs by his talents and ability, became master, not only of his own city, but of nearly the whole of Thessaly, and, having caused himself to be proclaimed generalissimo of its forces, formed the most ambitious projects for extending his influence and aggrandizing his power. These were however frustrated by his sudden death, which occurred by assassination, whilst celebrating some public games at Pheræ, in the third year of the 102d Olympiad. The independence of Pheræ was not, however, secured by this event, as Jason was succeeded by his brothers Polydorus and Polyphron. The former of these died soon after; not without some suspicion attaching to Polyphron, who now became the sovereign of Pheræ; but after the lapse of a year, he in his turn was put to death by Alexander, who continued for eleven years the scourge of his native city and the whole of Thessaly. His evil designs were for a time checked by the brave Pelopidas, who entered that province at the head of a Bœotian force, and occupied the citadel of Larissa; but on his falling into the hands of the tyrant, the Bœotian army was placed in a most perilous situation, and was only saved by the presence of mind and ability of Epaminondas, then serving as a volunteer. The Thebans subsequently rescued Pelopidas, and under his command made war upon Alexander of Pheræ, whom they defeated, but at the expense of the life of their gallant leader, who fell in the action. Alexander was not long after assassinated by his wife and her brothers, who continued to tyrannize over this country until it was liberated by Philip of Macedon. Tisiphonus, the eldest of these princes, did not reign long, and was succeeded by Lycophron, who, being attacked by the young king of Macedon, sought the aid of Onomarchus the Phocian leader. Philip was at first defeated in two severe engagements, but having recruited his forces, he once more attacked Onomarchus, and succeeded in totally routing the Phocians, their general himself falling into the hands of the victors. The consequence of this victory was the capture of Pheræ and the expulsion of Lycophron. Pitholaus, his brother, not long after, again usurped the throne, but was likewise quickly expelled on the return of the king of Macedonia. Many years after, Cassander, as we are informed by Diodorus, fortified Pheræ, but Demetrius Poliorcetes contrived by secret negotiations to obtain possession both of the town and the citadel. In the invasion of Thessaly by Antiochus, Pheræ was forced to surrender to the troops of that monarch after some resistance. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Roman consul Acilius. Strabo observes that the constant tyranny under which this city laboured had hastened its decay. Its territory was most fertile, and the suburbs, as we collect from Polybius, were surrounded by gardens and walled enclosures. Stephanus Byz. speaks of an old and new town of Pheræ, distant about eight stadia from each other. Pheræ, according to Strabo, was ninety stadia from Pagasæ its emporium." Cram.——II. A city of Messenia, to the east of the river Pamisus, "where Telemachus and the son of Nestor were entertained by Diocles on their way from Pylos to Sparta. Pheræ was one of the seven towns offered by Agamemnon to Achilles. It was annexed by Augustus to Laconia after the battle of Actium." Cram.

PHIGALEA, "a city of Arcadia, situated to the west of Lycosura, and beyond the river Platanistus, on the brow of a lofty and precipitous rock which overhung the bed of the Neda. It had been founded by Phigalus, son of Lycaon, or, as others affirmed, by Phialus, son of Bucolion, whence it was called Phialea. A curious account of the Phigalean repasts is extracted by Athenæus from the work of Harmodius of Lepreum, who wrote on the customs and institutions of the place. According to the same author the Phigaleans had the character of being drunkards. In the time of Pausanias the city was still in a flourishing state, and contained a forum and several public edifices; the temple of Bacchus Acratophorus stood near the gymnasium, that of Diana Sospita was placed on the ascent leading up to the town: Paulizza now occupies the site of the ancient Phigaleia. Sir W. Gell informs us that the entire and extensive circuit of the walls may still be observed; they were defended by numerous towers, some of which are circular, situated on rocky hills and tremendous precipices. The village of Paulizza contains some columns, and other fragments of temples. The Neda flowed below the town, and was joined, not far from thence, by the little river Lymax, near the source of which were some warm springs." Cram.

Phila, the first town in Macedonia, beginning from the mouth of the Peneus, "situated apparently near the sea, at no great distance from Tempe. It was occupied by the Romans when their army had penetrated into Pieria by the passes of Olympus from Thessaly; and was built, as Stephanus informs us, by Demetrius, son of Antigonus Gonatas, and father of Philip, who named it after his mother Phila. The ruins of this fortress are probably those which Dr. Clarke observed near Platamona, which he regarded as the remains of Heracleum." Cram.

Philadelphia, I. a city of Lydia, "which owed this name to a brother of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, was situated immediately under the extremity of a branch of Tmolus; but was constructed with little solidity in its edifices, as being extremely subject to earthquakes. These phenomena were most dreadful in their effects in the seventeenth year of the Christian era; for then twelve of the principal cities of Asia, particularly this and Sardes, were nearly destroyed. A great tract of country, which from Mysia extended in Phrygia, being at all times most exposed to these disasters, was called Catakecaumene, or the Burnt Country. It must be said, to the honour of Philadelphia, that when all the country had sunk under the Ottoman yoke, it still resisted, and yielded only to the efforts of Bajazet I., or Ilderim. The Turks call it Alah-Shehr, or the Beautiful City; probably by reason of its situation." D'Anville.——II. The chief city of Ammonitis, the country of the Ammonites. It was more anciently called Ammon and Rabbath-Ammon, or the Great Ammon, until the name of Philadelphia was given to it, probably from Philadelphus, king of Egypt. It has resumed its primitive name in the form of Amman. D'Anville.——III. Another in Cilicia.

Philippi, a town of Macedonia, anciently called Datos, and situate at the east of the Strymon, on a rising ground which abounds with springs and water. Mount Pangæum, which was in the vicinity of this city, contained gold and silver mines. "These valuable mines naturally attracted the attention of the Thasians, who were the first settlers on this coast; and they accordingly formed an establishment in this vicinity at a place named Crenides, from the circumstance of its being surrounded by numerous sources which descended from the neighbouring mountain. Philip of Macedon having turned his attention to the affairs of Thrace, the possession of Crenidæ and mount Pangæum naturally entered into his views; accordingly he invaded this country, expelled the feeble Cotys from his throne, and then proceeded to found a new city on the site of the old Thasian colony, which he named after himself Philippi. When Macedonia became subject to the Romans, the advantages attending the peculiar situation of Philippi induced that people to settle a colony there; and we know from the Acts of the Apostles that it was already at that period one of the most flourishing cities of this part of their empire. It is moreover celebrated in history, from the great victory gained here by Mark Antony and Octavian over the forces of Brutus and Cassius, by which the republican party was completely subdued. Philippi, however, is rendered more interesting from the circumstance of its being the first place in Europe where the Gospel was preached by St. Paul, (A. D. 51.) as we know from the 16th of the Acts of the Apostles, and also from the Epistle he has addressed to his Philippian converts where the zeal and charity of the Philippians towards their Apostle received a just commendation. We hear frequently of bishops of Philippi in the ecclesiastical historians; and the town is also often mentioned by the Byzantine writers. Its ruins still retain the name of Filibah. Theophrastus speaks of the rosa centifolia, which grew in great beauty near Philippi, being indigenous on mount Pangæum." Cram.

Phlegyæ, a people of Thessaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas the son of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them escaped to Phocis, where he settled. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 301.—Strab. 9.

Phlius. "The little state of Phlius, though an independent republic, may with propriety be referred to Argolis, since Homer represents it under the early name of Aræthyrea as dependent on the kingdom of Mycenæ. Pausanias derives this appellation of the city from Aræthyrea, daughter of Arus, its earliest sovereign; and states that it afterwards took that of Phlius from a son of Asopus, who was one of the Argonauts. The Phliasian territory adjoined Corinth and Sicyon on the north, Arcadia on the west, and the Nemean and Cleonæan districts on the south and south-east. After the arival of the Heraclidæ and Dorians, the Phliasians were invaded by a party of their forces under the command of Rhegnidas, a grandson of Temenus, and compelled to admit these new colonists into their city, which thus became annexed to the Dorian race. Phlius sent 200 soldiers to Thermopylæ, and 1000 to Platæa. In the Peloponnesian war it espoused the Lacedæmonian cause, together with the Corinthians and Sicyonians; and at a time when those states formed a coalition against that power, it still adhered to the Spartan alliance. The Phliasians having on this occasion sustained a severe loss in an engagement with the Athenian general Iphicrates, they were under the necessity of receiving a Lacedæmonian force within their town to protect it against the enemy. In gratitude for which assistance they readily contributed to the expedition subsequently undertaken by the Spartans against Olynthus, and received the thanks of Agesipolis for their zeal on this occasion. Not long after, however, they became involved in war with that powerful state, from their refusing to make good the agreement they had entered into with Sparta, to restore to the exiles, who had been reinstated by its interference, the possession of their property. Agesilaus was in consequence deputed by the Spartan government to reduce the refractory city; and after an obstinate siege and blockade, which lasted nearly two years, it was compelled to surrender: Delphion, who was the principal leader of the besieged, and had given great proofs of courage and talent, escaped by night during the negotiations. It appears from Xenophon that at this period Phlius contained more than 5000 citizens, which supposes a population of 20,000 souls. Sometime after the capture of the town it was again attacked, as the ally of Sparta, by the Argives, Bœotians, and other confederates; and would have been taken by assault, but for the courage and intrepidity of the inhabitants. These being also successful against the Sicyonians and Pellenians, who had invaded their territory, and having obtained the assistance of some Athenian troops under the command of Chares, were finally enabled to maintain their independence against all their enemies. In the revolutionary period which succeeded the death of Alexander, Phlius became subject to despotic rule; but on the organization of the Achæan league by Aratus, Cleonymus, tyrant of that city, voluntarily abdicated, and persuaded his countrymen to join the confederacy. The forum was decorated with a bronze gilt statue of a goat, representing the constellation of that name, which the people were desirous of propitiating, that it might not injure their vines. Here was also the tomb of Aristias, an excellent writer of satiric plays. Beyond might be seen a building called the house of prophecy, and the spot said to be the centre of Peloponnesus, near which were ranged the temples of Bacchus, Apollo, and Isis. The remains of Phlius are to be seen not far from the town of Agios Giorgios, on the road to the lake of Stymphalus in Arcadia. Sir W. Gell affirms, that the ruins extended for some distance across the plain, and Pouqueville discovered on the height above the Asopus, where the citadel was placed, the vestiges of several temples. This river, as we learn from Strabo, had its source on mount Carneates. The Arantinus was a hill adjoining that of the acropolis. It is now called Agios Basili. These mountains separated the Phliasian territory from the Nemean plain." Cram.

Phocæa, now Fochia, a maritime town of Ionia, in Asia Minor, with two harbours, between Cumæ and Smyrna, founded by an Athenian colony. It received its name from Phocus, the leader of the colony, or from (phocæ) sea calves, which are found in great abundance in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants, called Phocæi and Phocæenses, were expert mariners, and founded many cities in different parts of Europe. They left Ionia, when Cyrus attempted to reduce them under his power, and they came, after many adventures, into Gaul, where they founded Massilia, now Marseilles. The town of Marseilles is often distinguished by the epithet of Phocaica, and its inhabitants called Phocæenses. Phocæa was declared independent by Pompey, and under the first emperors of Rome it became one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. Liv. 5, c. 34, l. 37, c. 31. l. 38, c. 39.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, v. 165.—Strab. 14.—Horat. epod. 16.—*Ovid. Phocenses, and Phocici, the inhabitants of Phocis in Greece.

Phocicum, a place in Phocis, where "the general assembly of the Phocian states was usually convened, in a large building erected for that purpose." Cram.

Phocis. "The Greeks designated by the name of Phocis that small tract of country which bordered on the Locri Ozolæ and Doris to the west and north-west, and the Opuntian Locri to the north; while to the east it was bounded by the Bœotian territory, and to the south by the Corinthian gulf. Its appellation was said to be derived from Phocus the son of Æacus. The more ancient inhabitants of the country were probably of the race of the Leleges; but the name of Phocians already prevailed at the time of the siege of Troy, since we find them enumerated in Homer's catalogue of Grecian warriors. From Herodotus we learn, that prior to the Persian invasion the Phocians had been much engaged in war with the Thessalians, and had often successfully resisted the incursions of that people. But when the defile of Thermopylæ was forced by the army of Xerxes, the Thessalians, who had espoused the cause of that monarch, are said to have urged him, out of enmity to the Phocians, to ravage and lay waste with fire and sword the territory of that people. Delphi and Parnassus on this occasion served as places of refuge for many of the unfortunate inhabitants, but numbers fell into the hands of the victorious Persians, and were compelled to serve in their ranks under the command of Mardonius. They seized, however, the earliest opportunity of joining their fellow-countrymen in arms; and many of the Persians, who were dispersed after the rout of Platæa, are said to have fallen victims to their revengeful fury. A little prior to the Peloponnesian war, a dispute arose respecting the temple of Delphi, which threatened to involve in hostilities the principal states of Greece. This edifice was claimed apparently by the Phocians as the common property of the whole nation, whereas the Delphians asserted it to be their own exclusive possession. The Lacedæmonians are said by Thucydides to have declared in favour of the latter, whose cause they maintained by force of arms. The Athenians, on the other hand, were no less favourable to the Phocians, and, on the retreat of the Spartan forces, sent a body of troops to occupy the temple, and deliver it into their hands. The service thus rendered by the Athenians seems greatly to have cemented the ties of friendly union which already subsisted between the two republics. After the battle of Leuctra, Phocis, as we learn from Xenophon, became subject for a time to Bœotia, until a change of circumstances gave a new impulse to the character of this small republic, and called forth all the energies of the people in defence of their country. A fine had been imposed on them by an edict of the Amphictyons for some reason which Pausanias professes not to have been able to ascertain, and which they themselves conceived to be wholly unmerited. Diodorus asserts, that it was in consequence of their having cultivated a part of the Cirrhean territory which had been declared sacred. By the advice of Philomelus, a Phocian high in rank and estimation, it was determined to oppose the execution of the hostile decree; and, in order more effectually to secure the means of resistance, to seize upon the temple of Delphi and its treasures. This measure having been carried into immediate execution, they were thus furnished with abundant supplies for raising troops to defend their country. These events led to what the Greek historians have termed the Sacred war, which broke out in the second year of the 106th Olympiad. The Thebans were the first to take up arms in the cause of religion, which had been thus openly violated by the Phocians; and, in a battle that took place soon after the commencement of hostilities, the latter were defeated with considerable loss, and their leader Philomelus killed in the rout which ensued. The Phocians, however, were not intimidated by this ill success, and, having raised a fresh army, headed by Onomarchus, they obtained several important advantages against the Amphictyonic army, notwithstanding the accession of Philip king of Macedon to the confederacy. Onomarchus having united his forces with those of Lycophron, tyrant of Pheræ, then at war with Philip, he was enabled to vanquish the latter in two successive engagements, and compel him to evacuate Thessaly. Philip, however, was soon in a state to resume hostilities and re-enter Thessaly, when a third battle was fought, which terminated in the discomfiture and death of Onomarchus. Diodorus asserts, that he was taken prisoner, and put to death by order of Philip; Pausanias, that he perished by the hands of his own soldiers. He was succeeded by his brother Phayllus, who at first appears to have been successful, but was at length overthrown in several engagements with the Bœotian troops; and was soon after seized with a disorder, which terminated fatally. On his death the command devolved on Phalæcus, who, according to Pausanias, was his son; but Diodorus affirms that he was the son of Onomarchus. This leader being not long after deposed, the army was intrusted to a commission, at the head of which was Philo; whose total want of probity soon became evident by the disappearance of large sums from the sacred treasury. He was in consequence brought to trial, condemned, and put to death. Diodorus estimates the whole amount of what was taken from Delphi during the war at 10,000 talents. Phalæcus was now restored to the command, but, finding the resources of the state nearly exhausted, and Philip being placed by the Amphictyonic council at the head of their forces, he deemed all further resistance hopeless, and submitted to the king of Macedon, on condition of being allowed to retire with his troops to the Peloponnesus. This convention put an end at once to the Sacred war, after a duration of ten years, when a decree was passed in the Amphictyonic council, by which it was adjudged that the walls of all the Phocian towns should be razed to the ground, and their right of voting in the council transferred to those of Macedonia. Phocis, however, soon after recovered from this state of degradation and subjection by the assistance of Athens and Thebes, who united in restoring its cities in a great measure to their former condition. In return for these benefits the Phocians joined the confederacy that had been formed by the two republics against Philip; they also took part in the Lamiac war after the death of Alexander; and when the Gauls made their unsuccessful attempt on the temple of Delphi, they are said by Pausanias to have displayed the greatest zeal and alacrity in the pursuit of the common enemy, as if anxious to efface the recollection of the disgrace they had formerly incurred. The maritime part of this province occupied an extent of coast of nearly one day's sail, as Dicæarchus reports, from the border of the Locri Ozolæ to the confines of Bœotia." Cram.

PHŒNICE, a province of Syria, bounded on the north by Syria proper, on the east and south by Palestine, and on the west by the Mediterranean. Although this country was very inconsiderable in extent, being a narrow strip of land between the coast of the Mediterranean and the Syrian mountains, its inhabitants, notwithstanding, hold a high rank among the most remarkable nations of Asia. We have not, however, a "complete, or even continuous history of them; but only separate accounts, from which, however, a picture of them in its great features may be traced. It did not form one state, or at least not one kingdom; but contained several cities with their territory. But among these leagues were formed, and by this means a sort of supremacy of the more powerful established, especially of Tyre. Yet notwithstanding Tyre stood at the head, and perhaps also usurped a supremacy in the confederacy, each individual state still preserved its constitution within itself. In each of them we find kings; who seem, however, to have been limited princes, in as much as there were magistrates at their side. Strict despotism could not long subsist in a nation which carried on commerce and founded colonies. Of the several cities, Tyre is the only one of which we have a series of kings, and even this series is not altogether unbroken. The flourishing period of Phœnicia in general, and especially of Tyre, was between 1000—332. In this period the Phœnician nation was extended by sending out colonies; of which some, especially Carthage, became as powerful as the mother cities. At a very early period they were possessed of most of the islands of the Archipelago, from which, however, they were again driven by the Greeks. Their chief countries for colonization were partly southern Spain, (Tartessus, Gades, Carteja,) partly the northern coast of Africa to the left of the lesser Syrtis, (Utica, Carthage, Adrumetum,) partly also the north-west coast of Sicily, (Panormus, Lilybæum.) It is very highly probable that they also had settlements to the east, in the Persian gulf, on the islands Tylos and Aradus (the Bahhrein islands.) The view of the Phœnician colonies serves as a foundation for the view of their commerce and navigation; which, however, was extended still further than their settlements. It began among them, as many other nations, with plundering by sea; and in Homer they still appear as pirates. Their chief objects were, their colonial countries, northern Africa and Spain, especially the latter, on account of its productive silver mines. Beyond the Pillars of Hercules, the western coast of Africa; Britain and the Scilly islands for tin, and probably for amber. From the harbours on the northern extremity of the Arabian gulf, Elath and Ezion-Geber, they, in connexion with the Jews traded with Ophir, i. e. the rich southern countries, especially Arabia Felix and Ethiopia. From the Persian gulf to the nearer Indian peninsula and Ceylon. And they also undertook several great voyages of discovery, among which the sailing round Africa is the most important. But their traffic by land, consisting for the most part of the traffic done in the caravans, was of not inferior importance. The chief branches of it were, the African traffic by caravans for spices and incense; directed as well to Arabia Felix, as to Gerra near the Persian gulf. The traffic with Babylon by way of Palmyra; and from there, yet only through a medium, across Persia, as far as little Bucharia and little Thibet, perhaps even as far as China. The traffic with Armenia and the neighbouring countries for slaves, horses, vessels of copper, &c. To finish the sketch, we must add their own fabrics and manufactures; especially their establishments for weaving and dyeing; the purple dye with a liquor extracted from shell-fish; and manufactures of glass and play-things, which were disposed of to advantage in their trade with rude nations, which commonly consisted in barter. Several other important inventions, among which that of letters deserves to be first named, are to be attributed to them." (Heeren's History of the States of Antiquity; Bancroft's translation.) After Alexander had deposed the Sidonian king, and overthrown the city of Tyre, Phœnicia followed the common fortune of Syria, and was subject to the house of Seleucus until made a Roman province. Under Constantine and his successors a division of the country was made, forming the two provinces of Phœnicia Prima and Phœnicia Libanica, from the mount Libanus. The origin of the name Phœnicia has given rise to much conjecture. Thus some trace it to Phœnix, the son of Agenor, who is said to have succeeded his father. But this etymology is too closely allied to fiction to be entitled to credence. Much less rational is the fanciful derivation of Bochart, who considers Phœnices a corruption of Ben-Anak, the "sons of Anak." The most probable on the whole is that which supposed the name Phœnicia to have been applied by the Greeks in reference to the palm-trees which abound in the country, φοινιξ signifying "a palm." "And for a further proof hereof, the palm was anciently the special cognizance or ensign of this country; as the olive-branch and cony of Spain, the elephant of Africa, the camel of Arabia, and the crocodile of Egypt, being peculiar to those countries. But thus first called by the Grecians only; for, by themselves and the people of Israel, their next neighbours, they are called Canaanites, or the posterity of Canaan, five of whose sons were planted here; the other six inhabiting more towards the south and east, in the land of Palestine." Heyl. Cosm.

PHOLOE, a mountain of Arcadia, near Pisa. It received its name from Pholus, the friend of Hercules, who was buried there. It is often confounded with another of the same name in Thessaly, near mount Othrys. Plin. 4, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, v. 198, l. 6, v. 318, l. 7, v. 449.—Ovid. 2. Fast. 2, v. 273.

PHRIXUS, a river of Argolis. There is also a small town of that name in Elis, built by the Minyæ. Herodot. 4, c. 148.

PHRYGIA, a country of Asia Minor, having Lydia on the west, Cappadocia on the east, and Cicilia and Pisidia on the south, with the exception of a narrow neck, that, passing the borders of these countries, reached south to the confines of Lycia, and had Pisidia and Pamphylia on the east. The northern boundaries were more uncertain and variable, extending at one time to the borders of Paphlagonia, all along that country and Bithynia. This part, indeed, was the first habitation of the Phrygians, and yet in the established geography of Asia Minor it is not known by this name; the Gallic occupation having caused it to be called Galatia. From the western limits of Galatia, however, as far as Lydia, Phrygia still confined upon Bithynia on the north. "The Phryges were of Thracian origin, according to Strabo; and their first establishments, from the time that Gordius and Midas reigned over this nation, were towards the sources of the Sangar, which divided their territory from Bithynia, according to the report of the same author. It is to this part, although at first but of small extent compared with its subsequent expansion, that the name of the greater Phrygia is given by distinction from a Phrygia Minor, which encroached on Mysia towards the Hellespont, and was thus denominated from Phrygians who occupied this country after the destruction of Troy. The testimony of Strabo is explicit; and if the Trojans are called Phrygians by Virgil, they became so by usurpation; and that accidental event will not justify us in obliterating the distinction between Mysia and Phrygia as provinces. But by a dismemberment which the kingdom of Bithynia suffered on the part of the Romans, and to the advantage of the kings of Pergamus, this part of the territory, which was Phrygian, assumed under these kings the name of Epictetus, or Phrygia, by acquisition. The territory which Phrygia possessed towards the south, and contiguous to Pisidia and Lycia, appears to have been called Paroreias; denoting it in the Greek to be in the vicinity of mountains. In the subdivision of provinces that took place in the time of Constantine, we distinguish two Phrygias: one surnamed Pacatiana; the other Salutaris; and Laodicea appears to have been metropolis in the first, and Synnada in the second." D'Anville. Lycaonia was also considered to be but a subdivision of this extensive province. This country was at different times a separate state, and successively a constituent part of the kingdom of Pergamus and of the prætorian province of Asia. Of Phrygia Proper the capital cities are Synnada, Apamea, and Cotyæum; of Phrygia Epictetos, Cibyria; and those of Lycaonia and Galatia may be seen under those articles. In its geographical features this country was not distinguished for its rivers, though the Lycus had in it the greater part of its course; the Halys formed in part its eastern boundary; and the Mæander with the Marsyas rose on its western confines. The Taurus mountains, however, constituted a striking object on the southern limits, which they defined along the borders of Pamphylia. Cybele was the chief deity of the country, and her festivals were observed with the greatest solemnity. The most remarkable towns, besides Troy, were Laodice, Hierapolis, and Synnada. The invention of the pipe of reeds, and of all sorts of needle-work, is attributed to the inhabitants, who are represented by some authors as stubborn, but yielding to correction, (hence Phryx verberatus melior,) as imprudent, effeminate, servile, and voluptuous; and to this Virgil seems to allude, Æn. 9, v. 617. The Phrygians, like all other nations, were called Barbarians by the Greeks; their music (Phrygii cantus) was of a grave and solemn nature, when opposed to the brisker and more cheerful Lydian airs. Mela, 1, c. 19. —Strab. 2, &c.—*Ovid. Phthia, a town of Phthiotis, at the east of mount Othrys in Thessaly, where Achilles was born, and from which he is often called Phthius Heros. Horat. 4, Od. 6, v. 4.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 156.—Mela, 2, c. 3.

Phthiōtis, a small province of Thessaly, between the Pelasgicus Sinus and the Maliacus Sinus, Magnesia, and mount Œta. It was also called Achaia. Paus. 10, c. 8. "Phthiotis, according to Strabo, included all the southern portion of Thessaly as far as mount Œta and the Maliac gulf. To the west it bordered on Dolopia, and on the east reached the confines of Magnesia. Referring to the geographical arrangement adopted by Homer, we shall find that he comprised within this extent of territory the districts of Phthia and Hellas properly so called, and, generally speaking, the dominions of Achilles, together with those of Protesilaus and Eurypylus. Many of his commentators have imagined that Phthia was not to be distinguished from the divisions of Hellas and Achaia, also mentioned by him; but other critics, as Strabo observes, were of a different opinion, and the expressions of the poet certainly lead us to adopt that notion in preference to the other.

Φεύγων ἵκετ' ἀνάνευθε δι' Ἑλλάδος εὐρυχόροιο, Φθίην δ' ἐξικόμην ἐριβώλακα, μητέρα μήλων. Il. ι. 478.

Again, it has been doubted, whether under the name of Hellas he meant to designate a tract of country or a city. Those who inclined to the former interpretation, applied the term to that portion of Thessaly which lay between Pharsalus and Thebæ Phthiotiæ; whilst those who contended for the latter, identified it with the ruins of Hellas, in the vicinity of Pharsalus, close to the river Enipeus and the town of Melitæa." Cram.

Phycus, (untis,) a promontory near Cyrene, now called Ras-al-sem. Lucan. 9.

Phyle, a well-fortified village of Attica, at a little distance from Athens. C. Nep. in Thras. "It was celebrated in the history of Athens as the scene of Thrasybulus' first exploits in behalf of his oppressed country, and was situated about 100 stadia from Athens, according to Diodorus, but Demosthenes estimates the distance at more than 120 stadia. It belonged to the tribe Œneis. The fortress of Phyle, according to Sir W. Gell, is now Bigla Castro. 'It is situated on a lofty precipice, and, though small, must have been almost impregnable, as it can only be approached by an isthmus on the east. Hence is a most magnificent view of the plain of Athens, with the acropolis and Hymettus, and the sea in the distance.' Dodwell maintains that its modern name is Argiro Castro. He describes at length the ruins of the fortress. The town was placed near the foot of the castle or acropolis; some traces of it yet remain, which consist of the foundations of a square tower, and a transverse wall to guard the pass, and several large blocks scattered about." Cram.

Physcos, a town of Caria, opposite Rhodes. Strab. 14.

Picēni, the inhabitants of Picenum, called also Picentes. They received their name from Picus, a bird by whose auspices they had settled in that part of Italy. Ital. 8, v. 425.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Picentia, the capital of the Picentini.

Picentīni, a people of Italy, between Lucania and Campania, on the Tuscan Sea. They "occupied an inconsiderable extent of territory from the promontory of Minerva to the mouth of the river Silarus. We are informed by Strabo that they were a portion of the inhabitants of Picenum, whom the Romans transplanted thither to people the shores of the gulf of Posidonia or Pæstum. It is probable that their removal took place after the conquest of Picenum, and the complete subjugation of this portion of ancient Campania, then occupied by the Samnites. According to the same writer, the Picentini were at a subsequent period compelled by the Romans to abandon the few towns which they possessed, and to reside in villages and hamlets, in consequence of having sided with Hannibal in the second Punic war. As a further punishment, they were excluded from military service, and allowed only to perform the duties of couriers and messengers." Cram.—Sil. It. 8, v. 450.—Tacit.H. 4, c. 62.

Picēnum, or Picēnus, ager, a country of Italy, near the Umbrians and Sabines, on the borders of the Adriatic. "It may be considered as limited to the north by the river Æsis. To the west it was separated from Umbria and the Sabine country by the central chain of the Appennines. Its boundary to the south was the river Matrinus, if we include in this division the Prætulii, a small tribe confined between the Matrinus and Helvinus. Little has been ascertained respecting the Picentes, except the fact that they were a colony of the Sabines, established under the auspices of the ancient Picus, a well-known character in the Latin mythology, who transmitted his name to his colonists. But the Sabines were not apparently the first or sole possessors of the country. The Siculi, Liburni, and Umbri, according to Pliny, the Pelasgi, as Silius Italicus reports, and the Tyrrheni, according to Strabo, all at different periods formed settlements in that part of Italy. The conquest of Picenum cost the Romans but little trouble: it was effected about 484 U. C. not long after the expedition of Pyrrhus into Italy; when 360,000 men, as Pliny assures us, submitted to the Roman authorities. From the same writer we learn, that Picenum constituted the fifth region in the division of Augustus. This province was considered as one of the most fertile parts of Italy. The produce of its fruit trees was particularly esteemed." Cram.—Liv. 21, c. 6, l. 22, c. 9, l. 27, c. 43. Sil. 10, v. 313.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 722.—Mart. 1, ep. 44.

Pictæ, or Picti, a people of Scythia, called also Agathyrsæ. They received this name from their painting their bodies with different colours, to appear more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. A colony of these, according to Servius, Virgil's commentator, emigrated to the northern parts of Britain, where they still preserved their name and savage manners, but they are mentioned only by later writers. Of course this is to be viewed but as a theory, and that but ill sustained. The opinions in regard to these people are numerous, without leading, or promising to lead, to any satisfactory, not to say, useful result. Vid. Caledonia. Marcell. 27, c. 18. —Claudian. de Hon. cons. v. 54.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 1.

Pictāvi, or Pictŏnes, a people of Gaul, in the modern country of Poictou. Cæs. 7, Bell. G. c. 4.

Pĭeria, a region of Macedonia. "The natural boundary of Pieria toward Perrhæbia, the contiguous district of Thessaly to the west, was the great chain of Olympus, which, beginning from the Peneus, closely follows the coast of Pieria till beyond Dium, where it strikes off in a north-west direction towards the interior of Macedonia. This was one of the most interesting parts of Macedonia; both in consideration of the traditions to which it has given birth, as being the first seat of the Muses, and the birthplace of Orpheus; and also of the important events which occurred there at a later period, involving the destiny of the Macedonian empire, and many other parts of Greece. The name of Pieria, which was known to Homer, was derived apparently from the Pieres, a Thracian people, who were subsequently expelled by the Temenidæ, the conquerors of Macedonia, and driven north beyond the Strymon and mount Pangæus, where they formed a new settlement. The boundaries which historians and geographers have assigned to this province vary; for Strabo, or rather his epitomizer, includes it between the Haliacmon and Axius. Livy also seems to place it north of Dium, while most authors ascribe that town to Pieria. Ptolemy gives the name of Pieria to all the country between the mouth of the Peneus and that of the Lydias; and, in fact, if it was not to be so defined, we should not know under what division to class this extent of coast, which certainly appertains to Macedonia. Herodotus and Thucydides have not determined the limits of Pieria; but the former rather leads us to suppose he extends it to the Peneus. Upon the whole, therefore, it will be safer to adhere to the arrangement of Ptolemy." Cram.

Πιερίην θ' ἐκτίβάσα καὶ Ἡμαθίην ἐρατεινὴν.
Il. Ξ. 226.

Pĭerus, I. a mountain of Thessaly, sacred to the Muses, who were from thence, as some imagine, called Pierides.——II. A river of Achaia, in Peloponnesus.——III. A town of Thessaly. Paus. 7, c. 21.——IV. A mountain, with a lake of the same name, in Macedonia.

Pigrum mare, a name applied to the Northern Sea, from its being frozen. The word Pigra is applied to the Palus Mæotis. Ovid. 4, Pont. 10, v. 61.—Plin. 4, c. 13.—Tacit. G. 45.

Pimpla, a mountain of Macedonia, with a fountain of the same name, on the confines of Thessaly, near Olympus, sacred to the Muses, who on that account are often called Pimpleæ and Pimpleades. Horat. 1, od. 26, v. 9.—Strab. 10.—Martial. 12, ep. 11, v. 3.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 4, v. 26, Sylv. 2, v. 36.

Pinarus, or Pindus, now Delisou, a river falling into the sea near Issus, after flowing between Cilicia and Syria. Dionys. Per.

Pincum, a town of Mœsia Superior, now Gradisca.

Pindenissus, a town of Comagene, near the base of the Amanus Mons. Cicero, when proconsul in Asia, besieged it for 25 days, and took it. Cic. ad. M. Cælium. ad Fam. 2, ep. 10.

Pindus, I. a mountain, or rather a chain of mountains, in Greece. "The Greeks applied this name to the elevated chain which separates Thessaly from Epirus, and the waters falling into the Ionian Sea and Ambracian gulf, from those streams which discharge themselves into the Ægean. Towards the north, it joined the great Illyrian and Macedonian ridges of Bora and Scardus, while to the south it was connected with the ramifications of Œta, and the Ætolian and Acarnanian mountains. The most frequented passage from northern Epirus into Thessaly appears to have led over that part of the chain of Pindus to which the name of mons Cercetius was attached. And if, as is very likely, Livy again refers to it under the corrupt name of mons Citius, it must have afforded a passage over one of its summits from Macedonia into Epirus. From Pouqueville's account this passage appears to be still frequented by those who cross from Epirus into Macedonia; and he himself proceeded by that route on his way to Grevno, which is to be considered as representing the ancient Elimea. In the map which accompanies his work the mountain bears the name of Zygos, or Ian Cantara." Cram.——II. a town of Doris in Greece, called also Cyphas. It was watered by a small river of the same name, which falls into the Cephisus near Lilæa. Herodot. 1, c. 56.

Pisa, a town of Elis, on the Alpheus, at the west of the Peloponnesus, founded by Pisus the son of Pericres and grandson of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Nestor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long the privilege of presiding at the Olympic games which were celebrated near their city. This honourable appointment was envied by the people of Elis, who made war against the Piseans, and, after many bloody battles, took their city and totally demolished it. It was at Pisa that Œnomaus murdered the suitors of his daughter, and that he himself was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Pisæi. Some have doubted the existence of such a place as Pisa, but this doubt originates from Pisa's having been destroyed in so remote an age. The horses of Pisa were famous. The year on which the Olympic games were celebrated was often called Pisæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Pisæ ramus oliva. Vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 386, l. 4, el. 10, v. 95.—Mela, 2.—Virg. G. 3, v. 180.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 417.—Paus. 6, c. 22.

Pisæ, a town of Etruria, built by a colony from Pisa in the Peloponnesus. The inhabitants were called Pisani. "The origin of Pisa is lost amidst the fables to which the Trojan war give rise, and which are common to so many Italian cities. If we are to believe a tradition recorded by Strabo, it owed its foundation to some of the followers of Nestor, in their wanderings after the fall of Troy. The poets have not failed to adopt this idea. Servius reports, that Cato had not been able to discover who occupied Pisa before the Tyrrheni under Tarcho, with the exception of the Teutones. From which account it might be inferred, that the most ancient possessors of Pisa were of Celtic origin. Dionysius of Halicarnassus names it among the towns occupied by the Pelasgi in the territory of the Siculi. The earliest mention we have of this city in the Roman history is in Polybius, from whom we collect, as well as from Livy, that its harbour was much frequented by the Romans in their communication with Sardinia, Gaul, and Spain. It was here that Scipio landed his army when returning from the mouths of the Rhone to oppose Hannibal in Italy. It became a colony 573 A. U. C. Strabo speaks of it as having been formerly an important naval station: in his day it was still a very flourishing commercial town, from the supplies of timber which it furnished to the fleets, and the costly marbles which the neighbouring quarries afforded for the splendid palaces and villas of Rome. Its territory produced wine, and the species of wheat called siligo. The Portus Pisanus was at the mouth of the Arno. We learn from Strabo, that formerly it stood at the junction of the Ausar and Arnus, the Serchio and Arno, but now they both flow into the sea by separate channels. Some indication of the junction of these rivers seems preserved by the name of Osari, attached to a little stream or ditch which lies between them." Cram. In the middle ages the Pisani became a great people among the small but independent and illustrious republics of Italy. Their fleets, which covered the most distant seas then known, bore equally the fame of their prowess and the benefits of their commercial enterprize and skill; and the expulsion of the Saracens from the islands of the Mediterranean, was the work of their valour and their strength. Having embraced the Ghibeline party in Florence, and being continually engaged in wars with the republic of Florence principally for this cause, and with the Genoese from motives of commercial jealousy, the Pisani lost at last their state in Italy, and Pisa now remains deserted amid her palaces, ennobled by a thousand recollections of early power and splendour, a magnificent solitude.

Pisæta, or Pisæi, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

Pisaurus, now Foglia, a river of Picenum, with a town called Pisaurum, now Pesaro, which became a Roman colony in the consulship of Claudius Pulcher. PLACENTIA, now called Piacenza, an ancient town and colony of Italy, at the confluence of the Trebia and Po. "It was colonized by the Romans with Cremona 535 U. C. to serve as a bulwark against the Gauls, and to oppose the threatened approach of Hannibal. Its utility in this latter respect was fully proved, by affording a secure retreat to the Roman general after the battle of the Ticinus, and more especially after the disaster of the Trebia. Placentia withstood all the efforts of the victorious Hannibal, and, eleven years after, the attempts which his brother Asdrubal made to obtain possession of it. The resistance which it offered to the latter caused a delay which led to his overthrow, and thus eventually perhaps saved the empire." Cram.

PLANASIA, I. a small island on the Tyrrhene Sea.——II. Another on the coast of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippa, the grandson of Augustus, to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1. c. 3. ——III. A town on the Rhone.

PLATÆA, and Æ, (arum,) a town of Bœotia, near mount Cithæron, on the confines of Megaris and Attica. "The Platæans, animated by a spirit of independence, had early separated themselves from the Bœotian confederacy, conceiving the objects of this political union to be hostile to their real interests; and had, in consequence of the enmity of the latter city, been induced to place themselves under the protection of Athens. Grateful for the services which they received on this occasion from that power, they testified their zeal in its behalf, by sending a thousand soldiers to Marathon, who thus shared the glory of that memorable day. The Platæans also manned some of the Athenian vessels at Artemisium, and fought in several battles which took place off that promontory; though not at Salamis, as they had returned to their homes after the Greeks withdrew from the Euripus, in order to place their families and valuables in safety, and could not therefore arrive in time. They also fought most bravely in the great battle which took place near their city against Mardonius, the Persian general, and earned the thanks of Pausanias and the confederate Greek commanders, for their gallant conduct on this as well as other occasions. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. The Grecian army, which was greatly inferior, lost but few men, and among these 91 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegeans, were the only soldiers found in the number of the slain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Persian camp was immense. Pausanias received the tenth of all the spoils, on account of his uncommon valour during the engagement, and the rest were rewarded each according to their respective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d of September, the same day, as the battle of Mycale, 479 B. C. and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of the Persian invasions, and from that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont. Platæa, which was burnt by the army of Xerxes, was soon restored, with the assistance of Athens, and the alliance between the two cities was cemented more closely than before. In the third year of the war, a large Peloponnesian force, under Archidamus king of Sparta, arrived under the walls of Platæa, and having summoned the inhabitants to abandon their alliance with Athens, proceeded, on their refusal, to lay siege to the town. Worn out at length by hunger and fatigue, those Platæans who remained in the town were compelled to yield to their persevering and relentless foes, who instigated by the implacable resentment of the Thebans, caused all who surrendered to be put to death, and razed the town to the ground, with the exception of one building, constructed out of the ruins of the city, which they consecrated to Juno, and employed as a house of reception for travellers. Though it seems to have been the intention of Philip, and also of Alexander, to restore Platæa, this was not carried into effect till the reign of Cassander, who is said to have rebuilt both Thebes and Platæa at the same time. Dicæarchus, who lived about that period, represents the town as still existing, when he says, 'The inhabitants of Platæa have nothing to say for themselves, except that they are colonists of Athens, and that the battle between the Persians and the Greeks took place near their town.' 'The ruins of Platæa,' according to Dr. Clarke, 'are situated upon a promontory projecting from the base of Cithæron. The place has now the usual appellation bestowed upon the ruins of Grecian citadels; it is called Palæo Castro. The walls are of the earliest kind of military structure, consisting of very considerable masses, evenly hewn, and well built.' 'The walls of Platæa,' says Sir W. Gell, 'may be traced near the little village of Kockla, in their circuit. The whole forms a triangle, having a citadel of the same form in the southern angle, with a gate towards the mountain at the point. The north-western angle seems to have been the portion which was restored after the destruction of the city. The north side is about 1025 yards in length, the west 1154, and the east 1120. It is about six geographical miles from the Cadmeia of Thebes. There were two gates on the west side, and as many on the east." Cram.

PLAVIS, a river of Venetia, in Italy. For the northern half of its course it formed the boundary between Rhætia and Venetia, crossing the line and belonging wholly to the latter country, some distance south of Feltria. After entering Venetia, its course was south-east to the Adriatic, into which it discharged itself north of the Portus Venetus. It is now the Piava.

POGON, a harbour of the Trœzeneans on the coast of the Peloponnesus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Trœzene, as the beard (πωγων) does from the chin. Strab. 8.—Mela, 2.

POLA, a city of Istria, founded by the Colchians, and afterwards made a Roman colony, and called Pietas Julia. The Colchian origin of this place belongs to the fable by which the Absyrtides are supposed to have derived their name from the unfortunate brother of Medea. It was by far the most important place in Histria. Plin. 3, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 1 and 5.

POLEMONIUM, now Vatija, a town of Pontus, at the east of the mouth of the Thermodon.

There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric king of the Goths, about the 403d year of the Christian era, in which the former, according to some, obtained the victory. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Suet. Tib. 37.—Sil. 8, v. 598.—Cic. 11, Fam. 13.——II. A town of Majorca. Plin. & Mela.——III. of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44, l. 41, c. 27.

POMETIA, POMETII, and POMETIA SUESSA. Vid. Suessa.

POMPEII, or, according to the Greek form, Pompeia, a city of Campania. "Tradition ascribed the origin of Pompeii, as well as that of Herculaneum, to Hercules; and like that city, it was in turn occupied by the Oscans, Etruscans, Samnites, and Romans. At the instigation of the Samnites, Pompeii and Herculaneum took an active part in the Social war, but were finally reduced by Sylla. In the general peace which followed, Pompeii obtained the rights of a municipal town, and became also a military colony, at the head of which was Publius Sylla nephew of the dictator. Other colonies appear to have been subsequently sent here under Augustus and Nero. In the reign of the latter, a bloody affray occurred at Pompeii during the exhibition of a fight of gladiators, between the inhabitants of that town and those of Nuceria, in which many lives were lost. The Pompeiani were in consequence deprived of these shows for ten years, and several individuals were banished. Shortly after we hear of the destruction of a considerable portion of the city by an earthquake. Of the more complete catastrophe, which buried Pompeii under the ashes of Vesuvius, we have no positive account; but it is reasonably conjectured that it was caused by the famous eruption under the reign of Titus. The ruins of Pompeii were accidentally discovered in 1748; consequently long after the time of Cluverius." Cram. "In other times," says Eustace, "and in other places, one single edifice, a temple, a theatre, a tomb, that had escaped the wreck of ages, would have enchanted us; nay, an arch, the remnant of a wall, even one solitary column, was beheld with veneration; but to discover a single ancient house, the abode of a Roman in his privacy, the scene of his domestic hours, was an object of fond, but hopeless longing. Here, not a temple, nor a theatre, nor a column, nor a house but a whole city rises before us, untouched, unaltered, the very same as it was eighteen hundred years ago, when inhabited by Romans. We range through the same streets, tread the very same pavement, behold the same walls, enter the same doors, and repose in the same apartments. We are surrounded by the same objects, and out of the same windows we contemplate the same scenery. While you are wandering through the abandoned rooms, you may, without any great effort of imagination, expect to meet some of the former inhabitants, or perhaps the master of the house himself, and almost feel like intruders who dread the appearance of any of the family. In the streets you are afraid of turning a corner, lest you should jostle a passenger; and on entering a house, the least sound startles, as if the proprietor was coming out of the back apartments. The traveller may long indulge the illusion, for not a voice is heard, not even the sound of a foot to disturb the loneliness of the place, or to interrupt his reflections."

POMPEIOPŎLIS, I. a town of Cilicia, formerly called Soli. This city received its second name from Pompey, who established there such of the pirates of Cilicia as had been admitted to a capitulation in the war carried on against them by that general. D'Anville. It was situated on the river Lamus, near the mouth. Mela, 1, c. 13.——II. Another in Paphlagonia, originally called Eupatoria, which name was exchanged when Pompey conquered Mithridates.

POMPELO, a town of Spain, now Pompelona, the capital of Navarre. Plin. 1, c. 3.

PONS ÆLIUS, I. was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome. It was the second bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tiber. It is still to be seen, the largest and most beautiful in Rome.——II. Æmylius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublicius, because built with wood (sublicæ). It was raised by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and solemnity by the Roman priests. It was rebuilt with stones by Æmylius Lepidus, whose name it assumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all with white marble. It was the last of all the bridges of Rome, in following the course of the river, and some vestiges of it may still be seen.——III.

Aniensis, was built across the river Anio, about three miles from Rome. It was built by the eunuch Narses, and called after him when destroyed by the Goths.——IV. Cestus, was rebuilt in the reign of Tiberius by a Roman called Cestius Gallus, from whom it received its name, and carried back from an island of the Tiber, to which the Fabricius conducted.——V. Aurelianus, was built with marble by the emperor Antoninus.——VI. Armoniensis, was built by Augustus, to join the Flaminian to the Æmylian road.——VII. Bajanus, was built at Baiæ in the sea by Caligula. It was supported by boats, and measured about six miles in length. ——VIII. Janicularis, received its name from its vicinity to mount Janiculum. It is still standing.——IX. Milvius, was about one mile from Rome. It was built by the censor Ælius Scaurus. It was near it that Constantine defeated Maxentius.——X. Fabricius, was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber.——XI. Gardius, was built by Agrippa.—— XII. Palatinus near mount Palatine, was also called Senatorius, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sybilline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible.—— XIII. Trajani, was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its bigness and magnificence.—The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other, extending in length above a mile. Some of the pillars are still standing. ——XIV. Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous.——XV. The largest single arched bridge known is over the river Elaver in France, called Pons Veteris Brivatis. The pillars stand on two rocks at the distance of 195 feet. The arch is 84 feet high above the water.——XVI. Suffragiorum, was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name because the populace were obliged to pass over it whenever they delivered their suffrages at the elections of magistrates and officers of the state. ——XVII. Tirensis, a bridge of Latium, between Arpinum and Minturnæ.——XVIII. Triumphalis, was on the way to the capital, and passed over by those who triumphed.—— XIX. Narniensis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Augustus, of stupendous height, 60 miles from Rome; one arch of it remains, about 100 feet high.

Pontia, now Ponza, an island off the coast of Latium. "From Livy we learn that it received a Roman colony A. U. C. 441, and that it obtained the thanks of the Roman senate for its zeal and fidelity in the second Punic war. It became afterwards the spot to which the victims of Tiberius and Caligula were secretly conveyed, to be afterwards despatched or doomed to a perpetual exile: among these might be numbered many Christian martyrs." Cram.

Pontinæ, or Pomptinæ Paludes, an extensive piece of marshy land in the country of the Volsci, extending south towards Minturnæ. "They derive their appellation from Pometium, a considerable town of the Volsci. Though this city was so opulent as to enable Tarquin to build the Capitol with its plunder, yet it had totally disappeared even before the time of Pliny. It is difficult to discover the precise date of the origin of these marshes. Homer, and after him Virgil, represent the abode of Circe as an island, and Pliny, alluding to Homer, quotes this opinion, and confirms it by the testimony of Theophrastus, who, in the year of Rome 440, gives this island a circumference of eighty stadia or about ten miles. It is not improbable that this vast plain, even now so little raised above the level of the sea, may, like the territory of Ravenna on the eastern coast, have once been covered by the waves. Whatever may have been its state in fabulous times, the same Pliny, relates, on the authority of a more ancient Latin writer, that at an early period of the Roman republic, the tract of country afterwards included in the marshes contained thirty-three cities, all of which gradually disappeared before the ravages of war, or the still more destructive influence of the increasing fens. These fens are occasioned by the quantity of water carried into the plain by numberless streams that rise at the foot of the neighbouring mountains, and for want of sufficient declivity creep sluggishly over the level space, and sometimes stagnate in pools, or lose themselves in the sands. Appius Claudius, about three hundred years before the Christian era, when employed in carrying his celebrated road across these marshes, made the first attempt to drain them; and his example was, at long intervals, followed by various consuls, emperors, and kings, down to the Gothic Theodoric inclusively. Of the methods employed by Appius, and afterwards by the consul Cethegus, we know little; though not the road only, but the traces of certain channels dug to draw the water from it, and mounds raised to protect it from sudden swells of water, are traditionally ascribed to the former. Julius Cæsar is said to have resolved in his mighty mind a design worthy of himself; of turning the course of the Tyber from Ostia, and carrying it through the Pomptine territory and marshes to the sea at Terracina. This grand project, which existed only in the mind of the Dictator, perished with him, and gave way to the more moderate but more practicable plan of Augustus, who endeavoured to carry off the superfluous waters by opening a canal all along the Via Appia from Forum Appii to the grove of Feronia. It was customary to embark on this canal at night-time, as Strabo relates and Horace practised; because the vapours that arise from the swamps are less noxious during the coolness of the night than in the heat of the day. The canal opened by Augustus still remains, and is called the Cavata. Nerva resumed the task; and his glorious successor Trajan carried it on during ten years, and with so much activity that the whole extent of country from Treponti to Terracina was drained, and the Via Appia completely restored, in the third consulate of that emperor. Of the different popes who have revived this useful enterprise, Boniface II., Martin V., and Sixtus Quintus, carried it on with a vigour adequate to its importance, and with a magnificence worthy of the ancient Romans. The glory of finally terminating this grand undertaking, so often attempted and so often frustrated, was reserved for the late pontiff Pius VI. who immediately on his elevation to the papal throne turned his attention to the Pomptine marshes. His success was complete; this, however, must be understood upon the supposition that the canals of communication be kept open, and the beds of the streams be cleared. It is reported that since the last French invasion these necessary precautions have been neglected, and that the waters begin to stagnate again. But it is not to be understood that these marshes presented in every direction a dreary and forbidding aspect to the traveller or the sportsman who ranged over them. On the side towards the sea they are covered with extensive forests, that enclose and shade the lakes which border the coasts. These forests extend with little interruption from Ostia to the promontory of Circe, and consist of oak, ilex, bay, and numberless flowering shrubs." Eusiace.

Pontus, I. a country of Asia Minor, bounded north by the Euxine Sea; east by Armenia; south by Armenia Minor and Cappadocia; and west by Galatia and Paphlagonia; from which it was separated by the river Halys. "Pontus was a dismemberment from Cappadocia, as a separate satrapy under the kings of Persia, till it was erected into a kingdom about 300 years before the Christian era. The name of Leuco-Syri, or White Syrians, which was given to the Cappadocians, extended to a people who inhabited Pontus: and it is plainly seen that the term Pontus distinguished the maritime people from those who dwelt in the Mediterranean country. This great space, extending to Colchis, formed, under the Roman empire, two provinces: the one, encroaching on Paphlagonia on the side of Sinope, was distinguished by the term Prima, and afterwards by the name of Helenopontus, from Helen, mother of Constantine. The other was called Pontus Polemoniacus, from the name of Polemon, which had been that of a race of kings; the last of which made a formal cession of his state to Nero." D'Anville. It was divided into three parts according to Ptolemy. Pontus Galaticus, of which Amasia was the capital; Pontus Polemoniacus, from its chief town Polemonium; and Pontus Cappadocius, of which Tapezus was the capital. Continuing for a long time a mere satrapy of the Persian empire, from the accession of Darius Hystaspes to the Persian throne, when its government was bestowed upon Artabazes, one of the conspirators against Smerdis, it became at last an independent monarchy; and, under the rule of Mithridates, proved an enemy to Rome as formidable almost as Carthage had been in the better days of the republic. The kingdom of Pontus was in its most flourishing state under Mithridates the Great. When J. Cæsar had conquered it, it became a Roman province, though it was often governed by monarchs who were tributary to the power of Rome. Under the emperors a regular governor was always appointed over it. Pontus produced castors, highly valued among the ancients. Amasea may be considered the capital of the Helenopontus, and was the most considerable of the cities of Pontus. The rivers of this country deserving to be specially enumerated, were the Iris, flowing nearly north through the whole width of the widest part; the Lycus and the Scylax, its principal branches; the Halys on the western boundary; and the Thermodon, east of the Iris, remarkable not so much for its length as for its connexion with the traditionary abode of the Amazons. Towards Cappadocia, a range of high mountains skirt the whole extent of Pontus, and distinguish the southern region as a rugged country from the districts on the coast, which was a level region and called Phanarea. A great number of different tribes made up the Pontic population. "There is mention in Xenophon's retreat, of the Drylæ as adjacent to Trebisond. These nations received the general name of Chalybes, from being occupied in the forging of iron. They are mentioned by Strabo under the name of Chaldæi; and all this country, distributed into deep valleys and precipitate mountains, is still called Keldir. The character of the people corresponded with the face of the country as above described; which was composed of Hepta-cometæ, or seven communities." D'Anville. Pontus as a diocese under the distribution of Constantine, included Bithynia, Galatia, and the Armenias, the capital being Neo-Cæsarea, towards the mountains and the country of the Chalybes or Chaldæi. Virg. G. 1, v. 58.—Mela, 1, c. 1 and 19.—Strab. 12.—Cic. pro Leg.—Man.—Appian.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.——II. Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a consul who made a road which led to Pisa, all along the coast of Etruria.——III. Asinaria, led to mount Cœlius. It received its name from the family of the Asinii.——IV. Carmentalis, was at the foot of the capitol, built by Romulus. ——XIV. Collina, called also Quirinalis, Agonensis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a spear into the city. It is to be observed, that at the death of Romulus there were only three or four gates at Rome, but the number was increased, and in the time of Pliny there were 37, when the circumference of the walls was 13 miles and 200 paces.

Potidæa, a town of Macedonia, situate in the peninsula of Pallene. It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and became tributary to the Athenians, from whom Philip of Macedonia took it. The conqueror gave it to the Olynthians to render them more attached to his interest. Cassander repaired and enlarged it, and called it Cassandria, a name which it still preserves, and which has given occasion to Livy to say, that Cassander was the original founder of that city. Liv. 44, c. 11.—Demosth. Olynth.—Strab. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 23.—Mela, 2, c. 2.

Potnīæ, I. a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple. The Potnians having once murdered the priest of the god, were ordered by the oracle, to appease his resentment, yearly to offer on his altars a young man. This unnatural sacrifice was continued for some years, till Bacchus himself substituted a goat, from which circumstance he received the appellation of Ægobolus and Ægophagus. There was here a fountain, whose waters made horses run mad as soon as they were touched. There were also here certain goddesses called Potniades, on whose altars, in a grove sacred to Ceres and Proserpine, victims were sacrificed. It was also usual, at a certain season of the year, to conduct into the grove young pigs, which were found the following year in the groves of Dodona. The mares of Potniæ destroyed their master Glaucus, son of Sisyphus. (Vid. Glaucus.) Paus. 9, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 267.—Ælian. V. H. 15, c. 25.——II. Propontis, a sea which has a communication with the Euxine, by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Ægean by the Hellespont. The name designates its position in relation to that of the Pontus Euxinus, being compounded of προ and Ποντος. "An isle which it includes, but nearer to Asia than Europe, and of which the modern name is Marmora, communicates this name to the Propontis, which is also called the White Sea, in contradistinction to the name of Black Sea, which is given to the Euxine." D'Anville.

Prosymna, "a town of Argolis, which Strabo places near Midea, and which contained a temple of Juno. The vestiges of this town are to be seen on a hill near the sea, and above the port of Tolone, which it overlooks; those of Midea are more inland; near the monastery of Agios Adrianos, where there is a Palæo Castro on a bold rock, the walls are of ancient masonry." Cram.

Prusa, one of the principal cities of Bithynia, situated at the foot of mount Olympus, on the northern side. "This city, afterwards signalized by the residence of the Ottoman sultans before the taking of Constantinople, still preserves its name, although the Turks, by their pronunciation, change the P into B, and, refusing to begin a word with two consonants, call it Bursa." D'Anville.

Psaphis, "a demus belonging to the tribe

Eantis, as we learn from an inscription cited by Spon, to the north of Rhamnus. Strabo also states that it was situated near Oropus. The vestiges of Psaphis remain undiscovered, but it is probable they would be found near the present town of Marcopuli." Cram.

Psophis, "placed by Pausanias at the foot of the chain of mount Erymanthus, from whence descended a river of the same name which flowed near the town, and, after receiving another small stream called Aroanius, joined the Alpheus on the borders of Elis. Psophis was apparently a city of great antiquity, having previously borne the names of Erymanthus and Phegea. At the time of the Social war it was in the possession of the Eleans, on whose territory it bordered, as well as on that of the Achæans; and, as it was a place of considerable strength, proved a source of great annoyance to the latter people. Philip, king of Macedon, then in alliance with the Achaians, after defeating the Eleans near Orchomenus, advanced against Psophis, and reaching it in three days from Caphyæ, proceeded to assault the town, notwithstanding the great strength of its position and the presence of a numerous garrison. Such was the suddenness and vigour of the attack, that after a short resistance the Eleans fled to the citadel, leaving the assailants in possession of the town. The acropolis also not long after capitulated. After this success, Philip made over the conquered town to the Achæans, who garrisoned it with their own troops. In the time of Pausanias, Psophis presented nothing worthy of notice, but the temple of Erymanthus, the tomb of Alcmæon, and the ruins of a temple once sacred to Venus Erycina. The territory of this city extended as far as a spot named Seiræ, near the Ladon, where that of Clitor commenced. The remains of Psophis are to be seen near the khan of Tripotamia, so called from the junction of three rivers. Pouqueville observed there several vestiges of the ancient fortifications, the foundations of two temples, a theatre, and the site of the acropolis." Cram.

Pteleum, "a town of Thessaly, distant, according to Artemidorus, one hundred and ten stadia from Alos. Homer ascribes it to Protesilaus, together with the neighbouring town of Atron. Diodorus notices the fact of this city having been declared free by Demetrius Poliorcetes when at war with Cassander. In Livy, it is nearly certain that for Pylleon we should read Pteleon, as this place is mentioned in connexion with Antron. Antiochus landed here with the intention of carrying on the war against the Romans in Greece. Elsewhere the same historian informs us that Pteleon, having been deserted by its inhabitants, was completely destroyed by the Roman consul Licinius. Pliny speaks of a forest named Pteleon, without noticing the town. The ruins of Pteleum probably exist near the present village of Ptelio, though none were observed by Mr Dodwell on that site." Cram.

Ptolemais, a town of Thebais in Egypt, called after the Ptolemies, who beautified it. There was also another city of the same name in the territories of Cyrene. Putĕoli, "a town of Greek origin, and first called Dicæarchia. It was erected by the inhabitants of Cumæ as a sea-port, and is by some supposed to have derived its original appellation from the excellence of its government, an advantage which few colonies have ever enjoyed. However, it owes its present name, and indeed its fame and prosperity, to the Romans, who, about two centuries before the Christian era, fortified it, and made it the emporium of the commerce of the east. Its situation as a seaport is indeed unrivalled. It stands on a point that juts out a little into the sea, nearly in the centre of a fine bay, called from it Puteolano or Puzzolano. Its prominence forms a natural port, if a port can be wanting in a bay so well covered by the surrounding coasts, and divided into so many creeks and harbours. It is easy to guess what the animation and splendour of Puteoli must have been at the time when the riches of the east were poured into its bosom, and when its climate, baths, and beauty, allured the most opulent Romans to its vicinity. Commerce has long since forsaken it; the attraction of its climate and its situation still remain, but operate very feebly on the feelings of a people little given to rural enjoyments. Its population, which formerly spread over the neighbouring hills, and covered them with public and private edifices, is now confined to the little prominent point which formed the ancient port; and all the magnificence of antiquity has either been undermined by time, demolished by barbarism, or levelled in the dust by earthquakes. Vestiges however remain, shapeless indeed and deformed, but numerous and vast enough to give some idea of its former extent and grandeur. In the square stands a beautiful marble pedestal, with basso relievos on its pannels, representing the fourteen cities of Asia Minor, which had been destroyed by an earthquake and rebuilt by Tiberius. It supported a statue of that emperor, erected by the same cities as a monument of their gratitude. Each city is represented by a figure bearing in its hand some characteristic emblem. The cathedral is supposed to stand on the ruins of a temple, and is undoubtedly built in a great degree of ancient materials, as appears by the blocks of marble which in many places form its walls." Eustace.

Puticuli, pits dug in the Campus Esquilinus, in which the dead bodies of the lower orders were buried in the early days of Rome.

"These holes were called puticuli, from their resemblance to wells, or more probably from the stench which issued from them in consequence of this practice." (Cram.) Vid. Campus Esquilinus.

PYDNA, a city of Macedonia, "celebrated for the decisive victory gained by P. Æmilius over the Macedonian army under Perseus, which put an end to that ancient empire. The earliest mention of this town is in Scylax, who styles it a Greek city, from which it appears to have been at that time independent of the Macedonian princes. Thucydides speaks of an attack made upon it by the Athenians before the Peloponnesian war. It was afterwards taken by Archelaus king of Macedon, who removed its site twenty stadia from the sea, as Diodorus Siculus asserts; but Thucydides states, that it had been long before that period in the possession of Alexander the son of Amyntas, and that Themistocles sailed from thence on his way to Persia. After the death of Archelaus, Pydna again fell into the hands of the Athenians, but the circumstances of this change are not known to us; Mr. Mitford is inclined to think it occurred during the reign of Philip, and makes the first rupture between that sovereign and the Athenians the consequence of that event; but this I believe is unsupported by any direct testimony; all that we know is, that Athens was at some time or other in possession of Pydna and the adjoining towns, but that it was afterwards taken from them by Philip, and given to Olynthus. The next fact relative to Pydna, which is recorded in history, is posterior to the reign of Alexander the Great, whose mother Olympias was here besieged by Cassander; and all hopes of relief being cut off, by an entrenchment having been made round the town from sea to sea, famine at length compelled Olympias to surrender, when she was thrown into prison, and soon after put to death. Livy speaks of two small rivers which fall into the sea near Pydna, the Æson and Leucus, and a mountain named Olocrus; their modern appellations are unknown to us. The Epitomizer of Strabo says, that in his time it was called Kitros, as likewise the Scholiast to Demosthenes; and this name is still attached to the spot at the present day. Dr. Clarke observed at Kitros a vast tumulus, which he considered with much probability, as marking the site of the great battle fought in these plains." Cram.

PYGMÆI, a nation of dwarfs, in the extremest parts of India, or, according to others, in Æthiopia. Some authors affirm, that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by Gerana, a princess, who was changed into a crane for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Homer. Il. 3.—Strab. 7.—*Arist. PYLÆ. The word Pylæ, which signifies gates, was often applied by the Greeks to any straits or passages which opened a communication between one country and another, such as the straits of Thermopylæ, of Persia, Hyrcania, &c. ——CASPIÆ. Vid. Caspiæ Pylæ.——CILICIÆ. Vid. Cilicia.

PYLOS, I. a town of the province of Elis, about 80 stadia to the east of the city of that name. It "disputed with two other towns of the same name the honour of being the capital of Nestor's dominions; these were Pylos of Triphylia and the Messenian Pylus, of which we have yet to speak. Pausanias writes that the Elean city was originally founded by Pylus, son of Cleson, king of Megara; but that having been destroyed by Hercules, it was afterwards restored by the Eleans. Diodorus says that in the expedition of the Lacedæmonians against Elis, under their king Pausanias, they encamped close to Pylos, of which they made themselves masters. He also states that it was seventy stadia from Elis; but Pausanias reckons eighty. Pliny places it at a distance of twelve miles from Olympia. This town was deserted and in ruins when Pausanias made the tour of Elis. We collect from Strabo that Pylos was at the foot of mount Pholoe, and between the heads of the rivers Peneus and Selleis. This site agrees sufficiently with a spot name Portes, where there are vestiges of antiquity under mount Mauro bouni, which must be the Pholoe of the ancients. Near Pylos flowed the Ladon, a small stream that discharged itself into the Peneus. In modern maps it is called Dervicha or Tcheliber." Cram.——II. TRYPHILIACUS, another town of the same province, "regarded by Strabo with great probability as the city of Nestos, is placed by that geographer at a distance of thirty stadia from the coast, and near a small river once called Amathus and Pamisus, but subsequently Mamaus and Arcadicus. The epithet ἡμαθόεις, applied by Homer to the Pylian territory, was referred to the first of these names. Notwithstanding its ancient celebrity, this city is scarcely mentioned in later times. Pausanias even does not appear to have been aware of its existence. Strabo, affirms, that, on the conquest of Triphylia by the Eleans, they annexed its territory to the neighbouring town of Lepreum. The vestiges of Pylos are thought by Sir W. Gell to correspond with a Palaio Castro situated at Piskini, or Pischini, about two miles from the coast. Near this is a village called Sarene, perhaps a corruption of Arene." Cram.——III. MESSENIACUS, a city on the Messenian coast, at the foot of mount Ægaleus, "regarded by many as the capital of Nestor's dominions, and at a later period celebrated for the brilliant successes obtained there by the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war. It is necessary, however, to distinguish between the ancient city of Pylos and the fortress which the Athenian troops, under Demosthenes, erected on the spot termed Coryphasium by the Lacedæmonians. Strabo affirms, that when the town of Pylos was destroyed, part of the inhabitants retired to Coryphasium: but Pausanias makes no distinction between the old and new town, simply stating that Pylos, founded by Pylus son of Cleson, was situated on the promontory of Coryphasium. To Pylus he has also attributed the foundation of Pylos in Elis, whither that chief retired on his expulsion from Messenia by Neleus and the Thessalian Pelasgi. He adds, that a temple of Minerva Coryphasia was to be seen near the town, as well as the house of Nestor, whose monument was likewise shewn there. Strabo, on the contrary, has been at considerable pains to prove that the Pylos of Homer was not in Messenia, but in Triphylia. From Homer's description he observes, it is evident that Nestor's dominions were traversed by the Alpheus; and from his account of Telemachus's voyage, when returning to Ithaca, it is also clear that the Pylos of the Odyssey could neither be the Messenian nor the Elean city; since the son of Ulysses is made to pass Cruni, Chalcis, Phea, and the coast of Elis, which he could not have done, if he had set out from the last-mentioned place; if from the former, the navigation would have been much longer than from the description we are led to suppose, since we must reckon 400 stadia from the Messenian to the Triphylian Pylos only, besides which, we may presume the poet would in that case have named the Neda, the Acidon, and other intervening rivers and places. Again; from Nestor's account of his battle with the Epeans, he must have been separated from that people by the Alpheus, a statement which cannot be reconciled with the position of the Elean Pylos. If, on the other hand, we suppose him to allude to the Messenian city, it will appear very improbable, that Nestor should make an incursion into the country of the Epei, and return from thence with a vast quantity of cattle which he had to convey such a distance. His pursuit of the enemy as far as Buprasium and the Olenian rock, after their defeat, is equally incompatible with the supposition that he marched from Messenia. In fact, it is not easy to understand how there could have been any communication between the Epeans and the subjects of Nestor, if they had been so far removed from each other. But as all the circumstances mentioned by Homer agree satisfactorily with the situation of the Triphylian city, we are necessarily induced to regard it as the Pylos of Nestor. Such are the chief arguments advanced by Strabo in support of his opinion; and they must, we imagine, be deemed conclusive in deciding the question. At the same time it must be confessed, that there are still some obscure points in the Homeric geography relative to Nestor's dominions which require elucidation, notwithstanding the attention bestowed upon the subject by Strabo. The sites of Arene and Thryoessa in particular are very dubious; and thus the whole account of Nestor's operations against the Epeans is involved in uncertainty. We must now endeavour to identify the positions of Pylos and Coryphasium with those places which are known to us from maps and the information conveyed by travellers in modern Greece. We learn from Pausanias's history of the Messenians that Pylos was a sea-port town, and Thucydides affirms that it was the most frequented haven of that people. It was nearly closed by the island of Sphacteria, which, like the islet Rhenea with respect to Delos, stood in front of the port. According to Thucydides, it had two entrances, one on each side of the island, but of unequal breadth; the narrowest being capable of admitting only two vessels abreast. The harbour itself must have been very capacious for two such considerable fleets as those of Athens and Sparta to engage within it. These characteristics sufficiently indicate the port or bay of Navarino and the scene of those most interesting events of the Peloponnesian war, which are detailed in the fourth book of Thucydides; but antiquaries are not agreed as to the exact position which should be assigned to Coryphasium; D'Anville fixes it at New Navarino, on the south side of the harbour, but Barbié du Bocage at Old Navarino on the opposite or north side of the bay. Now we learn from Pausanias, that Pylos or Coryphasium was at least 100 stadia from Methone, or Modon, but from the best maps it appears not more than fifty stadia from the latter to New Navarino, while the distance to Old Navarino, is nearly the same as that stated by the Greek writer; which seems conclusive in favour of Barbié du Bocage. The point of land on which Old Navarino is situated, answers also better to the Coryphasium Promontorium of Pausanias. Sir W. Gell, in his Itinerary does not seem to have noticed any antiquities at Navarino, but he calls the old town Pylos. Some vestiges are laid down in Lapie's map above the coast, and nearly in the centre of the bay, on a spot named Pila, which probably answers to the ancient Pylos. The fort erected by the Athenians could not have been Coryphasium itself, since Thucydides represents it as a deserted place, but it must have stood on the promontory facing the open sea, a circumstance which is likewise applicable to Old Navarino. It is well known that the Athenians maintained this position against all the efforts of the Spartans; and by placing there a Messenian garrison, occasioned a serious annoyance to that people during the fifteen years it remained in their possession." Cram.

Pyramides. "On the west bank of the Nile, we find the city of Djizeh, pleasantly shaded by sycamores, date trees, and olives. To the west of this city stand the three pyramids, which, by their unequalled size and celebrity, have eclipsed all those numerous structures of the same form, which are scattered over Egypt. The height of the first, which is ascribed to Cheops, is 447 feet, that is, forty feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and 133 higher than St. Paul's in London. The length of the base is 720 feet. The antiquity of these erections, and the purpose for which they were formed, have furnished matter of much ingenious conjecture and dispute, in the absence of certain information. It has been supposed that they were intended for scientific purposes, such as that of establishing the proper length of the cubit, of which they contain in breadth and height a certain number of multiples. They were, at all events, constructed on scientific principles, and give evidence of a certain progress in astronomy; for their sides are accurately adapted to the four cardinal points. Whether they were applied to sepulchral uses, and intended as sepulchral monuments, had been doubted; but the doubts have been dispelled by the recent discoveries made by means of laborious excavations. The drifting sand had, in the course of ages, collected round their base to a considerable height, and had raised the surface of the country above the level which it had when they were constructed. The entrance to the chambers had also been, in the finishing, shut up with large stones, and built round so as to be uniform with the rest of the exterior. The largest, called the pyramid of Cheops, had been opened, and some chambers discovered in it, but not so low as the base, till Mr. Davison, British consul at Algiers, explored it in 1763, when accompanying Mr. Wortley Montague to Egypt. He discovered a room before unknown, and descended the three successive wells to a depth of 155 feet. Captain Caviglia, master of a merchant vessel, has lately pursued the principal oblique passage 200 feet farther down than any former explorer, and found it communicating with the bottom of the well. This circumstance creating a circulation of air, he proceeded twenty-eight feet farther, and found a spacious room sixty-six feet by twenty-seven, but of unequal height, under the centre of the pyramid, supposed by Mr. Salt to have been the place for containing the theca, or sarcophagus, though now none is found in it. The room is thirty feet above the level of the Nile. The upper chamber, 35 1-2 feet by 17 1-4, and 18 4-5 high, still contains a sarcophagus. Herodotus erred in supposing that the water of the Nile could ever surround the tomb of Cheops. In six pyramids which have been opened, the principal passage preserves the same inclination of 26° to the horizon, being directed to the polar star. M. Belzoni, after some acute observations on the appearances connected with the second pyramid, or that of Cephrenes, succeeded in opening it. The stones, which had constituted the coating, (by which the sides of most of the pyramids which now rise in steps had been formed into plain and smooth surfaces,) lay in a state of compact and ponderous rubbish, presenting a formidable obstruction; but somewhat looser in the centre of the front, showing traces of operations for exploring it, in an age posterior to the erection. On the east side of the pyramid he discovered the foundation of a large temple, connected with a portico appearing above ground, which had induced him to explore that part. Between this and the pyramid, from which it was fifty feet distant, a way was cleared through rubbish forty feet in height, and a pavement was found at the bottom, which is supposed to extend quite round the pyramid; but there was no appearance of any entrance. On the north side, though the same general appearance presented itself after the rubbish was cleared away, one of the stones, though nicely adapted to its place, was discovered to be loose; and when it was removed, a hollow passage was found, evidently forced by some former enterprising explorer, and rendered dangerous by the rubbish which fell from the roof, it was therefore abandoned. Reasoning by analogy from the entrance of the first pyramid, which is to the east of the centre on the north side, he explored in that situation, and found at a distance of thirty feet the true entrance. After incredible perseverance and labour, he found numerous passages all cut out of the solid rock, and a chamber forty-six feet three inches by sixteen feet three, and twenty-three feet six inches high, containing a sarcophagus in a corner surrounded by large blocks of granite. When opened, after great labour, this was found to contain bones, which mouldered down when touched, and from specimens afterwards examined, turned out to be the bones of an ox. Human bones were also found in the same place. An Arabic inscription, made with charcoal, was on the wall, signifying that "the place had been opened by Mohammed Ahmed, lapicide, attended by the Master Othman, and the king Alij Mohammed," supposed to be the Ottoman emperor, Mahomet I. in the beginning of the fifteenth century. It was observed, that the rock surrounding the pyramid on the north and west sides, was on a level with the upper part of the chamber. It is evidently cut away all round, and the stones taken from it were most probably applied to the erection of the pyramid. There are many places in the neighbourhood where the rock has been evidently quarried, so that there is no foundation for the opinion formerly common, and given by Herodotus, that the stones had been brought from the east side of the Nile, which is only probable as applied to the granite brought from Syene. The operations of Belzoni have thrown light on the manner in which the pyramids were constructed, as well as the purpose for which they were intended. That they were meant for sepulchres cannot admit of a doubt. Their obliquity is so adjusted as to make the north side coincide with the obliquity of the sun's rays at the summer solstice. The Egyptians connected astronomy with their religious ceremonies, and their funerals; for zodiacs are found even in their tombs. It is remarkable that no hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in or about the pyramids, as in the other tombs, a circumstance which is supposed to indicate the period of their construction to have been prior to the invention of that mode of writing, though some think that the difference may be accounted for by a difference in the usages of different places and ages. Belzoni, however, says that he found some hieroglyphics in one of the blocks forming a mausoleum to the west of the first pyramid. The first pyramid seems never to have been coated, and there is not the slightest mark of any coating. The second pyramid showed that the coating had been executed from the summit downward, as it appeared that it had not in this instance been finished to the bottom. The following are the dimensions of the second pyramid: the basis, 684 feet; the central line down the front from the apex to the basis, 568; the perpendicular, 456; coating from the top to where it ends, 140. These dimensions being considerably greater than those usually assigned even to the first or largest pyramid, are to be accounted for by those of Belzoni being taken from the base as cleared from sand and rubbish, while the measurements of the first pyramid given by others, only applied to it as measured from the level of the surrounding sand." Malte-Brun.

PYRÊNÆI, a mountain, or a long ridge of high mountains, which separate Gaul from Spain, and extend from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean Sea. They receive their name from Pyrene the daughter of Bebrycius, (Vid. Pyrene,) or from the fire (πυρ) which once raged there for several days. This fire was originally kindled by shepherds, and so intense was the heat which it occasioned, that all the silver mines of the mountains were melted, and ran down in large rivulets. This account is justly deemed fabulous by Strabo. Diod. 5.—Strab. 3. Mela, 2, c. 6.—Ital. 3, v. 415.—Liv. 21, c. 60.—Plut. 4, c. 20.

Ravenna, an important city of Cisalpine Gaul, on the Utis, not far from the place at which that river discharged itself into the Hadriaticum Mare. "Strabo informs us, that Ravenna was situated in the midst of marshes, and built entirely on wooden piles. A communication was established between the different parts of the town by means of bridges and boats. But the noxious air arising from the stagnant waters was so purified by the tide, that Ravenna was considered by the Romans as a very healthy place, in proof of which they sent gladiators there to be trained and exercised. We are not informed at what period Ravenna received a Roman colony, but it is not improbable, from a passage in Cicero, that this event took place under the consulship of Cn. Pompeius Strabo. Ravenna became the great naval station of the Romans on the Adriatic in the latter times of the republic, a measure which seems to have originated with Pompey the Great. It was from this place that Cæsar set forward on that march which brought him to the Rubicon, and involved his country and the world in civil war. The old port of Ravenna was situated at the mouth of the river Bedesis, il Ronco. But Augustus caused a new one to be constructed at the entrance of the little river Candianus into the sea, and about three miles from Ravenna. He established a communication between this harbour and a branch of the Po, by means of a canal which was called Fossa Augusti; and he also made a causeway to connect the port and city, which obtained the name of Via Cæsaris. As the new harbour from thenceforth became the usual station for the fleet, it received the distinguishing appellation of Portus Classis, a name which still subsists in that of a well-known monastery near the modern town of Ravenna. Ravenna continued to flourish as a naval station long after the reign of Augustus; and after the fall of the western empire, it became the seat of a separate government, known by the name of the exarchate of Ravenna." Cram. With this dignity Ravenna played a conspicuous part in the ages of the Lombard rule, when the fate of Italy, as yet undecided, seemed to wait the issue of the contest between the barbarian power in the north, the papal pretensions in the south, and the claims of the imperial master of the east. It was founded by a colony of Thessalians, or, according to others, of Sabines. It is now fallen from its former grandeur, and is a wretched town situate at the distance of about four miles from the sea, and surrounded with swamps and marshes. Strab. 5.—Suet. in Aug. 49.—Plin. 36, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Martial. 3, ep. 93, v. 8, &c.

Reate, a town of the Sabines, between the rivers Velinus and Telonius, just above their confluence. Having scarcely undergone any change, it "holds a distinguished place among the Sabine towns, and in the antiquity of its origin is equalled by few of the cities of Italy, since, at the most remote period to which the records of that country extend, it is reported to have been the first seat of the Umbri, who have, it appears to us, the best claim to be considered as the Aborigines of Italy. It was here likewise that the Arcadian Pelasgi probably fixed their abode, and by intermixing with the earlier natives, gave rise to those numerous tribes, known to the Greeks by the name of Opici, and subsequently to the Romans under the various appellations of Latins, Oscans, and Campanians; these subsequently drove the Siculi from the plains, and occupied in their stead the shores of the Tyrrhenian Sea. If we may credit Silius Italicus, Reate derived its name from Rhea, the Latin Cybele. From Cicero we learn that it was only a præfectura in his time: from Suetonius we collect that it was a municipal town. Reate was particularly celebrated for its excellent breed of mules, and still more so for that of its asses, which sometimes fetched the enormous price of 60,000 sestertii, about 484*l.* of our money. The valley of the Velinus, in which this city was situated, was so delightful as to merit the appellation of Tempe; and from their dewy freshness, its meadows obtained the name of Rosei Campi. It was however subject to inundations from the Velinus, Velino, which river forms some small lakes before it joins the Nar above Terni: the chief of these was called the Lacus Velinus, now Lago di Piè di Lago. The drainage of the stagnant waters produced by the occasional overflow of these lakes, and of the river, was first attempted by Curius Dentatus, the conqueror of the Sabines: he caused a channel to be made for the Velinus, through which the waters of that river were carried into the Nar, over a precipice of several hundred feet. This is the celebrated fall of Terni, known in Italy by the name of Caduta delle Marmore." Cram.

Redŏnes, a nation among the Armorici, now the people of Rennes and St. Maloes, in Britany. Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 41.

Regillæ, or Regillum, a town in the country of the Sabines in Italy, about 20 miles from Rome, celebrated for a battle which was fought there, A. U. C. 258, between 24,000 Romans, and 40,000 Etrurians, who were headed by the Tarquins. The Romans obtained the victory, and scarce 10,000 of the enemy escaped from the field of battle. Castor and Pollux, according to some accounts, were seen mounted on white horses, and fighting at the head of the Roman army. Liv. 2, 16.—Dionys. Hal. 2.—Plut. in Cor.—Val. Max. 1.—Flor. 1.—Suet. Tib. 1.

Regillus, a small lake of Latium, whose waters fall into the Anio at the east of Rome. The dictator Posthumius defeated the Latin army near it. Liv. 2. c. 19.

Regium Lepidum, a town of Modena, now Regio, at the south of the Po. Plin. 3, c. 15. —Cic. 12, fam. 5, l. 13, ep. 7.

Remi, a nation of Gaul, whose principal town, Duricortorium, is now Rheims, in the north of Champagne. Plin. 4, c. 17.—Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 5.

Resæna, a town of Mesopotamia, famous for the defeat of Sapor by Gordian. The name of Theodosiopolis was afterwards conferred upon Resæna, either in honour of that emperor, or as a mark of his favour; but the original name, derived in the language of the people from the nature of the surrounding district, watered by numberless springs, has been retained in the present appellation of Ros-Ain. It stood on the Chaboras, between the mountain regions of Mygdonia and Osroene.

Rha, the greatest river of Europe, but little known to the ancients, whose acquaintance with the country through which it flowed was founded on the erroneous opinion of a few geographers, and not by intercourse with the inhabitants. Of the knowledge which the ancients actually possessed, some notion may be collected from D'Anville, who also presents an etymology of the ancient name. "It is after Ptolemy alone that we can mention the Rha, great as it is. Antiquity may be supposed to have been very little informed of these countries, when we see Strabo, and Pliny who is still later, taking the Caspian Sea for a gulf formed by the Northern Ocean: but it must be admitted that Herodotus, in a remoter age, had a more correct idea of it. As to the name of Rha, it appears to be an appellative term, having affinity with Rhea, or Reka; which, in the Sarmatian or Sclavonian language, signifies a river: and from the Russian denomination of Velika Reka, or the Great River, appears to be formed the name of Volga. In the Byzantine and other writers of the middle age, this is called Atel, or Etel; a term, in many northern languages, signifying the quality great or illustrious. The approximation of the Tanais to this river, before it changes its course to the Palus, is the occasion of the erroneous opinion of some authors that it is only an emanation of the Rha taking a different route." The actual course of the river, and the signification of its modern name are thus given by Malte-Brun. "The Wolga, or the largest river in Europe, flows through that country into the Caspian Sea. A rivulet rises in the forests of the Waldaic chain, in the neighbourhood of Wolchino-Werchovia, crosses the lakes Oselok, Piana, and Wolga, receives the waters of the lake Seliger, and becomes navigable near Rjev-Wolodomirow, at which place its breadth is not less than 95 feet. It then flows eastward to Kasan, where it is enlarged by the Kama, a very great river, turns to the south, and makes apparently for the sea of Azof; but unfortunately for the commerce of the Russians, its course is determined by the position of the Wolgaic hills, and it discharges itself into the Caspian Sea. Before it receives the Kama, its breadth is upwards of 600 feet, and it is more than 1200 after its junction with that river. It encompasses many islands in the vicinity of Astrakan, and its width there is about 14 English miles. The depth of its current varies from seven to eighteen feet. Its water, though not good, is drinkable, and it abounds with several varieties of the sturgeon and different kinds of fish. The course of the Wolga is regular and calm, but the river has made a passage for itself near Nischnei-Novgorod, and by the sinking of the ground thus occasioned, several large buildings in the town have been overturned. The Wolga is speedily swollen by excessive rains and by the melting of snow, so that the streams are diverted into the channels of the feeders, and the flux of their waters is thus impeded. The river, during part of the winter, is covered with ice, but there are always many apertures in the south, from which currents of air escape; hence they are termed the lungs of the Wolga. The polumna often change their position, and travellers are thus exposed to imminent danger. The Wolga encloses the central ridge of Russia, and receives the streams of the Oka, the principal river in that fertile region; it communicates in the upper parts of its course by the canal of Wyschnei-Wolotchok with the lakes Ladoga and Newa; lastly, the Kama conveys to it all the waters of eastern Russia. The word Wolga, says M. Georgi, signifies great in the Sarmatian, it might have been as well had the writer explained what is meant by the Sarmatian language. If the old Slavonic, or rather the Proto-Slavonic, which was spoken by the vassal tribes of the ancient Scythians, be understood by that incorrect term, we think the etymology not unlikely, although its accuracy cannot now be ascertained. The Finnic tongues furnish us with a more easy explanation; Volgi signifies a valley, now the bed of the Wolga extends in the great valley of Russia. The Tartars called the Wolga the Ethele or Itel, which, according to some philologists, means liberal or profuse; according to others, merely the river. The last name is still retained by the Tartars under the form of Ichtil-gad. The most ancient designation is that of the Rha or Rhas, which has been thought a corruption of the Araxes, a river in Armenia, although the two words are radically different in the Armenian language.

The Morduates, a Finnic tribe, still term it the Rhaou, a name which in their dialect was probably expressive of rain water. All the etymologies are involved in the darkness of a remote antiquity."

RHACÔTIS, an ancient name of Alexandria in Egypt. Strab.—Paus. 5, c. 21.

RHÆTI, or RÆTI, an ancient and warlike nation of Etruria. They were driven from their native country by the Gauls, and went to settle on the other side of the Alps. Vid. Rhætia. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Justin. 20, c. 5.

RHÆTIA, a country of ancient Europe, and province of the Roman empire. It was bounded by the country of the Helvetii on the west, by Vindelicia on the north, by Noricum on the east, and on the south and south-east by Cisalpine Gaul. On no side were the limits of this province marked by any natural line of separation, except that a small portion of the northern boundary was indicated by the course of the Œnus. Within those limits are now comprehended, the Tyrol, the league of the Grisons, and the parts of Switzerland south-east of the Simplon, St. Gothard, &c. among which mountains the ancient Rhæti were scattered. "The sources and the course of the Rhine to its entrance into the lake to which the city of Constance communicates its name, the course of the Œnus, or the Inn, from its source to the point where it bounded Noricum, belonged to Rhætia; as did also the declivity of the Alps which regards the south, where Ticinus or the Tesin, Addua or the Adda, Athesis or the Adige, begin their courses. The Rhætia were a colony of the Tusci, or Tuscans, a civilized nation, established in this country when the Gauls came to invade Italy. This colony, becoming savage, and infesting Cisalpine Gaul, were subjugated under the reign of Augustus by Drusus. And because the Vindelici armed in favour of their neighbours, Tiberius sent a force that reduced them also to obedience. This double conquest formed a province called Rhætia, comprehending Vindelicia, without obliterating altogether the distinction. But in the multiplication that Dioclesian, and some emperors after him made of the provinces, Rhætia was divided into two, under the distinction of the first and second: a circumstance that caused Rhætia Proper and Vindelicia to reassume their primitive distinctions. The Lepontii inhabited the high Alps, whence flow the Rhine, the Rhone, and the Tesin; and the name of Leventina, which distinguishes among many valleys that through which the Tesin runs, is formed of the name of this nation, who on the other side extended in the Pennine valley, where they possessed Oscela, now Domo d'Usula." D'Anville. Besides the sources of the numerous rivers that rose in Rhætia, that province was distinguished geographically by its mountainous character, the Rhætian Alps forming no small portion, or rather, with the adjacent valleys, constituting the whole; and by the Alpine lakes, which in modern times are remarked and visited for their beauty. The country was occupied by numberless barbarous tribes, till reduced, and in some degree civilized, by the Romans. Among these the Lepontii, the Sarunetes, the Brigantii, the Vennones, and the Tridentini, may be specially noticed RHAMNUS, a town of Attica, famous for a temple of Amphiaraus, and a statue of the goddess Nemesis, who was from thence called Rhamnusia. This statue was made by Phidias, out of a block of Parian marble which the Persians intended as a pillar to be erected to commemorate their expected victory over Greece. Paus. 1.—Plin. 36.

RHAROS, or RHARIUM, a plain of Attica, where corn was first sown by Triptolemus. It received its name from the sower's father who was called Rharos. Paus. 1, c. 14 and 38.

RHEGIUM, now Rheggio, a town of Italy, in the country of the Brutii, opposite Messana in Sicily, where a colony of Messenians under Alcidamidas settled, B. C. 723. It was originally called Rhegium, and afterwards Rhegium Julium, to distinguish it from Rhegium Lepidi, a town of Cisalpine Gaul. Some suppose that it received its name from the Greek word ῥήγνυμι to break, because it is situate on the straits of Charybdis, which were formed when the island of Sicily, as it were, was broken and separated from the continent of Italy. This town has always been subject to great earthquakes, by which it has often been destroyed. The neighbourhood is remarkable for its great fertility, and for its delightful views. Sil. 13, v. 94.—Cic. pro Arch. 3.—*Ovid. RHEMI. Vid. Remi.

RHENE, a small island of the Ægean, about 200 yards from Delos, 18 miles in circumference. The inhabitants of Delos always buried their dead there and their women also retired there during their labour, as their own island was consecrated to Apollo, where Latona had brought forth, and where no dead bodies were to be inhumed. Strabo says that it was uninhabited, though it was once as populous and flourishing as the rest of the Cyclades. Polycrates conquered it, and consecrated it to Apollo, after he had tied it to Delos by means of a long chain. Rhene was sometimes called the Small Delos, and the island of Delos the Great Delos. Thucyd. 3.—Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

RHENI, a people on the borders of the Rhine.

RHENUS, I. one of the largest rivers in Europe. It formed for a long time the limit of the Roman dominion, separating the Gallic provinces from Germany, till Cæsar carried the arms of the republic beyond that ancient and formidable barrier which opened the passage for the Roman eagles to the distant Elbe. "It rises in the south-west part of the canton of the Grisons, a country in which all the streams are denominated Currents or Rheinen, a word that appears to be of Celtic or ancient Germanic origin. It is thus difficult and vain to determine whether the Fore Rhine (Vorder-Rhein) is formed by several springs on the sides of mount Nixenadun near the base of mount Crispalt, a branch of Saint Gothard, or the Hind Rhine (Hinter-Rhein) issuing majestically below a vault of ice, attached to the great glacier of Rheinwald, ought to be considered the principal branch. But at all events the central Rhein is only an insignificant branch, of which the distinctive name is the Froda; although the inhabitants of the neighbouring village of Medel called it by the generic term Rhein. Descending from these snowy heights, which are more than 6000 feet above the ocean, the Rhine leaves the country of the Grisons, and throws itself into the lake of Boden or Constance, at the level of 1250 feet. M. Hoffman, a distinguished German geographer, supposes that the course of the Rhine was once very different; that as soon as it passed the territory of the Grisons it flowed down the mountains of Sargans, entered the lake of Wallenstadt, from thence into that of Zurich, and, following the present channel of the Limath, united with the Aar opposite the small town of Rein. That hypothesis, founded on some local observations, is indeed worthy of attention, but it requires to be corroborated by additional facts before it can be admitted. Following its present course, the Rhine after leaving the lakes of Constance, and Zell, arrives at a lower branch of the Alps, a little below Schaffhousen; it crosses them, and forms the celebrated fall near Lauffen, which has been often admired, although its elevation is little more than fifty feet, an elevation inferior to that of the secondary falls in Scandinavia. After its fall at Lauffen, it is about 1173 feet above the level of the sea, but when it reaches Basle it is not more than 765. That part of its course, which is very rapid, is broken by a fall near Laufenburg, and the dangerous eddy of Rheinfelden. The Rhine unites there with the Aar, a river almost equal to it in size, and one which, after being enlarged by the streams and lakes of Switzerland, brings a greater body of water to the Rhine than that which it receives from the lake of Constance. After it passes Basle, the Rhine turns to the north, and waters the rich and beautiful valley, in which are situated Alsace, part of the territory of Baden, the ancient Palatinate, and Mayence. Its course onwards to Kehl is very impetuous; but flowing afterwards in a broad channel, studded with agreeable and well-wooded islands, it assumes a very different character, its banks have been in several places gradually undermined, and its waters are covered with boats. The breadth of the river at Mayence is about 700 yards; as it proceeds in its course, it waters a romantic, though fertile country; and a line of hills, covered with vineyards, extends at no great distance from its banks. It receives in that part of its course the Neckar, which conveys to it the waters of Lower Swabia, and the Maine, which in its numerous windings collects the streams of the ancient Franconia. The Rhine is confined by mountains from Bingen to the country above Coblentz; small islands and headlands are formed by the rocks, and, according to a supposition, which is by no means confirmed, its course was in ancient times broken by a cataract between these two towns. In its picturesque passage through that high country, at the base of many old castles, suspended on rugged rocks, the Rhine receives among other feeders, the Lahn, that is concealed under mountains, and the Moselle, which, free from shallows, marshes, and every incumbrance, resembles in the mazes of its meandering course, a canal fashioned by the hand of man, and conducted through vineyards and fertile meadows. The confluence of these two rivers may be considered the boundary of the romantic course of the Rhine. It then flows in an open and plain country, and receives, among other feeders, the Ruhr and the Lippe. Having reached Holland, its three artificial branches, the Waal, the Leck, and the Yssel, form the great delta in which are situated the wealthiest towns in that industrious country. But its waters are divided into numerous canals, its ancient channel is left dry, and a small brook, all that remains of the majestic river, passes into the sea. According to every principle of physical geography, the Leck and the Yssel, if not the Waal, must be considered the present mouths of the Rhine. The Meuse has obtained at Rotterdam and Dordrecht a distinction which it does not deserve." Malte-Brun.——II. A small river of Cisalpine Gaul, flowing from the Appenines northwards towards the Po. This river is celebrated "in history for the meeting of the second triumvirate, which took place U. C. 709, in an island formed by its stream. The spot which witnessed this famous meeting is probably that which is now known by the name of Crocetta del Trebbo, where there is an island in the Rheno about half a mile long, and one third broad, and about two miles to the west of Bologna." Cram.

Rhinocolûra, a town on the borders of Palestine and Egypt, now El-Arish. Liv. 45, c. 11.

Rhion Vid. Rhium.

Rhiphæi, large mountains at the north of Scythia, where, as some suppose, the Gorgons had fixed their residence. The name of Riphæan was applied to any cold mountain in a northern country, and indeed these mountains seem to have existed only in the imagination of the poets, though some make the Tanais rise there. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 3, v. 272, l. 3, v. 282, l. 4, v. 418.—*Virg. Rhium, a promontory of Achaia, opposite to Antirrhium in Ætolia, at the mouth of the Corinthian gulf, called also the Dardanelles of Lepanto. The strait between Naupactum and Patræ bore also the same name. The tomb of Hesiod was at the top of the promontory. Liv. 27, c. 30, l. 38, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Paus. 7, c. 22.

Rhoda, now Roses, a sea-port town of Spain. Liv. 34, c. 8.

Rhodanus, one of the principal rivers of Gaul. It rises in the Lepontine Alps, and flows through the Vallis Pennina, till it enters the Lemanus Lacus at the eastern extremity of that sheet of water. In this part of its course it receives the tribute of no considerable stream. Issuing again from the lake, it resumes its course south-east, till it receives the Arar, from the mouth of which, precipitating itself almost directly south, it terminated its course in several mouths, by which it discharged itself into the Sinus Gallicus. This river belonged for the greater part of its course to the province of Narbonensis. Towards its mouth it received the waters of the Durentia, which flowed into it from the east. It is one of the most rapid rivers of Europe, now known by the name of the Rhone. Mela, 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Sil. 3, v. 477.—Marcell. 15, &c.—*Cæsar. Rhodope, a high mountain of Thrace, extending as far as the Euxine Sea, all across the country nearly in an eastern direction. "The summits of Rhodope and Scomius belong to the same great central chain. The Rhodope also of Herodotus is evidently the Scomius of Thucydides, since he asserts, that the Thracian river Escius, now Isker, rises in the former mountain, while Thucydides makes it flow from the latter." *Cram.—Ovid. Rhodus, a celebrated island in the Carpathian Sea, 120 miles in circumference, at the south of Caria, from which it is distant about 20 miles. "The isle of Rhodes has a well-earned celebrity: the Rhodians signalized themselves particularly in the marine; and the services rendered by them to the Romans, in the war against the last king of Syria, procured them extensive possessions on the continent. Lindus, Camirus, and Ialysus, had preceded in this isle the foundation of a city named Rhodus, which remounts no higher than the Peloponnesian war, or about four hundred years before the Christian era. It was in vain that Demetrius, surnamed Poliorcetes, or the Taker of Cities, held it besieged for a year. Having successfully resisted Mohammed II. it yielded at length to the efforts of Soliman II. in 1522." D'Anville. The island of Rhodes has been known by the several names of Ophiusa, Stadia, Telchinis, Corymbia, Trinacria, Æthrea, Asteria, Poessa, Atabyria, Olossa, Marcia, and Pelagia. It received the name of Rhodes, either on account of Rhode, a beautiful nymph who dwelt there, and who was one of the favourites of Apollo, or because roses, (ῥόδον), grew in great abundance all over the island. Strab. 14.—*Homer. Rhyndăcus, a large river of Mysia, in Asia Minor, separating Mysia from Bithynia, and emptying into the Euxine considerably east of the mouth of the Granicus, for which, according to D'Anville, it is often mistaken. Plin. 5, c. 32.

Roma, the ancient capital of Italy. "In treating of the topography of ancient Rome, it is usual with antiquaries to consider that city at three distinct periods of its existence; under Romulus, Servius Tullius, and Aurelian, as comprehending every addition or change which is known to have taken place in its extent and the circuit of its walls. The extent of Rome under the first of these periods cannot now be ascertained, though we may meet with topographers who define its limits with as much confidence and precision as those of any modern capital in Europe. We must perhaps rest satisfied with knowing generally, that the city of Romulus is said to have occupied at first only the Palatine hill. That its figure was square is affirmed by Festus, who quotes a verse of Ennius to that effect. If we may believe Tacitus, the Capitol was taken in by Tatius. According to Dionysius, the Cœlian and Quirinal hills were added at the same time. Pliny tells us, that the city had at this time three, or at most four gates. According to Nardini these were Porta Romanula, Porta Mugonia, so called from the lowing of cattle, and Porta Trigonia. The former of these faced the Capitol and Forum; the second led to the Esquiline hill; the third looked towards the Aventine. The Capitol had also two gates; Porta Carmentalis, near the foot of the Tarpeian rock towards the Tiber, and Porta Janualis, which afterwards was converted into a temple of Janus. From the time of Romulus to the reign of Servius Tullius, Rome received all the aggrandizement which the nature of its situation and the increase of its population seemed to render desirable. Under the latter king the seven hills were included, and even the Janiculum on the right bank of the Tiber. Such was the extent of Rome under Servius, and this was preserved with but little alteration till the time of Aurelian. Antiquaries are not precisely agreed as to the increase made in the circuit of the walls of Rome by Aurelian. If we are to believe Vopiscus, it must have been very considerable, as he estimates the new circumference at fifty miles. We know too that the circuit of the walls by actual measurement, in the time of Honorius, was computed at twenty-one miles. But even this account is supposed to be exaggerated. Rome under Servius had been divided into four regions, as we learn from Varro, who has also specified their names. They were the Suburana, Esquilina, Collina, and Palatina. The Suburana comprised chiefly the Cœlian mount; the Collina, both the Quirinal and Viminal; the situation of the other two evidently coincided with that of the hills from which they derived their names. This division is thought to have been in use until the reign of Augustus, when a new arrangement was rendered necessary by the vast increase of the city during so long an interval. He now divided Rome into fourteen regions, and those were again subdivided into vici, which may be considered as parishes; of these Suetonius says there were above a thousand. In the time of Vespasian the number of the regions remained the same, but they were further divided into compita, or wards, which amounted, according to Pliny, to 265. There is every reason for believing that the same division prevailed till the decline of the Roman empire, and the fall of Rome itself, without any variation as to the limits of the regions themselves, whatever change may have taken place in the buildings they contained, or in the names and arrangement of parishes, streets, &c. Porta Capena. This region, of whose limits little else is known, except the fact that it was entirely without the walls of Servius, took its name from the Porta Capena, the most celebrated of the gates of Rome. The origin of the name is unknown, as it cannot be supposed to have any reference to the Etruscan town so called, since it was situated in a very opposite direction. The position of this gate has been fixed by modern discoveries posterior to Nardini, close to the church of S. Nereo and the Villa Mattei. Cœlimontana. The second region, as the name by which it was distinguished sufficiently implies, was almost wholly situated on the Cœlian hill, and consequently was included within the walls of Servius. It is chiefly to be noticed as containing the Suburra, one of the most populous and busy parts of ancient Rome. Varro gives various etymologies of that name, but I confess that they all appear equally unsatisfactory, and, with many other appellations belonging to Rome, I would refer it to an early state of things in that city with which we are wholly unacquainted. The origin of the name of Cœlius Mons is not much better determined, though it seems agreed that it was so called from Cœlius Vibenna, an Etruscan chief, who once resided there. If the Suburra was one of the most frequented parts of Rome, it was also the most profligate. Isis et Serapis. The third region comprised nearly all the space which lies between the Cœlian and Esquiline hills, and also a considerable portion of the latter, especially on that side which faces the south. It derived its name from a temple dedicated to Isis and Serapis; probably the same which Augustus is said to have consecrated with Marc Antony. It is also sometimes designated by the appellation of Moneta. Templum Pacis. The fourth region, which derived its name from the temple of Peace, built by Vespasian after the overthrow of Jerusalem, seems to have been contiguous to the third, and to have occupied in breadth nearly all the space which lies between the Palatine on one side, and the south-western extremity of the Esquiline on the other. In length it reached from the vicinity of the Colosseum to the beginning of the Forum, and the southern angle of the Quirinal. Esquilina. Though the fifth region took its name from the Esquiline, it occupied, in fact, but a small part of that hill; it however comprised nearly the whole of the Viminal, and extended beyond the rampart of Servius to the Castrum Prætorium and the wall of Aurelian. We are informed by Varro that the Esquiline derived its name from the Latin word excultus; in proof of which he mentions that Servius had planted on its summit several sacred groves, such as the Lucus Querquetulanus, Fagutalis, and Esquilinus. It was the most extensive of all the seven hills, and was divided into principal heights, which were called Cispius and Oppius. Alta Semita. The sixth region was contiguous to the fifth; it occupied the whole of the Quirinal, a great portion of the Pincian, and part of the ground which lies at the base of these two hills. Via Lata. The seventh region was contiguous to the sixth, and extended from the base of the Pincian hill round that of the Quirinal, to the angle which that hill forms with the Capitol. Forum Romanum. The eighth region, which was in the centre of Rome, comprised the Forum and Capitol, and consequently the most celebrated and conspicuous buildings of that city. Circus Flaminius. The ninth region seems to have stood almost entirely without the walls of Servius, being confined principally by the Tiber on the west and north, the Capital on the south, and the Pincian hill on the east. It was by much the most extensive of the fourteen regions, being upwards of 30,000 feet in circuit. It comprised the celebrated Campus Martius, which in the reign of Augustus already contained several splendid edifices. Palatium. The tenth region, as its name sufficiently indicates, occupied the Palatine hill, and consequently was the most ancient part of the city. Although of little extent, it was remarkable as the favourite residence of the Cæsars, from the time of Augustus to the decline of the empire. It contained also several spots, venerable from their antiquity, and to which the Romans attached a feeling of superstition, from being connected with the earliest traditions of their infant city. Among these were the Lupercal, a cave supposed to have been consecrated to Pan by Evander. Circus Maximus. The eleventh region was situated, together with the Circus from which it derived its name, in the valley between the Aventine and Palatine hills, the proper name of which was Martia or Murtia. Piscina Publica. The twelfth region was a continuation of the last, between the Palatine and Aventine, as far as the baths of Caracalla inclusively. The Piscina Publica, which gave its name to this section of ancient Rome, consisted of several basins filled with water, to which people resorted for the purpose of learning to swim.

It appears from Livy that public business was sometimes carried on in this part of the city. Aventinus. This region included not only the Aventine, but also the space which lies between that hill and the Tiber. Transtyberina. The fourteenth and last region of ancient Rome, as its name signified, was situated on the right bank of the Tiber; and contained, besides the space enclosed within the walls of Aurelian, the Janiculum, the Mons and Campus Vaticanus, and all the ground occupied by the modern city as far as the castle of S. Angelo. This part of Rome was at first peopled by the inhabitants of certain Latin cities, removed thither by Ancus Martius. Subsequently we find it assigned as a place of security as well as punishment to the turbulent Volsci of Velitræ. Though it seems to have been chiefly frequented by the poorer classes, we hear of some distinguished characters in the Roman history as having gardens and pleasure-grounds within its precincts. We shall now conclude this description of ancient Rome, with the summary catalogue of its different buildings, monuments, and principal curiosities, as contained in the notice of Publius Victor. Lupanaria XLV. Latrinæ publicæ XLIII. Cohortes Prætoriæ X. Urbanæ IV. Vigilum VII. Excubitoria XIII. Vexilla communia II. Castra equitum II." Cram. Romulus is universally supposed to have laid the foundations of this celebrated city, on the 20th of April, according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Christ, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the 4th year of the fifth Olympiad. In its original state Rome was but a small castle on the summit of mount Palatine; and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation, or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a standard as a common asylum for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the punishment which attended them. After many successful wars against the neighbouring states, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into classes, the interests of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labours of the subject, as well as those of his patron, tended to the same end, the aggrandizement of the state. Under the successors of Romulus, the power of Rome was increased, and the boundaries of her dominions extended. During 244 years the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppression, and the violence of the last of these monarchs and of his family, became so atrocious, that a revolution was effected in the state, and the democratical government was established. The monarchical government existed under seven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B. C. 753; and after one year's interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hostilius, 672; Ancus Martius, 640; Tarquin Priscus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534; expelled 25 years after, B. C. 509; and this regal administration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulsion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more sensible of their consequence; with their liberty they acquired a spirit of faction, and they became so jealous of their independence, that the first of their consuls, who had been the most zealous and animated in the assertion of their freedom, was banished from the city because he bore the name, and was of the family of the tyrants. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with success against Porsenna, the king of Etruria, and some of the neighbouring states, who supported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by the force of arms. Though the Romans could once boast that every individual in their armies could discharge with fidelity and honour the superior offices of magistrate and consul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or disgraced by the ill conduct, the oppression, and the wantonness of their generals. (Vid. Consul.) To the fame which their conquest and daily successes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual rise to superiority; and to this may be added the policy of the census, which every fifth year told them their actual strength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. When Rome had flourished under the consular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleasure the conquests of her citizens over the neighbouring states and cities, which, according to a Roman historian, she was ashamed to recollect in the summit of her power, an irruption of the barbarians of Gaul rendered her very existence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguished. The valour of an injured individual, (Vid. Camillus) saved it from destruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to ashes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious era to the Romans. No sooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms against those states which refused to acknowledge their superiority or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines displayed their character in a different view; if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their sword for glory; and here we may see them conquered in the field, and yet refusing to grant that peace for which their conqueror himself had sued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in losing or gaining a victory, the Romans were enabled to examine the manœuvres, observe the discipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments of those soldiers whose friends and ancestors had accompanied Alexander the Great in the conquest of Asia. Italy became subjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the second age, of the adolescence of the Roman empire. After this memorable era they tried their strength not only with distant nations, but also upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged against Carthage, they acquired territory and obtained the sovereignty of the sea; and though Annibal for sixteen years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates and destroyed their armies almost before their walls, yet they were doomed to conquer, (Vid. Punicum Bellum) and soon to add the kingdom of Macedonia, (Vid. Macedonicum Bellum) and the provinces of Asia, (Vid. Mithridaticum Bellum) to their empire. But while we consider the Romans as a nation subduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counsels, and their pursuits at home are not to be forgotten. The senators and nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavoured to retain in their hands that influence which had been exercised with so much success, and such cruelty, by their monarchs. This was the continual occasion of tumults and sedition. The plebeians, though originally the poorest and most contemptible citizens of an indigent nation, whose food in the first ages of the empire was only bread and salt, and whose drink was water, soon gained rights and privileges by their opposition. Though really slaves, they became powerful in the state; one concession from the patricians produced another. The laws which forbade the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families were repealed, and the meanest peasant could, by valour and fortitude, be raised to the dignity of dictator and consul. But supreme power, lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen, becomes too often dangerous. The greatest oppression and tyranny took place of subordination and obedience; and from those causes proceeded the unparalleled slaughter and effusion of blood under a Sylla or a Marius. It has been justly observed, that the first Romans conquered their enemies by valour, temperance, and fortitude; their moderation also, and their justice, were well known among their neighbours; and not only private possessions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires, were left in their power, to be distributed among a family, or to be ensured in the hands of a successor. They were also chosen umpires to decide quarrels; but in this honourable office they consulted their own interest; they artfully supported the weaker side, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J. Cæsar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented excess. What Julius began, his adopted son achieved; the ancient spirit of national independence was extinguished at Rome, and after the battle of Actium, the Romans seemed unable to govern themselves without the assistance of a chief, who, under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after some signal victory, reigned with as much power and as much sovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life. After they had been governed by a race of princes remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman possessions were divided into two distinct empires by the enterprising Constantine, A. D. 328. Constantinople became the seat of the eastern empire, and Rome remained in the possession of the western emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the Christian era, Rome, with Italy, was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the west, into the hands of the Pope, who still continues to hold the sovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Ecclesiastical States. The original poverty of the Romans has often been disguised by their poets and historians, who wished it to appear, that a nation who were masters of the world, had had better beginning than to be a race of shepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this simplicity they were indebted for their success. Their houses were originally destitute of every ornament; they were made with unequal boards and covered with mud, and these served them rather as a shelter against the inclemency of the seasons, than for relaxation and ease. Till the age of Pyrrhus they despised riches, and many salutary laws were enacted to restrain luxury and to punish indolence. They observed great temperance in their meals: young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their 30th year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national spirit was supported by policy; the triumphal procession of a conqueror along the streets, amidst the applause of thousands, was well calculated to promote emulation; and the number of gladiators which were regularly introduced, not only in public games and spectacles, but also at private meetings, served to cherish their fondness for war, whilst it steeled their hearts against the calls of compassion; and when they could gaze with pleasure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another, they were not inactive in the destruction of those whom they considered as inveterate foes or formidable rivals in the field. In their punishments, civil as well as military, the Romans were strict and rigorous; a deserter was severely whipped, and sold as a slave; and the degradation from the rank of a soldier and dignity of a citizen, was the most ignominious stigma which could be affixed upon a seditious mutineer. Marcellus was the first who introduced a taste for the fine arts among his countrymen. The spoils and treasures that were obtained in the plunder of Syracuse and Corinth, rendered the Romans partial to elegant refinement and ornamental equipage. Of the little that remains to celebrate the early victories of Rome, nothing can be compared to the noble effusions of the Augustan age. Virgil has done so much for the Latin name, that the splendour and the triumphs of his country are forgotten for a while, when we are transported in the admiration of the majesty of his numbers, the elegant delicacy of his expressions, and the fire of his muse; and the applauses given to the lyric powers of Horace, the softness of Tibullus, the vivacity of Ovid, and to the superior compositions of other respectable poets, shall be unceasing as long as the name of Rome excites our reverence and our praises, and so long as genius, virtue, and abilities are honoured amongst mankind. Though they originally rejected with horror a law which proposed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, yet the Romans soon proved favourable to the compositions of their countrymen. Livius was the first dramatic writer of consequence at Rome, whose plays began to be exhibited A. U. C. 514. After him Nævius and Ennius wrote for the stage; and in a more polished period Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius, and Afranius, claimed the public attention, and gained the most unbounded applause. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till 100 years after the introduction of comedy, and so celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In historical writing the progress of the Romans was slow and inconsiderable, and for many years they employed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the superior abilities of a Livy were made known. In their worship and sacrifices the Romans were uncommonly superstitious, the will of the gods was consulted on every occasion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous assurance from the augurs that the omens were propitious and his success almost indubitable. The power of fathers over their children was very extensive and indeed unlimited; they could sell them or put them to death at pleasure, without the forms of trial or the interference of the civil magistrates. When Rome was become powerful, she was distinguished from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens; a form of worship was established to her as a deity, and temples were raised in her honour, not only in the city, but in the provinces. The goddess Roma was represented like Minerva, all armed and sitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. Such is an outline of the rise, progress, and decline of Rome, according to the writings of her historians and poets; and, as an abstract of their relations, it is entitled to a place in an account of antiquity, although we give to a very small portion of it that credit which the ancients, without inquiry, thought proper to yield to the whole. The Trojan settlement in Italy we are not called on to disturb, and its little bearing on the important points of Roman history permits us, with the indulgence of a reasonable scepticism, to leave, without too close an investigation, the grounds on which repose the pleasing tradition. Indeed, the minutest examination of this point can lead to nothing but the comparison of authorities, deriving their own information from the most questionable sources; and the writers from whom the historians of antiquity deduced their proofs, unsatisfactory to them, have no existence for us. But as we approach the era of the first appearance of the Roman people among the nations of Italy, that period to which we must look for the origin of laws and institutions, which spread one vast and inexorable empire over the earth, if the research be no less difficult, the necessity of conducting it with care becomes imperative. With little and very insufficient light to guide us, either to receive or reject, we may hesitate before we deny to the reputed founder of the Roman state and nation any real existence; but we have no room for doubt when called upon to reconcile the story of the birth of Rome, as related by Livy, the assembling merely of an outlawed band under the command of the twin-brothers, and the regal state of one of these, but the next moment, with an army to make front against the confederated people around, to cope with, and little less than to conquer, the warlike Sabines of the Apennines. We reject therefore, at once, the account of the foundation of the city, as compiled from the legendary traditions of the earliest days by the first historians, and concede at most, that, on the first emerging of the Roman state from obscurity, and perhaps from dependence, we may believe a Remus or a Romulus to have assisted in the organization of a state that had been gradually gaining strength, and preparing itself for independent government. Till then we may not have been able to distinguish it among the many cities over which the Tuscan rule had extended itself in the progress of its ascendency. The first institutions ascribed to the fabled founder are distinctly of Etruscan origin. The affairs of Rome, then, before her history, are connected with the wanderings and the settlements of the Pelasgic tribes; and it is well observed, therefore, by Niebuhr, that the founding of Rome may indeed be referred to as a chronological era, but it must at the same time be distinguished from an historical fact. The origin of the name of Rome, no less than that of her institutions, was early wrapped in mystery; and while a real ignorance concealed the latter, a superstitious or a political fanaticism shrouded the former. To utter the mysteries connected with this name, confessedly not of Latin origin, and perhaps involving secrets of the early history of the republic, was punishable by death. No inquiry is more interesting than that which proposes for investigation the nature of the Roman policy, and the causes of the Roman greatness, apart from the fictions of poetry and the exaggerations of national vanity. But while to the philosopher it offers a wide and interesting, and instructive field, it throws but little light upon the works that remain to us from antiquity, as it receives from them but little elucidation. Liv. 1, &c.—*Cato de R. RUBICON, now Rugone, a small river of Italy, which it separates from Cisalpine Gaul. It rises in the Apennine mountains, and falls into the Adriatic Sea. By crossing it, and thus transgressing the boundaries of his province, J. Cæsar declared war against the senate and Pompey, and began the civil wars. "To identify this celebrated stream is a question which has long puzzled writers on comparative geography, and does not even now seem perfectly settled. Without entering into the details of this inquiry, we may safely say, that the Rubicon is formed from several small streams, which unite about a mile from the sea, and then assume the name of Fiumicino. Cæsar coming from Ravenna along the coast, would cross the Rubicon near its mouth, where it is one stream: had he proceeded by the Via Æmilia, he would have had to cross the three rivulets, called Rugone, Pisatello, and Savignano, which by their junction constitute the Fiumicino. It is to Lucan that we are indebted for the most interesting description of this famous event." Cram.—Lucan. 1, v. 185 and 213.—Strab. 5.—Suet. in Cæs. 32.—Plin. 3, c. 15.

It is mentioned more than once by Livy in the course of the wars with Etruria. It was taken by assault in the year 454 U. C. by the consul L. Posth. Megillus. In the second Punic war, we hear of its furnishing timber, especially fir, for the Roman fleets. From Pliny we learn that it subsequently became a colony, which is confirmed by an inscription cited by Holstenius." Cram.

Rutēni, a people of Celtic Gaul. They occupied the region which is now called le Rouergue; their city Segodunum afterwards took the name Rhodez from that of the people. But a part of the Ruteni were in the Province, and another without, in Celtic Gaul. Cæsar calls the former Provincials, and they occupied that part of Gaul which is now styled l'Albigeois, whose city was Albiga, Albi. Cæs. B. G. ed. Lem.

Rūtŭli, a people of Latium, known as well as the Latins, by the name of Aborigines. When Æneas came into Italy, Turnus was their king, and they supported him in the war which he waged against this foreign prince. Sabelli, a people of Italy, descended from the Sabines, or according to some, from the Samnites. They inhabited that part of the country which lies between the Sabines and the Marsi. Hence the epithet of Sabellicus. Horat. 3, od. 6.—Virg. G. 3, v. 255.

Sabini. "The Sabines appear to be generally considered one of the most ancient indigenous tribes of Italy, and one of the few who preserved their race pure and unmixed. We are not to expect, however, that fiction should have been more sparing of its ornaments in setting forth their origin, than in the case of other nations far less interesting and less celebrated: Dionysius of Halicarnassus, among other traditions respecting the Sabines, mentions one which supposes them to have been a colony of the Lacedæmonians about the time of Lycurgus, a fable which has been eagerly caught up by the Latin poets and mythologists. Their name, according to Cato, was derived from the god Sabus, an aboriginal deity, supposed to be the same as the Medius Fidius of the Latins. His son Sancus was the Sabine Hercules. They were, in all probability, a branch of the aboriginal Umbri. How inconsiderable a community they constituted at first may be seen from the accounts of Cato; who, as quoted by Dionysius in his Antiquities of Rome, reported, that the first Sabines settled in an obscure place, named Testrina, in the vicinity of Amiternum. As their numbers increased, however, they rapidly extended themselves in every direction: expelling the aborigines from the district of Rieti, and from thence sending numerous colonies into Picenum, Samnium, and the several petty nations who are named at the head of this section. The early connexion of the Sabines with Rome, which was yet in its infancy, naturally forms the most interesting epoch in their history. The event which brought the two states into contact, as related by the Roman historians, is too well known to require further notice here. But whatever truth may be attached to the rape of the Sabine women, we cannot but look upon the accession of Tatius to the regal power, and the incorporation of the Quirites with the citizens of Rome, as well attested proofs of the control once exercised by the Sabine nation over that city. With the reign of Numa, however, this influence ceased, for at that time we find the Sabines engaged in war with his successor Hostilius, and experiencing defeats which were only the prelude to a series of successful aggressions on the one hand, and of losses and humiliations on the other. It was reserved for the consul Curius Dentatus, A. U. C. 462, to achieve the entire subjugation of the Sabines, by carrying fire and desolation beyond the sources of the Nar and Velinus, to the very shores of the Adriatic. Though the conquered country was apparently poor and void of resource, the rapacity of the victors is said to have been amply gratified in this expedition by plunder, such as they had never obtained in any of their former conquests. A fact from which it may be inferred, that the Sabines of that day were no longer that austere and hardy race, to whose simplicity and purity of manners such ample testimony is paid by the ancient writers; whose piety and pristine worth were the model of the royal legislator, and an example of all that was noble and upright to the early patriots of Rome. In fixing the limits of the Sabine territory, we must not attend so much to those remote times when they reached nearly to the gates of Rome, as to that period in which the boundaries of the different people of Italy were marked out with greater clearness and precision, we mean the reign of Augustus. We shall then find the Sabines separated from Latium by the river Anio; from Etruria by the Tiber, beginning from the point where it receives the former stream, to within a short distance of Otricoli. The Nar will form their boundary on the side of Umbria, and the central ridge of the Apennines will be their limit on that of Picenum. To the south and south-east it may be stated generally, that they bordered on the Æqui and Vestini. From the Tiber to the frontier of the latter people, the length of the Sabine country, which was its greatest dimension, might be estimated at 1000 stadia, or 120 miles, its breadth being much less considerable." Cram.

Saguntum, or Saguntus, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, at the west of the Iberus, about one mile from the sea-shore, now called Morviedro. It had been founded by a colony of Zacynthians, and by some of the Rutuli of Ardea. Saguntum is celebrated for the clay in its neighbourhood, with which cups, pocula Saguntina, were made; but more particularly it is famous as being the cause of the second Punic war, and for the attachment of its inhabitants to the interests of Rome. Hannibal took it after a siege of about eight months; and the inhabitants, not to fall into the enemy's hands, burnt themselves with their houses, and with all their effects. The conqueror afterwards rebuilt it, and placed a garrison there, with all the noblemen whom he detained as hostages from the several neighbouring nations of Spain. Some suppose that he called it Spartagene. Saguntum "preserves its vestiges in a place, of which the modern name of Morviedro is formed of the Latin muri veteres, "old walls." D'Anville.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv. 21, c. 2, 7, 9.—Sil. 1, v. 271.—Lucan. 3, v. 250.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.

Sais, now Sa, a town in the Delta of Egypt, situate between the Canopic and Sebennytican mouths of the Nile, and anciently the capital of Lower Egypt. There was there a celebrated temple dedicated to Minerva, with a room cut out of one stone, which had been conveyed by water from Elephantis by the labours of 2000 men in three years. The stone measured on the outside 21 cubits long, 14 broad, and 8 high. Osiris was also buried near the town of Sais. The inhabitants were called Saitæ. One of the mouths of the Nile, which is adjoining to the town, has received the name of Saiticum. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, &c.

Salamis. "Opposite the Eleusinian coast was the island of Salamis, said to have derived its name from Salamis, mother of the Asopus. It was also anciently called Sciras and Cychrea, from the heroes Scirus and Cychreus, and Pityussa, from its abounding in firs. It had been already celebrated in the earliest period of Grecian history from the colony of the Æacidæ, who settled there before the siege of Troy. The possession of Salamis, as we learn from Strabo, was once obstinately contested by the Athenians and Megareans: and he affirms that both parties interpolated Homer, in order to prove from his poems that it had belonged to them. Having been occupied by Athens, it revolted to Megara, but was again conquered by Solon, or, according to some, by Pisistratus. From this period it appears to have been always subject to the Athenians. On the invasion of Xerxes they were induced to remove thither with their families, in consequence of a prediction of the oracle, which pointed out this island as the scene of the defeat of their enemies, and soon after, by the advice of Themistocles, the whole of the naval force of Greece was assembled in the bay of Salamis. Meanwhile the Persian fleet stationed at Phalerum held a council, in which it was determined to attack the Greeks, who were said to be planning their flight to the Isthmus. The Persian ships accordingly were ordered to surround the island during the night, with a view of preventing their escape. In the morning the Grecian galleys moved on to the attack. the Æginetans leading the van, seconded by the Athenians, who were opposed to the Phœnician ships, while the Peloponnesian squadron was engaged with the Ionians. The Persians were completely defeated, and retired in the greatest disorder to Phalerum. The following night the whole fleet abandoned the coast of Attica, and withdrew to the Hellespont. A trophy was erected to commemorate this splendid victory on the isle of Salamis, near the temple of Diana, and opposite to Cynosura, where the strait is narrowest. Here it was seen by Pausanias, and some of its vestiges were observed by Sir W. Gell, who reports that it consisted of a column on a circular base. Many of the marbles are in the sea. Stephanus Byz. mentions a village of Salamis named Cychreus. Strabo informs us that the island contained two cities; the more ancient of the two, which was situated on the southern side, and opposite to Ægina, was deserted in his time. The other stood in a bay, formed by a neck of land which advanced towards Attica. Pausanias remarks that the city of Salamis was destroyed by the Athenians, in consequence of its having surrendered to the Macedonians when the former people were at war with Cassander; there still remained, however, some ruins of the agora, and a temple dedicated to Ajax. Chandler states that the walls may still be traced, and appear to have been about four miles in circumference." Cram.

Sălămis, or Salămīna, a town at the east of the island of Cyprus. It was built by Teucer, who gave it the name of the island of Salamis, from which he had been banished about 1270 years before the Christian era; and from this circumstance the epithets of ambigua and altera were applied to it, as the mother country was also called vera, for the sake of distinction. His descendants continued masters of the town for above 800 years. It was destroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt in the 4th century, and called Constantia. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 8, c. 94, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 21.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 183.

Salapia, "a town of Apulia, situated between a lake thence called Salapina Palus and the Aufidus, is stated by Strabo to have been the emporium of Arpi. Without such authority we should have fixed upon Sipontum as answering that purpose better from its greater proximity. This town laid claims to a Grecian origin, though not of so remote a date as the Trojan war. We do not hear of Salapia in the Roman history till the second Punic war, when it is represented as falling into the hands of the Carthaginians, after the battle of Cannæ; but not long after, it was delivered up to Marcellus by the party which favoured the Roman interest, together with the garrison which Hannibal had placed there. The Carthaginian general seems to have felt the loss of this town severely; and it was probably the desire of revenge which prompted him, after the death and defeat of Marcellus, to adopt the stratagem of addressing letters, sealed with that commander's ring, to the magistrates of the town, in order to obtain admission with his troops. The Salapitani, however, being warned of his design, the attempt proved abortive. The proximity of Salapia to the lake or marsh already mentioned, is said to have proved so injurious to the health of the inhabitants, that some years after these events they removed nearer the coast, where they built a new town, with the assistance of M. Hostilius, a Roman prætor, who caused a communication to be opened between the lake and the sea. Considerable remains of both towns, are still standing at some distance from each other, under the name of Salpi, which confirm this account of Vitruvius. The Palus Salapina, now Lago di Salpi, is noticed by Lycophron and Lucan." Cram.

Salaria, I. a street and gate at Rome, which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, because salt (sal) was generally conveyed to Rome that way. Mart. 4. ep 64.——II. A bridge, called Salarius, was built four miles from Rome through the Salarian gate on the river Anio.

Salassi, a people of Gallia Cisalpina, "situated to the north of the Libicii, and at the foot of the Alps. The main part of their territory lay chiefly, however, in a long valley, which reached to the summits of the Graian and Pennine Alps, the Little and Great St. Bernard. The passages over these mountains into Gaul were too important an object for the Romans, not to make them anxious to secure them by the conquest of the Salassi; but these hardy mountaineers, though attacked as early as 609 U. C. held out for a long time, and were not finally subdued till the reign of Augustus. Such was the difficult nature of their country, that they could easily intercept all communication through the valleys by occupying the heights. Strabo represents them as carrying on a sort of predatory warfare, during which they seized and ransomed some distinguished Romans, and even ventured to plunder the baggage and military chest of Julius Cæsar. Augustus caused their country at last to be occupied permanently by a large force under Terentius Varro. A great many of the Salassi perished in this last war, and the rest to the number of 36,000, were sold and reduced to slavery." (Vid. Augusta Prætoria.) Cram.

It was the native place of the emperor Dioclesian, and he retired there to enjoy peace and tranquillity, after he had abdicated the imperial purple, and built a stately palace, the ruins of which were still seen in the 16th century at Spalatro, about three miles from Salona. Lucan. 4, v. 404.—*Cæs. Samaria, a city and country of Palestine, famous in sacred history. The inhabitants, called Samaritans, were composed of Heathens and rebellious Jews, and on having a temple built there after the form of that of Jerusalem, a lasting enmity arose between the people of Judæa and of Samaria, so that no intercourse took place between the countries, and the name of Samaritan became a word of reproach, and as if it were a curse.

Their chief town was called Samnium or Samnis. Liv. 7, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 16, &c. l. 3, c. 18.—Strab. 5.—Lucan. 2.—Eutrop. 2.

Samothrăce, or Samothrăcia, an island in the Ægean Sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus, on the coast of Thrace, from which it is distant about 32 miles. It was known by the ancient names of Leucosia, Melitis, Electria, Leucania, and Dardania. "Though insignificant in itself, considerable celebrity attaches to it from the mysteries of Cybele and her Corybantes, which are said to have originated there, and to have been disseminated from thence over Asia Minor and different parts of Greece. We shall not here attempt to investigate the origin either of the mysteries above alluded to, or of the Cabiric worship, with which they were intimately connected, the subject, although interesting, being too obscure to be elucidated but in an elaborate dissertation. Herodotus is positive in affirming that the Samothracians practised the Cabiric orgies, and states that they derived them from the Pelasgi, who once occupied that island, but afterwards obtained a settlement in Attica. The Samothracians joined the Persian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes: and one of their vessels distinguished itself in the battle of Salamis." Cram. It enjoyed all its rights and immunities under the Romans till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced it, with the rest of the islands in the Ægean, into the form of a province. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.—Herod. 7, c. 108, &c.—*Virg. Sardĭnia, the greatest island in the Mediterranean after Sicily, is situate between Italy and Africa, at the south of Corsica. It was originally called Sandaliotis or Ichnusa, from its resembling the human foot, (ιχνος) and it received the name of Sardinia from Sardus, a son of Hercules, who settled here with a colony which he had brought with him from Libya. Other colonies, under Aristæus, Norax, and Iolas, also settled there. The Carthaginians were long masters of it, and were dispossessed by the Romans in the Punic wars, B. C. 231. Some call it with Sicily, one of the granaries of Rome. The air was very unwholesome, though the soil was fertile in corn, in wine, and oil. Neither wolves nor serpents are found in Sardinia, nor any poisonous herb, except one, which, when eaten, contracts the nerves, and is attended with a paroxysm of laughter, the forerunner of death; hence risus Sardonicus, or *Sardous. It is celebrated for the many sieges it sustained against the Cimmerians, Persians, Medes, Macedonians, Ionians, and Athenians, and for the battle in which, B. C. 262, Antiochus Soter was defeated by Eumenes, king of Pergamus. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who ordered it to be rebuilt. It fell into the hands of Cyrus, B. C. 548, and was burnt by the Athenians, B. C. 504, which became the cause of the invasion of Attica by Darius. Plut. in Alex.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 137, 152, &c.—Strab. 13.—Herod. 1, c. 7, &c.

Sarmatia, an extensive country at the north of Europe and Asia, divided into European and Asiatic. The European was bounded by the ocean on the north of Germany, and the Vistula on the west, the Jazygæ on the south, and Tanais on the east. The Asiatic was bounded by Hyrcania, the Tanais, and the Euxine Sea. The former contained the modern kingdoms of Russia, Poland, Lithuania, and Little Tartary; and the latter, Great Tartary, Circassia, and the neighbouring country. The Sarmatians were a savage, uncivilized nation, often confounded with the Scythians, naturally warlike, and famous for painting their bodies to appear more terrible in the field of battle. In the time of the emperors they became very powerful, they disturbed the peace of Rome by their frequent incursions; till at last, increased by the savage hordes of Scythia, under the barbarous names of Huns, Vandals, Goths, Alans, &c. they successfully invaded and ruined the empire in the 3d and 4th centuries of the Christian era. They generally lived on the mountains without any habitation, except their chariots, whence they have been called Hamaxobii; they lived upon plunder, and fed upon milk mixed with the blood of horses. Strab. 7, &c. —Mela, 2, c. 4.—Diod. 2.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Juv. 2.—Ovid. Trist. 3, &c. The ancients did attach to the name of Sarmatia a meaning sufficiently definite, as the boundaries given above may explain; but it was very different as regarded the Sarmatæ, or people inhabiting the region thus indicated; and modern investigations for a long time only added to the obscurity that prevailed upon this point. Vid. Europa.

The entrance into it is between the promontory of Sunium and that of Scyllæum. Some suppose that this part of the sea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there, or from a small river which discharged itself on the coast, or from a small harbour of the same name. The Saronic bay is about 62 miles in circumference, 23 miles in its broadest, and 25 in its longest part, according to modern calculation.

Sarpēdon, I. a town of Cilicia, famous for a temple sacred to Apollo and Diana.——II. A promontory of Thrace.

Sarra, a town of Phœnicia, the same as Tyre. It receives this name from a small shell-fish of the same name, which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whose blood garments were dyed. Hence came the epithet of sarranus, so often applied to Tyrian colours, as well as to the inhabitants of the colonies of the Tyrians, particularly Carthage. Sil. 6, v. 662, l. 15, v. 205.—*Virg. Saxŏnes, a people of Germany, near the Chersonesus Cimbrica. They were probably of a race between the Teutones and Scandinavians, and though from their first appearance in history they bore the character of a bold and warlike people, yet they do not appear with that resistless power till the people of the north, embracing a new life, embarked upon the seas to carry beyond their continent the devastating influence of their arms. The conquest of England was their first great achievement; and their establishment in that country extended the terror of the Saxon name throughout all the states just rising out of the ruins of the dismembered empire. Ptol. 3, 11.—Claud. 1, Eutr. v. 392.

Scythæ, the inhabitants of Scythia. Vid. Scythia.

Scythia, a large country situate on the most northern parts of Europe and Asia, from which circumstance it is generally denominated European and Asiatic. The most northern parts of Scythia were uninhabited on account of the extreme coldness of the climate. The more southern in Asia that were inhabited, were distinguished by the name of Scythia intra & extra Imaum, &c. The boundaries of Scythia were unknown to the ancients, as no traveller had penetrated beyond the vast tracts of land which lay at the north, east, and west. Scythia comprehended the modern kingdoms of Tartary, Russia in Asia, Siberia, Muscovy, the Crimea, Poland, part of Hungary, Lithuania, the northern parts of Germany, Sweden, Norway, &c. The Scythians were divided into several nations or tribes; they had no cities, but continually changed their habitations. They inured themselves to bear labour and fatigue, they despised money, and lived upon milk, and covered themselves with the skins of their cattle. The virtues seemed to flourish among them; and that philosophy and moderation which other nations wished to acquire by study, seemed natural to them. Some authors, however, represent them as a savage and barbarous people, who fed upon human flesh, who drank the blood of their enemies, and used the sculls of travellers as vessels in their sacrifices to their gods. The Scythians made several irruptions upon the more southern provinces of Asia, especially B. C. 624, when they remained in possession of Asia Minor for 28 years, and we find them at different periods extending their conquests in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt. Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their sovereigns was unparalleled. When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in solemn procession, and afterwards buried. In the first centuries after Christ they invaded the Roman empire with the Sarmatians. Vid. Sarmatia and Massagetæ. Herodot. 1, c. 4, &c.—Strab. 7.—Diod. 2.—*Val. Segusiāni, a people of Gaul on the Loire. Cæs. G. 1, c. 10.—Plin. 4, c. 18.

Seleucia, I. a town of Babylonia. This place owed its origin to Seleucus Nicator, and was erected avowedly as a rival to Babylon. It stood upon the right bank of the Tigris, opposite the Parthian city of Ctesiphon. The bishop of this see was in process of time, when the Christian religion superseded the old superstition, invested with the dignity of Primate of all the churches east of Syria.——II. Another of Syria, on the seashore, generally called Pieria, to distinguish it from others of the same name. There were no less than six other cities which were called Seleucia, and which had all received their name from Seleucus Nicator. They were all situate in the kingdom of Syria, in Cilicia, and near the Euphrates. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Plut. in Dem.—Mela, 1, c. 12.—Strab. 11 and 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

Seleucis, a division of Syria, which received its name from Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian empire after the death of Alexander the Great. It was also called Tetrapolis from the four cities it contained, called also sister cities; Selencia called after Seleucus, Antioch called after his father, Laodicea after his mother, and Apamea after his wife. Strab. 16.

Selga, a town of Pamphylia, made a colony by the Lacedæmonians. Liv. 35, c. 13.—Strabo.

Selinunς, or Selīnus, (untis,) I. a town on the southern parts of Sicily, founded A. U. C. 127. It received its name from σελινον, parsley, which grew there in abundance. The marks of its ancient consequence are visible in the venerable ruins now found in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 705.—Paus. 6, c. 19——II. A river of Elis in Peloponnesus, which watered the town of Scillus. Paus. 5, c. 6.——III. Another in Achaia.——IV. Another in Sicily.——V. A river and town of Cilicia, where Trajan died. Liv. 33, c. 20.—Strab. 14.——VI. Two small rivers near Diana's temple at Ephesus. Plin. 5, c. 29.——VII. A lake at the entrance of the Cayster. Strab. 14.

Sellasia, a town of Laconia, "situated near the confluence of the Œnus and Gongylus, in a valley confined between two mountains named Evas and Olympus. It commanded the only road by which an army could enter Laconia from the north, and was therefore a position of great importance for the defence of the capital. Thus when Epaminondas made his attack upon Sparta, his first object, after forcing the passes which led from Arcadia into the enemy's country, was to march directly upon Sellasia with all his troops. Cleomenes, tyrant of Sparta, was attacked in this strong position by Antigonus Doson, and totally defeated, after an obstinate conflict. When Pausanias visited Laconia, Sellasia was in ruins." Cram.

Sellēis, a river of Peloponnesus, falling into the Ionian Sea. Homer. Il.

Selymbria, a town of Thrace, on the Propontis. Liv. 39, c. 39.

Semnŏnes, a people of Germany, belonging to the Suevic family. They occupied the region lying between the Oder and the Elbe, towards their sources, and were surrounded by the most warlike of the German tribes.

Sena, I. a town of Hetruria, east of Volaterra and south of Florentia. It was surnamed Julia, to distinguish it from the Umbrian town of the same name. As Sienna, among the republican cities of the middle ages, it became illustrious for the part which it bore in the differences of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, and is now most remarkable for the purity of the idiom in use among its inhabitants.——II. Another, surnamed Gallica, now Sinigaglia in Umbria. "It was colonized by the Romans after they had expelled, or rather exterminated, the Senones, A. U. C. 471; but according to Livy some years before that date. During the civil wars between Sylla and Marius, Sena, which sided with the latter, was taken and sacked by Pompey." Cram. There was also a small river in the neighbourhood which bore the name of Sena.

Senŏnes, I. an uncivilized nation of Gallia Transalpina, who left their native possessions, and, under the conduct of Brennus, invaded Italy and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians to make war against the Romans, till they were totally destroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they settled near Umbria, and which from them was called Senogallia, were Fanum Fortunæ, Sena, Pisaurum, and Ariminum. *Vid. Cimbri. Sequāni, a people of Gaul, near the territories of the Ædui, between the Soane and mount Jura, famous for their wars against Rome, &c. The country which they inhabited is now called Franche Compté, or Upper Burgundy. Cæs. Bell. G.

Serbōnis, a lake between Egypt and Palestine, "in the vicinity of mount Casius, where Typhon, the murderer of Osiris, is said to have perished. It has taken the name of Sebaket Bardoil, from the first king of Jerusalem of that name, who died on his return from an expedition in Egypt." D'Anville.

Seres, a nation of Asia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eastern ocean in the modern Thibet. They were naturally of a meek disposition. Silk, of which the fabrication was unknown to the ancients, who imagined that the materials were collected from the leaves of trees, was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dress of silk is called serica vestis. Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, was the first who wore a silk dress, which at that time was sold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and consequently was the common dress among the Romans. Some suppose that the Seres are the same as the Chinese. Ptol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 10, v. 142 and 292.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

Seriphus, an island in the Ægean Sea, about 35 miles in circumference, according to Pliny only 12, very barren and uncultivated. The Romans generally sent their criminals there in banishment, and it was there that Cassius Severus, the orator, was exiled, and there he died. According to Ælian the frogs of this island never croaked but when they were removed from the island to another place they were more noisy and clamorous than others; hence the proverb of seriphia rana applied to a man who never speaks nor sings. This, however, is found to be a mistake by modern travellers. It was on the coast of Seriphus that the chest was discovered in which Acrisius had exposed his daughter Danae and her son Perseus. Strab. 10.—*Ælian. Sestos, or Sestus, a town of Thrace, on the shores of the Hellespont, exactly opposite Abydos on the Asiatic side. It is celebrated for the bridge which Xerxes built there across the Hellespont, as also for being the seat of the amours of Hero and Leander. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 13.—Musæus de L. & H.—*Virg. Setăbis, a town of Spain, between New Carthage and Saguntum, famous for the manufacture of linen. There was also a small river of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 16, v. 474.—Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3. c. 3, l. 19, c. 1.

Setia, a town of Latium, above the Pontine Marshes, celebrated for its wines, which Augustus is said to have preferred to all others. Plin. 14. c. 6.—Juv. 5, v. 34.—Sat. 10, v. 27.—Martial. 13, ep. 112.

Sevo, a ridge of mountains between Norway and Sweden, now called Fiell, or Dofre. Plin. 4, c. 15.

Sextiæ aquæ, now Aix, a place of Cisalpine Gaul, where the Cimbri were defeated by Marius. It owed its foundation to Sextius Calvinus, who subdued the Salyes, or Saluvii, whence the epithet Sextiæ. The term Aquæ is used in reference to its warm baths. It became at length the metropolis of Narbonensis Secunda. D'Anville.—Liv. 61.—Vell. Paterc. 1, c. 15.

Sicambri, or Sygambri. "The Sicambri inhabited the south side of the course of the Lippe. Pressed by the Cattians, powerful neighbours, whom Cæsar calls Suevi, they were together with the Ubii, received into Gaul on the left bank of the Rhine, under Augustus; and there is reason to believe that the people who occupied this position under the name of Gugerni, were Sicambrians. It was in favour of the Ubians that Cæsar crossed the Rhine, at the extremity of the territory of Treves, ravaged that of the Sicambrians, and caused the Cattians to decamp." D'Anville.

Sicambria, the country of the Sicambri, formed the modern province of Guelderland. Claud. in Eutrop. 1, v. 383.

Sicani. Vid Latium.

Sicca, a town of Numidia, at the west of Carthage, which received from Venus, who was worshipped there, the epithet of Venerea. Remains of antiquity are still visible around the modern place, which is called Urbs, and otherwise Kef; "although Shaw, an English traveller, to whose information we owe much of the topographical intelligence of this country, makes a distinction between those names, as appropriate to two several positions." D'Anville.—Sat. in Jug. 56.

Sicilia, the largest and most celebrated island in the Mediterranean Sea, at the bottom of Italy. It was anciently called Sicania, Trinacria, and Triquetra. It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum, looking towards Greece; and Pelorum, towards Italy. Sicily is about 600 miles in circumference, celebrated for its fertility, so much so that it was called one of the granaries of Rome, and Pliny says that it rewards the husbandman an hundred-fold. Its most famous cities were Syracuse, Messana, Leontini, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The highest and most famous mountain in the island is Ætna, whose frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants; from which circumstance the ancients supposed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this island, and that after them it came into the possession of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at last of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. Vid. Siculi. The plains of Enna are well known for their excellent honey, and, according to Diodorus, the hounds lost their scent in hunting, on account of the many odoriferous plants that profusely perfumed the air. Ceres and Proserpine were the chief deities of that place; and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks settled some colonies there, and at last the Carthaginians became masters of the whole island, till they were dispossessed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors suppose that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was separated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the straits of the Charybdis were thus formed. The inhabitants of Sicily were so fond of luxury, that Siculæ mensæ became proverbial. The rights of citizens of Rome were extended to them by M. Antony. Cic. 14. Att. 13. Verr. 2, c. 13.—Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Justin. 4, c. 1, &c.—*Virg. Sicŏrus, now Segro, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in the Pyrenæan mountains, and falling into the Iberus a little above its mouth. It was near this river that J. Cæsar conquered Afranius and Petreius, the partisans of Pompey. Lucan. 4, v. 14, 130, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 3.

Sicŭli fretum, the sea which separates Sicily from Italy, is 15 miles long, but in some places so narrow that the barking of dogs can be heard from shore to shore. This strait is supposed to have been formed by an earthquake, which separated the island from the continent. "We find the name of Mare Siculum applied to the waters which washed the southwestern coast of Greece." Strab. 2, 123.—Plin. 4. 5.—Cram.—Plin. 3, c. 8.

Sicyon, now Basilica, a town of Peloponnesus, the capital of Sicyonia. "Few cities of Greece could boast of such high antiquity, since it already existed under the names of Ægialea and Mecone long before the arrival of Pelops in the Peninsula. Homer represents Sicyon as forming part of the kingdom of Mycenæ with the whole of Achaia. Pausanias and other genealogists have handed down to us a long list of the kings of Sicyon, from Ægialus its founder, to the conquest of the city by the Dorians and Heraclidæ, from which period it became subject to Argos. Its population was then divided into four tribes, named, Hyllus, Pamphyli, Dymantæ, and Ægialus, a classification introduced by the Dorians, and adopted, as we learn from Herodotus, by the Argives. How long a connexion subsisted between the two states we are not informed; but it appears that when Cleisthenes became tyrant of Sicyon they were independent of each other, since Herodotus relates that whilst at war with Argos he changed the names of the Sicyonian tribes which were Dorian, that they might not be the same as those of the adverse city; and in order to ridicule the Sicyonians, the historian adds, that he named them afresh after such animals as pigs and asses; sixty years after his death the former appellations were however restored. Sicyon continued under the dominion of tyrants for the space of one hundred years; such being the mildness of their rule, and their observance of the existing laws, that the people gladly beheld the crown thus transmitted from one generation to another. It appears, however, from Thucydides, that at the time of the Peloponnesian war the government had been changed to an aristocracy. In that contest, the Sicyonians, from their Dorian origin, naturally espoused the cause of Sparta; and the maritime situation of their territory not unfrequently exposed it to the ravages of the naval forces of Athens. After the battle of Leuctra, we learn from Xenophon that Sicyon once more became subject to a despotic government, of which Euphron, one of its principal citizens, had placed himself at the head with the assistance of the Argives and Arcadians. His reign, however, was not of long duration, being waylaid at Thebes, whither he went to conciliate the favour of that power, by a party of Sicyonian exiles, and murdered in the very citadel. On the death of Alexander the Great, Sicyon fell into the hands of Alexander, son of Polysperchon; but on his being assassinated, a tumult ensued, in which the inhabitants of the city endeavoured to recover their liberty. Such, however, was the courage and firmness displayed by Cratesipolis his wife, that they were finally overpowered. Not long after this event, Demetrius Poliorcetes made himself master of Sicyon, and having persuaded the inhabitants to retire to the Acropolis, he levelled to the ground all the lower part of the city which connected the citadel with the port. A new town was then built, to which the name of Demetrius was given. This, as Strabo reports, was placed on a fortified hill dedicated to Ceres, and distant about 12 or 20 stadia from the sea. The change which was thus effected in the situation of this city does not appear to have produced any alteration in the character and political sentiments of the people. For many years they still continued to be governed by a succession of tyrants, until Nicocles, the last, was expelled by Aratus the son of Clinias. Clinias himself had previously reigned for a short period, when he was put to death by Abantidas, who usurped the authority and forced Aratus to fly. Nicocles having succeeded Abantidas, Aratas formed the design of freeing his country in conjunction with a party of exiles and some Argive mercenaries, and advanced with his troops to the walls of the city, which he scaled during the night, and overpowering the satellites of Nicocles, who escaped during the tumult, became master of Sicyon. He then proclaimed liberty, recalled all the exiles and restored to them their lands and property. Wisely foreseeing also the dangers to which so small a republic was exposed both from foreign as well as domestic enemies, he determined to unite it to the Achæan league; by which measure it acquired that degree of strength and security of which it stood so much in need. By the great abilities and talents of Aratus, Sicyon was raised to a distinguished rank among the other Achæan states, and being already celebrated as the first school of painting in Greece, continued to flourish under his auspices in the cultivation of all the finest arts; it being said, as Plutarch reports, that the beauty of the ancient style had there alone been preserved pure and uncorrupted. Aratus died at an advanced age, after an active and glorious life, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by order of Philip king of Macedon. He was interred at Sicyon with great pomp, and a splendid monument was erected to him as the founder and deliverer of the city. After the dissolution of the Achæan league little is known of Sicyon; it is evident, however, that it existed in the time of Pausanias, from the number of remarkable edifices and monuments which he enumerates within its walls, though he allows that it had greatly suffered from various calamities, but especially from an earthquake, which nearly reduced it to desolation. The ruins of this once great and flourishing city are still to be seen near the small village of Basilica. Dr. Clarke informs us that these remains of ancient magnificence are yet considerable, and in some instances exist in such a state of preservation, that it is evident the buildings of the city must either have survived the earthquake to which Pausanias alludes, or have been constructed at some later period. In this number is the theatre, which that traveller considered as the finest and most perfect structure of the kind in all Greece. Dr. Clarke identified also the site of the Acropolis, and observed several foundations of temples and other buildings in a style as massive as the Cyclopean: very grand walls of brick tiles; remains of a palace with many chambers; the stadium; ruins of a temple near the theatre; some ancient caves, and traces of a paved way. Sir W. Gell reports that 'Basilica is a village of fifty houses, situated in the angle of a little rocky ascent, along which ran the walls of Sicyon. This city was in shape triangular, and placed upon a high flat, overlooking the plain, about an hour from the sea, where is a great tumulus on the shore. On the highest angle of Sicyon was the citadel; the situation is secure, without being inconveniently lofty.' It appears from Polybius that Sicyon had a port capable of containing ships of war; and we know from Herodotus that it sent twelve ships to Artemisium, and the same number to Salamis. The territory of Sicyon was separated from that of Corinth by the small river Nemea." Cram.

Sicyonia, a province of Peloponnesus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. The territory is said to abound with corn, wine, and olives, and also with iron mines. Vid. Sicyon.

Sidicīnum, a town of Campania, called also Teanum. Vid. Teanum. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

Sidon, "the most ancient city of Phœnicia, and the most northerly of all those which were assigned for the portion of the sons of Asher. Beyond it the country of Phœnicia, hitherto nothing but a bare seacoast begins to open towards the east in a fine rich valley, having Libanus upon the north and the Anti-Libanus on the south. It was called so from Zidon, one of the sons of Canaan, who first planted here; not, as some say, from Sida, the daughter of Belus, once a king hereof. It was situate in a fertile and delightful soil defended with the sea on the one side, and on the other by the mountains lying betwixt it and Libanus. This city was at several times both the mother and the daughter of Tyre; the mother of it in the times of heathenism, Tyre being a colony of this people; and the daughter of it, when instructed in the Christian faith, acknowledging the church of Tyre for its mother church. The city, in those times very strong, both by art and nature, having on the north side a fort or citadel, mounted on an inaccessible rock, and environed on all sides by the sea; which, when it was brought under the command of the western Christians, was held by the order of the Dutch knights; and another on the south side of the port, which the templars guarded." Heyl. Cosm. "The ancient Sidon, mother of the Phœnician cities, is now a town of 7000 or 8000 inhabitants, under the name of Scyde. It is the principal port of Damascus. The harbour, like all the others on this coast, was formed with much art, and at an immense expense, by means of long piers. These works, which still subsisted under the Lower Empire, and the harbour, are now fallen to decay. The Enin Facardin, who dreaded the visits of the Turkish fleets, completed the destruction of the famous harbours of Phœnicia." Malte-Brun. The city of Sidon was taken by Ochus, king of Persia, after the inhabitants had burnt themselves and the city, B. C. 351; but it was afterwards rebuilt by its inhabitants. Lucan. 3, v. 217, l. 10, v. 141.—Diod. 16.—Justin. 11, c. 10.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Homer. Od. 15, v. 411.—Mela, 1, c. 12.

Siga, now Ned-Roma, a town of Numidia, famous as the palace of Syphax. Plin. 5, c. 11.

Sigæum, or Sigēum, now cape Incihisari, a town of Troas, on a promontory of the same name, where the Scamander falls into the sea, extending six miles along the shore. It was near Sigæum that the greatest part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312, l. 7, v. 294.—*Ovid. Sila, or Syla, a large wood in the country of the Brutii, near the Apennines, abounding with much pitch. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 715.

Silārus, "which divides Lucania from Campania, takes its rise in that part of the Apennines which formerly belonged to the Hirpini; and after receiving the Tanager, now Negro, and the Calor, Calore, empties itself into the Gulf of Salerno. The waters of this river are stated by ancient writers to have possessed the property of incrusting, by means of a calcareous deposition, any pieces of wood or twigs which were thrown into them. At its mouth was a haven named Portus Alburnus, as we learn from a verse of Lucilius, cited by Probus the grammarian." Cram.

Silis, a river of Venetia in Italy, falling into the Adriatic. Plin. 3, c. 18.

Silvium, a town of Apulia, now Gorgolione. Plin. 3. c. 11.

Silures, the people of South Wales in Britain. They occupied the northern shore of the Sabrinæ Æstuarium. Isca, their chief city, was "the residence of a Roman legion; its site is now recognized in the name of Caer-Leon, on a river, whose name of Usk is evidently the same as those of the city." D'Anville.

Simbrivius, or Simbruvius, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit. 14, Ann. 22.

Simēthus, or Symethus, a town and river at the east of Sicily, which served as a boundary between the territories of the people of Catana and the Leontini. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 584.

Simois, (entis,) a river of Troas, which rises in mount Ida, and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer and most of the ancient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. Homer. Il.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 104, l. 3, v. 302, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 324.—Mela, 1, c. 18.

Sinæ, a people of India, called by Ptolemy the most eastern nation of the world. "The accounts of the Mahometan travellers of the ninth century, published by Renaudot, give southern China the name of Sin, pronounced by the Persians Tchin. The origin of this name is uncertain; and, though the Sinæ of the ancients were situated more to the west than any part of modern China, the resemblance of the names is too great to allow it to be considered as unmeaning. It is highly probable that it was the ancient generic name for all the nations of Thibet, China, and India, east of the Ganges." Malte-Brun.

Singæi, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

Singara, a city at the north of Mesopotamia, now Sinjar.

Singiticus sinus, a gulf on the Thracian coast, confined between the peninsula of Sithonia on one side, and that of Acte on the other. On the Sithonian shore stood the town of Singus, whence the ancient name of the gulf, which receives its modern appellation from Monte-Santo, the Athos of antiquity which rises from the peninsula of Acte.

Singus. Vid. Singiticus Sinus.

Sinōpe, a seaport town of Asia Minor, in Pontus, now Sinub, founded or rebuilt by a colony of Milesians. It was long an independent state, till Pharnaces, king of Pontus, seized it. It was the capital of Pontus, under Mithridates, and was the birthplace of Diogenes, the cynic philosopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo married there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67.—Strab. 2, &c. 12.—Diod. 4.—Mela, 1, c. 19.

Sinthi, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. Homer. Il. 1, v. 594.

Sinuessa, "the last town of New Latium, a Roman colony of some note, situated close to the sea, and founded, as it is said, on the ruins of Sinope, an ancient Greek city. Strabo tells us, that Sinuessa stood on the shore of the Sinus Vescinus, and derived its name from that circumstance. The same writer, as well as the Itineraries, informs us that it was traversed by the Appian Way; Horace also confirms this. Sinuessa was colonized together with Minturnæ A. U. C. 456, and ranked also among the maritime cities of Italy. Its territory suffered considerable devastation from Hannibal's troops when opposed to Fabius. Cæsar, in his pursuit of Pompey, halted for a few days at Sinuessa, and from thence wrote a very conciliatory letter to Cicero, which is to be found in the correspondence with Atticus. The epithet of tepens, which Silius Italicus applies to this city, has reference to some warm sources in its neighbourhood, now called Bagni; while Sinuessa itself answers to the rock of Monte Dragone. The Aquæ Sinuessanæ are noticed by Livy and other writers of antiquity." Cram.

Sion, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built.

Siphnos, one of the Cyclades, "now Siphanto, lies to the southeast of Seriphus, and northeast of Melos. Herodotus reports that it was colonized by the Ionians, and elsewhere speaks of the Siphians as deriving considerable wealth from their gold and silver mines. In the age of Polycrates their revenue surpassed that of all the other islands, and enabled them to erect a treasury at Delphi equal to those of the most opulent cities; and their own principal buildings were sumptuously decorated with Parian marble. Herodotus states, however, that they afterwards sustained a heavy loss from a descent of the Samians, who levied upon the island a contribution of 100 talents. In Strabo's time it was so poor and insignificant as to give rise to the proverbs, Σίφνιον ὀστράκαλον and Σίφνιος ἀβροβάτης. Pliny states that it is twenty-eight miles in circuit." Cram.

Sipontum, Sipus, or Sepus, a maritime town of Apulia in Italy, founded by Diomedes after his return from the Trojan war. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Sipylum, and Sipylus, a town of Lydia, with a mountain of the same name near the Meander, formerly called the Ceraunius. The town was destroyed by an earthquake, with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. Strab. 1. and 12.—Paus. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Homer. Il. 24.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.

Sirenusæ, three small rocky islands near the coasts of Campania where the Sirens were supposed to reside.

Siris, a town of Magna Græcia, founded by a Grecian colony after the Trojan war, at the mouth of a river of the same name. There was a battle fought near it between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Dionys. Periag. v. 221.——The Æthiopians gave that name to the Nile before its divided streams united into one current. Plin. 5, c. 9.——A town of Pæonia in Thrace.

Sirmio, now Sermione, a peninsula in the lake Benacus, where Catullus had a villa. Cram. 29.

Sirmium, the capital of Pannonia, at the confluence of the Savus and Bacuntius, very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors.

Sisapo, a town of Spain, "which may be presumed to have been comprised in the limits of Beturia, and noted for its mines of minium, or vermilion. The position of this place is sufficiently obvious in the modern name of Almaden, which it received from the Maures; Maaden in the Arabic language being the appellative term for mines." D'Anville.

Sismitheræ, a fortified place of Bactriana, 15 stadia high, 80 in circumference, and plain at the top. Alexander married Roxana there. Strab. 11.

Sithonia. "That portion of Chalcidice containing Olynthus and its territory as well as the adjoining peninsula, bore anciently the name of Sithonia, as we are told by Herodotus. The Sithonians are mentioned by more than one writer as a people of Thrace. Lycophron alludes obscurely to a people of Italy, descended from the Sithonian giants." Cram.

Sitones, a nation of Germany, or modern Norway, according to some. Tacit. de Germ. 45.

Smaragdus, I. a town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (smaragdi) were dug.——II. Mons. "The Smaragdus Mons appears to be but little distant from the sea, being that called by the Arabs Maaden Uzzumurud, or the "Mine of Emeralds." D'Anville.—Strab. 16.

Smenus, a river of Laconia, rising in mount Taygetes, and falling into the sea about five stadia from Las. Paus. 3, c. 24.

Smyrna, a celebrated seaport town of Ionia in Asia Minor, built, as some suppose, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. It has been subject to many revolutions, and been severally in the possession of the Æolians, Ionians, Lydians, and Macedonians. Alexander, or, according to Strabo, Lysimachus, rebuilt it 400 years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians. It was one of the richest and most powerful cities of Asia, and became one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were universally esteemed for their valor and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been destroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the Christian era. Smyrna still continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believe that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion, they not only paid him divine honours, but showed a place which bore the poet's name, and also had a brass coin in circulation which was called Homerium. Some suppose that it was called Smyrna from an Amazon of the same name who took possesmon of it. "Smyrna, the queen of the cities of Anatolia, and extolled by the ancients under the title of 'the lovely, the crown of Ionia, the ornament of Asia,' braves the reiterated efforts of conflagrations and earthquakes. Ten times destroyed, she has ten times risen from her ruins with new splendour. According to a very common Grecian system, the principal buildings were erected on the face of a hill fronting the sea. The hill supplied marble, while its slope afforded a place for the seats rising gradually above each other in the stadium, or great theatre for the exhibition of games. Almost every trace of the ancient city, however, has been obliterated during the contests between the Greek empire and the Ottomans, and afterwards by the ravages of Timur in 1402. The foundation of the stadium remains, but the area is sown with grain. There are only a few vestiges of the theatre, and the castle which crowns the hill is chiefly a patchwork executed by John Comnenus on the ruins of the old one, the walls of which, of immense strength and thickness, may still be discovered. Smyrna, in the course of its revolutions, has slid down, as it were, from the hill to the sea. It has, under the Turks, completely regained its populousness. Smyrna, in short, is the greatest emporium of the Levant. The city contains 120,000 inhabitants, though frequently and severely visited by the plague." Malte-Brun.—Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.—Strab. 12 and 14.—Ital. 8, v. 565.—Paus. 5, c. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 17.

Soanes, a people of Colchis, near Caucasus, in whose territories the rivers abound with golden sands, which the inhabitants gather in wool skins, whence, perhaps, arose the fable of the golden fleece. Strab. 11.—Plin. 33, c. 3.

Sogdiana, a country of Asia, bounded on the north by Scythia, east by the Sacæ, south by Bactriana, and west by Margiana; and now known by the name of Zagatay, or Usbec. The people are called Sogdiani. The capital was called Marcanda. Herodot. 3, c. 93.—Curt. 7, c. 10.

Solicinium, a town of Germany, now Sultz, on the Neckar.

Solis fons, a celebrated fountain in Libya. Vid. Ammon.

Solœ, or Soli, I. a town of Cyprus, built on the borders of the Clarius by an Athenian colony. It was originally called Æpeia, till Solon visited Cyprus, and advised Philocyprus, one of the princes of the island, to change the situation of his capital. His advice was followed, and a new town was raised in a beautiful plain, and called after the name of the Athenian philosopher. Strab. 14.—Plut. in Sol. ——II. A town of Cilicia, on the seacoast, built by the Greeks and Rhodians. It was afterwards called Pompeiopolis, from Pompey, who settled a colony of pirates there. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Dionys. Some suppose that the Greeks who settled in either of these two towns, forgot the purity of their native language, and thence arose the term Solecismus, applied to an inelegant or improper expression.

Solghs, or Solœntia, I. a promontory of Libya at the extremity of mount Atlas, now Cape Cantin.——II. A town of Sicily, between Panormus and Himera, now Solanto. Cic. Ver. 3, c. 43.—Thucyd. 6.

Solus, (untis,) a maritime town of Sicily. Vid. Solæis. Strab. 14.

Solymi, a people of Lycia, who finally occupied the territory called Milyas. Vid. Lycia.

Sophene, a country of Armenia, on the borders of Mesopotamia, now Zopa. The Euphrates forms its boundary on the west and northwest. It is watered by the Arsanias, now Arsen. D'Anville.—Lucan. 2, v. 593.

Soracte, and Soracte, a mountain of Etruria, near the Tiber, seen from Rome at the distance of 26 miles. It was sacred to Apollo, who is from thence surnamed Soractis; and it is said that the priests of the god could walk over burning coals without hurting themselves. There was, as some report, a fountain on mount Soracte, whose waters boiled at sunrise and instantly killed all such birds as drank of them. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 93, l. 7, c. 2.—Horat. 1, Od. 9.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 785.—Ital. 5.

Sotiates, a people of Aquitania, of some note in the time of Cæsar. Their chief town Sotiacum, called in the middle ages Sotia or Sotium, is now Sos. D'Anville.—Lemaire.—Cæs. Bell. G. 3, c. 20 and 21.

Sparta. Vid. Lacedæmon.

Sperchius, a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Œta, and falling into the sea in the bay of Malia, near Anticyra. The name is supposed to be derived from its rapidity (σπερχειν festinare). Peleus vowed to the god of this river the hair of his son Achilles, if ever he returned safe from the Trojan war. Herodot. 7, c. 198.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 23, v. 144.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 557, l. 2, v. 250, l. 7, v. 230.

Spermatophagi a people who lived in the extremest parts of Egypt. They fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees.

Sphacteria. "The island of Sphacteria, so celebrated in Grecian history from the defeat and capture of a Lacedæmonian detachment in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian war, was also known by the name of Sphagia, which it still retains. Pliny says the Sphagiæ were three in number; Xenophen likewise speaks of some islands so called on the Laconian coast, meaning, doubtless, that of Messenia. Two of these must have been mere rocks." Cram.

Sphagiæ insulæ. Vid. Sphacteria.

Sphragidium, a retired cave on mount Cithæron in Bœotia. The nymphs of the place, called Sphragitides, were early honoured with a sacrifice by the Athenians, by order of the oracle of Delphi, because they had lost few men at the battle of Platæa. Plin. 35, c. 6.—Paus. 9, c. 3.—Plut. in Arist.

Spina, an ancient city of Cisalpine Gaul, of Greek origin, situated on the most southern branch of the Po, called from the city Spinetic um Ostium. "If we are to believe Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who derives his information apparently from Hellanicus of Lesbos, Spina was founded by a numerous band of Pelasgi, who arrived on this coast from Epirus long before the Trojan war. The same writer goes on to state, that in process of time this colony became very flourishing, and held for many years the dominion of the sea, from the fruits of which it was enabled to present to the temple of Delphi tithe-offerings more closely than those of any other city. Afterwards, however, being attacked by an overwhelming force of the surrounding barbarians, the Pelasgi were forced to quit their settlements, and finally to abandon Italy. It appears that no doubt can be entertained of the existence of a Greek city of this name near one of the mouths of the Po, since it is noticed in the Periplus of Scylax, and by the geographers Eudoxus and Artemidorus, as cited by Steph. Byz. Strabo also speaks of it as having once been a celebrated city, and possessed of a treasury at Delphi; the inscription recording that fact being still extant in his time. The same geographer adds besides, that Spina was yet in existence when he wrote, though reduced to the condition of a mere village. It is not easy to discover when the Pelasgi abandoned Spain, and who were the barbarians that forced them to quit the shores of the Adriatic. By the latter, I apprehend we must understand the Tuscans. The Tuscans themselves were in their turn dispossessed by the Gauls; and if the correction of Cluverius in the text of Pliny be admitted, it appears from that author, that Spina was taken and destroyed by the latter people the same year that Camillus took Veii, that is, 393 years B. C.: but to this it is objected, that Scylax, who is supposed to have written in the time of Philip, mentions Spina as then existing, which would be about thirty or forty years later than the date above mentioned. No trace now remains of this once flourishing city, by which its ancient site may be identified. Scylax says it stood about twenty stadia, or between three and four miles from the sea. But Strabo reports, that in his time the small place which preserved the name of Spina was situated upwards of eleven miles inland. We must therefore conclude that a considerable deposite of alluvial soil must have been made by the Po during the time which intervened between these two periods, or that the former site of the city had been removed to a greater distance from the sea. The first supposition is however the most probable, nor is it unlikely that the whole of the extensive marshes of Comachio were once washed by the Adriatic. I am for this reason inclined to adopt the opinion of those topographers who seek for the spot on which Spina stood, on the left bank of the Po di Primaro, the ancient Spineticum Ostium, and not far from the village of Argenta." Cram.

Spoletium, now Spoleto, a town of Umbria, "colonized A. U. C. 512. Twenty-five years afterwards it withstood, according to Livy, the attack of Hannibal, who was on his march through Umbria, after the battle of the Trasymene. This resistance had the effect of checking the advance of the Carthaginian general towards Rome, and compelled him to draw off his forces into Picenum. It should be observed, however, that Polybius makes no mention of this attack upon Spoleto; but expressly states, that it was not Hannibal's intention to approach Rome at that time, but to lead his army to the seacoast. Spoletium appears to have ranked high among the municipal towns of Italy, but it suffered severely from proscription in the civil wars of Marius and Sylla." Cram.

Sporades, a number of islands in the Ægean Sea. They received their name a σπειρω, spargo, "and included the numerous islands which lie scattered around the Cyclades, and which, in fact, several of them are intermixed, and those also which lay towards Crete and the coast of Asia Minor." Cram.

Stabiæ, a maritime town of Campania, on the bay of Puteoli, destroyed by Sylla, and converted into a villa, whither Plina endeavoured to escape from the eruption of Vesuvius in which he perished. Plin. 3, c. 5, ep. 6, c. 16.

Stagira, a town on the borders of Macedonia, on the bay into which the Strymon discharges itself, at the south of Amphipolis, founded 665 years before Christ. Aristotle was born there, from which circumstance he is called Stagirites. Thucyd. 4.—Paus. 6, c. 4.—Laert. in Sol.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 46.

Stellatis, a field remarkable for its fertility, in Campania. Cic. Aug. 1, c. 70.—Suet. Cæs. 20.

Stobi, a city of Macedonia, near the junction of the rivers Axius and Erigonus. It was "an ancient city of some note, as we learn from Livy, who reports, that Philip wished to found a new city in its vicinity, to be called Perseis, after his eldest son. The same monarch obtained a victory over the Dardani in the environs of Stobi, and it was from thence that he set out on his expedition to mount Hæmus. On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, it was made the depot of the salt with which the Dardani were supplied from that country. Stobi, at a later period, became not only a Roman colony, but a Roman municipium, a privilege rarely conferred beyond the limits of Italy. In the reign of Constantine, Stobi was considered as the chief town of Macedonia Secunda, or Salutaris, as it was then called. Steph. Byz. writes the name erroneously Στρύβος. Stobi was the birthplace of Jo. Stobæus, the author of the valuable Greek Florilegium which bears his name." Cram.

Stœchades, five small islands in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gaul, now the Hieres, near Marseilles. They were called Ligustides by some, but Pliny speaks of them as only three in number. Steph. Byzant.—Lucan. 3, v. 516.—Strab. 4.

Stratos, I. a city of Æolia. Liv. 36, c. 11, l. 38, c. 4.——II. Of Acarnania.

Strongyle, now Strombolo, one of the islands called Æolides in the Tyrrhene Sea, near the coast of Sicily. It has a volcano, 10 miles in circumference, which throws up flames continually, and of which the crater is on the side of the mountain. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 10, c. 11.

Strophades, two islands in the Ionian Sea, on the western coast of the Peloponnesus. They were anciently called Plotæ, and received the name of Strophades from στρεφω, verto, because Zethes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, returned from thence by order of Jupiter, after they had driven the Harpies there from the tables of Phineus. The fleet of Æneas stopped near the Strophades. The largest of these two islands is not above five miles in circumference. Hygin. fab. 19.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 709.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 210.—Strab. 8.

Strymæ, a town of Thrace, founded by a Thebean colony. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Strymon, a river which separates Thrace from Macedonia, and falls into a part of the Ægean Sea, which has been called Strymonicus sinus. A number of cranes, as the poets say, resorted on its banks in the summer time. Its eels were excellent. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 120, l. 4, v. 506. Æn. 10, v. 265.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 251.

Stymphălus, a town, river, lake, and fountain of Arcadia, which receives its name from king Stymphalus. The neighbourhood of the lake Stymphalus was infested with a number of voracious birds, like cranes or storks, which fed upon human flesh, and which were called Stymphalides. They were at last destroyed by Hercules, with the assistance of Minerva. Some have confounded them with the Harpies, while others pretend that they never existed but in the imagination of the poets. Pausanias, however, supports, that there were carnivorous birds like the Stymphalides, in Arabia. Paus. 8, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 296.

Styx, a celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to some writers the Styx was a small river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and venomous, that they proved fatal to such as tasted them. Among others Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal poison, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea that it was a river of hell, especially when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration, that they always swore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and to all their original privileges. It is said that this veneration was shown to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who, with her three daughters, assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 29, &c.—Lucan. 6, v. 378, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 17 and 18.—Curt. 10, c. 10.

Suburra, a street in Rome, where all the licentious, dissolute, and lascivious Romans and courtesans resorted. It was situate between mount Viminalis and Quirinalis, and was remarkable as having been the residence of the obscurer years of J. Cæsar. Suet. in Cæs.—Varro. de. L. L. 4, c. 8.—Martial. 6, ep. 66.—Juv. 3, v. 5.

Sucro, now Xucar, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, celebrated for a battle fought there between Sertorius and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. Plut.

Suessa, a town of Campania, called also Aurunca, to distinguish it from Suessa Pometia, the capital of the Volsci. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Liv. 1 and 2.—Virg. Æn. 6. v. 775. Cic. Phil. 3, c. 4, l. 4, c. 2.

Suessŏnes, a people of Belgic Gaul, whose territory was enclosed by those of the Veromandui, Remi, Senones, Parisii, and Bellovaci. Their capital was Noviodunum, now Soissons, dép. de l'Aisne; although it has been identified by some geographers with Noyon, dép. de l'Oise. Cæs. B. G. Lem. ed.

Suevi, a people of Germany, between the Elbe and the Vistula, who made frequent excursions upon the territories of Rome under the emperors. D'Anville thus speaks of this people. "A nation superior in power were the Catti, whom Cæsar, as before observed, calls Suevi. They occupied Hesse to the Sala in Thuringia, and Wetteravia to the Maine. Among other circumstances which enhanced the merit of this people, was that of their skill in the military art; which, according to Tacitus, the Cattians superadded to the quality of bravery common to the Germanic nations. A place which is mentioned under the name of Castellum continues this name in that of Cassel. Mattium is spoken of as the capital of the Cattians, and it is believed that this city is Marpurg. The internal part of this continent may be considered under the general name of Suevia; whence many Germanic nations have borrowed the denomination under which they appear. Suevia was divided among a number of distinct people. The Semnones, who were reputed the noblest and most ancient of the Suevian nations, extended from the Elbe beyond the Oder." Ptolemy represents the Suevi as consisting of three nations, the Angli, Longobardi, and Semnones: to these Pliny adds the Hermiones, whom Strabo calls Hermanduri. Lucan. 2, v. 51.

Sulga, now Sorgue, a small river of Gaul, falling into the Rhone. Strab. 4.

Sulmo, now Sulmona, an ancient town of the Peligni, at the distance of about 90 miles from Rome, founded by Solymus, one of the followers of Æneas. Ovid was born there. Ovid. passim.—Ital. 8, v. 511.—Strab. 5.

Sunium, "one of the most celebrated sites in Attica, forms the extreme point of that province towards the south. Near the promontory stood the town of the same name with a harbour. Sunium was held especially sacred to Minerva as early as the time of Homer. Neptune was also worshipped there, as we learn from Aristophanes. Regattas were held here in the minor Panathenaic festivals. The promontory of Sunium is frequently mentioned in Grecian history. Herodotus in one place calls it the Suniac angle. Thucydides reports that it was fortified by the Athenians after the Sicilian expedition, to protect their vessels which conveyed corn from Eubœa, and were consequently obliged to double the promontory. It is now called Capo Colonna, from the ruins of the temple of Minerva, which are still to be seen on its summit. Travellers who have visited Sunium inform us, that this edifice was originally decorated with six columns in front, and probably thirteen on each side. Spon reports that in his time nineteen columns were still standing. At present there are only fourteen. Sir W. Gell observes 'that nothing can exceed the beauty of this spot, commanding from a portico of white marble, erected in the happiest period of Grecian art, and elevated 300 feet above the sea, a prospect of the gulf of Ægina on one side, and of the Ægæan on the other.' Dodwell states, 'that the temple is supported on its northern side by a regularly constructed terrace wall, of which seventeen layers of stone still remain. The fallen columns are scattered about below the temple, to which they form the richest foreground. The walls of the town, of which there are few remains, may be traced nearly down to the port on the southern side; but the greater part of the opposite side, upon the edge of the precipice, was undefended, except by the natural strength of the place and the steepness of the rock; the walls were fortified with square towers." Cram.

SUPĒRUM MARE, a name of the Adriatic Sea, because it was situate above Italy. The name of Mare Inferum was applied for the opposite reasons to the sea below Italy. Cic. pro Cluent., &c.

SURRENTUM, a town of Campania, on the bay of Naples, famous for the wine which was made in the neighbourhood. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 17, v. 52.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 710.—Mart. 13, ep. 110.

SUSA, (orum,) now Suster, a celebrated city of Asia, the chief town of Susiana, and the capital of the Persian empire, built by Tithonus the father of Memnon. Cyrus took it. The walls of Susa were above 120 stadia in circumference. The treasures of the kings of Persia were generally kept there, and the royal palace was built with white marble, and its pillars were covered with gold and precious stones. It was usual with the kings of Persia to spend the summer at Ecbatana and the winter at Susa, because the climate was more warm there than at any other royal residence. It had been called Memnonia, or the palace of Memnon, because that prince reigned there. Plin. 6, c. 26, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 49.—Strab. 15.—Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, el. 13.—Claudian.

SUSIANA, or SUSIS, a country of Asia, of which the capital was called Susa, situate at the east of Assyria. Lilies grow in great abundance in Susiana, and it is from that plant that the province received its name, according to some, as Susan is the name of a lily in Hebrew.

SUSIDÆ PYLÆ, narrow passes over mountains from Susiana into Persia. Curt. 5, c. 3.

SUTHUL, a town of Numidia, where the king's treasures were kept. Sall. Jug. 37.

SUTRIUM, a town of Etruria, about twenty-four miles northwest of Rome. Some suppose that the phrase Ire Sutrium, to act with despatch, arises from the celerity with which Camillus recovered the place; but Festus explains it differently. Plaut. Cas. 3, 1, v. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 34.—Paterc. 1, c. 14.—Liv. 9, c. 32.

SYBARIS, a river of Lucania in Italy, whose waters were said to render men more strong and robust. Strab. 6. Plin. 3, c. 11, l. 31, c. 2.—There was a town of the same name on its banks, on the bay of Tarentum, which had been founded by a colony of Achæans. Sybaris became very powerful, and in its most flourishing situation it had the command of four neighbouring nations of 25 towns, and could send an army of 300,000 men into the field. The walls of the city were said to extend six miles and a half in circumference, and the suburbs covered the banks of the Crathis for the space of seven miles. It made a long and vigorous resistance against the neighbouring town of Crotona, till it was at last totally reduced by the disciples of Pythagoras, B. C. 508. Sybaris was destroyed no less than five times, and always repaired. In a more recent age the inhabitants became so effeminate, that the word Sybarite became proverbial to intimate a man devoted to pleasure. There was a small town built in the neighbourhood about 444 years before the Christian era, and called Thurium, from a small fountain called Thuria, where it was built. Diod. 12.—Strab. 6.—Ælian, V. H. 9, c. 24.—Martial. 12, ep. 96.—Plut. in Pelop. &c.—Plin. 3, c. 10, &c.

SYĒNE, now Assuan, a town of Thebais, on the extremities of Egypt. Juvenal the poet was banished there on pretence of commanding a prætorian cohort stationed in the neighbourhood. "Near Assouan are found the remains of the ancient Syene, consisting of some granite columns, and an old square building, with openings at top. The researches made here have not confirmed the conjecture of Savary, who conceived it to be the ancient observatory of the Egyptians, where, with some digging, the ancient well may be found, at the bottom of which the image of the sun was reflected entire on the day of the summer solstice. The observations of the French astronomers place Assooan in lat. 24° 5′ 23″ of north latitude. If this place was formerly situated under the tropic, the position of the earth must be a little altered, and the obliquity of the ecliptic diminished. But we should be aware of the vagueness of the observations made by the ancients, which have conferred so much celebrity on these places. The phenomenon of the extinction of the shadow, whether within a deep pit, or round a perpendicular gnomon, is not confined to one exact mathematical position of the sun, but is common to a certain extent of latitude corresponding to the visible diameter of that luminary, which is more than half a degree. It would be sufficient, therefore, that the northern margin of the sun's disk should reach the zenith of Syene on the day of the summer solstice, to abolish all lateral shadow of a perpendicular object. Now, in the second century, the obliquity of the ecliptic, reckoned from the observations of Hipparchus, was 23° 49′ 25″. If we add the semi-diameter of the sun, which is 15′ 57″, we find for the northern margin 24° 5′ 22″, which is within a second of the actual latitude of Syene. At present, when the obliquity of the ecliptic is 23° 28′ the northern limb of the sun comes no nearer the latitude of Syene than 21′ 3″, yet the shadow is scarcely perceptible. We have, therefore, no imperious reason for admitting a greater diminution in the obliquity of the ecliptic than that which is shown by real astronomical observations of the most exact and authentic kind. That of the well of Syene is not among the number of these last, and can give us no assistance in ascertaining the position of the tropic thirty centuries ago, as some respectable men of science seem to have believed. Syene, which, under so many different masters has been the southern frontier of Egypt, presents in a greater degree than any other spot on the surface of the globe, that confused mixture of monuments which, even in the destinies of the most potent nations, remind us of human instability. Here the Pharaohs and the Ptolemies raised the temples and the palaces which are found half buried under the drifting sand. Here are forts and walls built by the Romans and the Arabians, and on the remains of all these buildings French inscriptions are found, attesting that the warriors and the learned men of modern Europe pitched their tents, and erected their observatories on this spot. But the eternal power of nature presents a still more magnificent spectacle. Here are the terraces of reddish granite of a particular character, hence called Syenite, a term applied to those rocks which differ from granite in containing particles of hornblende. These mighty terraces, shaped like peaks, cross the bed of the Nile; and over them the river rolls majestically his impetuous foaming waves. Here are the quarries from which the obelisks and colossal statues of the Egyptian temples were dug. An obelisk, partially formed and still remaining attached to the native rock, bears testimony to the laborious and patient efforts of human art. On the polished surfaces of these rocks hieroglyphic sculptures represent the Egyptian deities, together with the sacrifices and offerings of this nation, which, more than any other, has identified itself with the country which it inhabited, and has in the most literal sense engraved the records of its glory on the terrestrial globe. In the midst of this valley, generally skirted with arid rocks, a series of sweet delicious islands, covered with palms, date-trees, mulberries, acacias, and napecas, has merited the appellation of the 'Tropical Gardens.'" Malte-Brun.

Syracusæ, a celebrated city of Sicily, founded about 732 years before the Christian era, by Archias, a Corinthian, and one of the Heraclidæ. In its flourishing state it extended 22 1-2 English miles in circumference, and was divided into 4 districts, Ortygia, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis, to which some add a fifth division, Epipolæ, a district little inhabited. These were of themselves separate cities, and were fortified with three citadels, and three-folded walls. Syracuse had two capacious harbours, separated from one another by the island of Ortygia. The greatest harbour was above 5000 paces in circumference, and its entrance 500 paces wide. The people of Syracuse were very opulent and powerful; and, though subject to tyrants, they were masters of vast possessions and dependant states. The city of Syracuse was well built, its houses were stately and magnificent; and it has been said that it produced the best and most excellent of men when they were virtuous, but the most wicked and depraved when addicted to vicious pursuits. The women of Syracuse were not permitted to adorn themselves with gold, or wear costly garments, except such as prostituted themselves. Syracuse gave birth to Theocritus and Archimedes. It was under different governments, and, after being freed from the tyranny of Thrasybulus, B. C. 446, it enjoyed security for 61 years, till the usurpation of the Dionysii, who were expelled by Timoleon, B. C. 343. In the age of the elder Dionysius, an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and 400 ships, were kept in constant pay. It fell into the hands of the Romans, under the consul Marcellus, after a siege of three years, B. C. 212. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 52 and 53.—Strab. 1 and 8.—*C. Syria, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries are not accurately ascertained by the ancients. Syria, generally speaking, was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, north by mount Taurus, west by the Mediterranean, and south by Arabia. It was divided into several districts and provinces, among which were Phœnicia, Seleucis, Judea or Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria. It was also called Assyria; and the words Syria and Assyria, though distinguished and defined by some authors, were often used indifferently. Syria was subjected to the monarchs of Persia; but after the death of Alexander the Great, Seleucus, surnamed Nicator, who had received this province as his lot in the division of the Macedonian dominions, raised it into an empire, known in history by the name of the kingdom of Syria or Babylon, B. C. 312. Seleucus died after a reign of 32 years, and his successors, surnamed the Seleucidæ, ascended the throne in the following order: Antiochus, surnamed Soter, 280 B. C; Antiochus Theos, 261; Seleucus Callinicus, 246; Seleucus Ceraunus, 226; Antiochus the Great, 223; Seleucus Philopator, 187; Antiochus Epiphanes, 175; Antiochus Eupator, 164; Demetrius Soter, 162; Alex. Balas, 150; Demetrius Nicator, 146; Antiochus the Sixth, 144; Diodotus Tryphon, 143; Antiochus Sidetes, 139; Demetrius Nicator restored, 130; Alexander Zebina, 127, who was dethroned by Antiochus Grypus, 123; Antiochus Cyzicenus, 142, who takes part of Syria, which he calls Cœlesyria; Philip and Demetrius Eucerus 93, and in Cœlesyria, Antiochus Pius; Aretas was king of Cœlesyria, 85; Tigranes, king of Armenia, 83; and Antiochus Asiaticus, 69, who was dethroned by Pompey, B. C. 65; in consequence of which Syria became a Roman province. "A situation bordering upon the Parthian empire, and also upon the second empire of the Persians, must have made the defence of this province an object of the greatest importance. Syria constituted by much the greatest part of that Diœcese (for so the great departments established before the end of the fourth century were named) called Orient; comprising Palestine, a district of Mesopotamia, the province of Cilicia, and the isle of Cyprus. By a division of primitive provinces, there appear five in the limits of Syria: two Syrias, Prima and Secunda or Salutaris; two Phœnicias, one properly so called, and the other surnamed Libani, by the extension of the anterior limits of Phœnice; and finally, the Euphratensis. In the sacred writings Syria is called Aram. The Arabs now give it the name of Sham, which in their language signifies the left, its situation being such on facing the east." D'Anville.—Herodot. 2, 3, and 7.—Apollod. 1, Arg.—Strab. 12 and 16.—*C. Syrtis. "Among the ancients the name of Syrtis, (from σύρω, traho,) was common to two gulfs on the coast of Africa, distinguished into Major and Minor; which, from the rocks and quicksands, and a remarkable inequality in the motion of the waters, were deemed of perilous navigation. Mariners, corrupting the name, have called the great Syrtis the Gulf of Sidra. A promontory named heretofore Cephalæ, or The Heads, and now Canan, or Cape Mesrata, terminates the Syrtis. The little Syrtis is now called the Gulf of Gabes, from the ancient city of Tacape, situated at its head, and preserving its name in this altered form." D'Anville. From the dangers attending the navigation of the Syrtis, the word has been used to denote any part of the sea of which the navigation was attended with danger either from whirlpools or hidden rocks. Mela, 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 7.—*Virg. Tabor, a mountain of Palestine. It is thus described by Russell: "In pursuing this route (from Tiberias to Nazareth) we have Mount Tor, or Tabor, on the left hand, rising in solitary majesty from the plain of Esdraëlon. Its appearance has been described by some authors as that of a half-sphere, while to others it suggests the idea of a cone with its point struck off. According to Mr. Maundrell, the height is such as to require the labour of an hour to reach the summit; where is seen a level area of an oval figure, extending about two furlongs in length and one in breadth. It is enclosed with trees on all sides except the south, and is most fertile and delicious. Having been anciently surrounded with walls and trenches, there are remains of considerable fortifications at the present day. Burckhardt says, a thick wall constructed of large stones, may be traced quite round the summit close to the edge of the precipice; on several parts of which are relics of bastions. The area too is overspread with the ruins of private dwellings, built of stone with great solidity. Pococke assures us that it is one of the finest hills he ever beheld, being a rich soil that produces excellent herbage, and most beautifully adorned with groves and clumps of trees. The height he calculates to be about two miles, making allowance for the winding ascent; but he adds, that others have imagined the same path to be not less than four miles. Hasselquist conjectures that it is a league to the top, the whole of which may be accomplished without dismounting,—a statement amply confirmed by the experience of Van Egmont and Heyman. But this mountain derives the largest share of its celebrity from the opinion entertained among Christians since the days of Jerome, that it was the scene of a memorable event in the history of our Lord. On the eastern part of the hill are the remains of a strong castle; and within the precincts of it is the grotto in which are three altars in memory of the three tabernacles that St. Peter proposed to build, and where the Latin friars always perform mass on the anniversary of the Transfiguration. It is said there was a magnificent church built there by Helena, which was a cathedral when this town was made a bishop's see. On the side of the hill they show a church in the grot, where they say Christ charged his disciples not to tell what things they had seen till he should be glorified. It is very doubtful, however, whether this tradition be well founded, or whether it has not as Mr. Maundrell and other writers suspect, originated in the misinterpretation of a very common Greek phrase. Our Saviour is said to have taken with him Peter, James, and John, and brought them into a high mountain 'apart;' from which it has been rather hastily inferred that the description must apply to Tabor, the only insulated and solitary hill in the neighbourhood. We may remark, with the traveller just named, that the conclusion may possibly be true, but that the argument used to prove it seems incompetent; because the term 'apart' most likely relates to the withdrawing and retirement of the persons here spoken of, and not to the situation of the mountain. In fact, it means nothing more than that our Lord and his three disciples betook themselves to a private place for the purpose of devotion. The view from Mount Tabor is extolled by every traveller. 'It is impossible,' says Maundrell, 'for man's eyes to behold a higher gratification of this nature.' On the northwest you discern in the distance the noble expanse of the Mediterranean, while all around you see the spacious and beautiful plains of Esdraëlon and Galilee. Turning a little southward, you have in view the high mountains of Gilboa, so fatal to Saul and his sons. Due east you discover the sea of Tiberias, distant about one day's journey. A few points to the north appears the mount of Beatitudes, the place where Christ delivered his sermon to his disciples and the multitude. Not far from this little hill is the city of Saphet, or Szaffad, standing upon elevated and very conspicuous ground. Still farther in the same direction, is seen a lofty peak covered with snow, a part of the chain of Anti-Libanus. To the southwest is Carmel, and in the south the hills of Samaria."

TANĂGRA, "a considerable town, situated in a rich and fertile country on the left bank of the Asopus. Its most ancient appellation was said to be Græa, though Stephanus asserts that some writers considered them as two distinct cities, and Strabo also appears to be of this opinion. Aristotle affirmed that Oropus ought to be identified with Græa. Herodotus informs us, that at an early period the district of Tanagra was occupied by the Gephyræi, Phœnicians who had followed Cadmus, and from thence afterwards migrated to Athens. The following description of this city is to be found in Dicæarchus. 'The town itself is situated on a lofty and rugged eminence; it is white and chalky in appearance, but the houses are beautifully adorned with handsome porticoes, painted in the encaustic style. The surrounding country does not produce much corn, but it grows the best wine in Bœotia. The inhabitants are wealthy, but frugal, being for the most part landholders, not manufacturers; they are observers of justice, good faith, and hospitality, giving freely to such of their fellow-citizens as are in want, and also to necessitous travellers; in short, they seem to shun every thing which looks like meanness and avarice. There is no city in all Bœotia where strangers can reside so securely; for there is no exclusive and over-rigid pride exhibited towards those who have been unfortunate, owing to the independent and industrious habits of the citizens. I never saw in any town so little appearance of any inclination to profligacy, which is the most frequent source of crime amongst men. For where there is a sufficiency, the love of gain is not harboured, and vice is consequently excluded.' Tanagra, as Pausanias further reports, was famed for its breed of fighting cocks. The ruins of this town were at first discovered, I believe, by Mr. Cockerell, at Græmada, or Grimatki, near the village of Skoimandari; he found there vestiges of its walls and theatre. Mr. Hawkins, in a letter to Dr. Clarke, gives the following accurate account of its topography. 'The Asopus is in winter a muddy torrent, and for eight months of the year wholly dry. Journeying from Parnes towards Thebes, soon after leaving the banks of this river the plain ceases, and you reach a gently undulating territory, in which is situated the Albanian village of Skoimatari, inhabited by forty families. The ruins of Tanagra are at a spot called Grimatha, about three miles to the southwest, at the end of a ridge of hills which extend from thence several miles towards Thebes. The ground too has a gradual ascent from these ruins towards the Asopus, and the great plain beyond it, which it proudly overlooks, and which I have no doubt it formerly commanded. There are no well preserved remains of public edifices or walls at Gramatki.' Tanagra possessed a considerable extent of territory, and had several smaller towns in its dependance." Cram.

TANĂGRUS, or TANĂGER, now Negro, a river of Lucania in Italy, remarkable for its cascades, and the beautiful meanders of its streams, through a fine picturesque country. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.

TANAIS, a river of Scythia, now the Don, which divides Europe from Asia, and falls into the Palus Mæotis, after a rapid course, and after it has received the additional streams of many small rivulets. A town at its mouth bore the same name. Mela, 1, c. 19.—Strab. 11 and 16.—Curt. 6, c. 2.—Lucan. 3, 8, &c. "The Don issues from the lake Ivanow, and waters a hilly and fruitful country until it reaches Worenesch. It is enclosed on the left, from that town to the confluence of the Donetz, by steep banks of chalk, but as it proceeds in its course, it enters an immense and unvaried plain, its streams are not confined by rocks, nor broken by cataracts. Its depth even in these plains is not less in winter than six or seven feet, but the water does not rise in summer to the height of two feet above its sandy bed. Navigation is thus prevented, and the water of the Don, like that of its feeders, is so bad, that the inhabitants themselves can hardly drink it. Much advantage, it is thought, might result if the river were united to the Wolga by means of the Medweditza, or rather the Ilawla, but few boats could sail by such a passage from the want of water in the Don, and from the difference in the level, which is fifty feet higher on the side of the same river than on that of the Wolga. The former receives from the Caspian steppes the Manytsch of which the almost stagnant waters seem to mark the position of an ancient strait between the Caspian and the sea of Azof." Malte-Brun. Vid. Iazartes.

TAPROBĀNA, an island in the Indian ocean, now called Ceylon. The Greeks only became acquainted with these distant regions after the arms of the Macedonians had established a Greek empire on the ruins of the Persian. This place was then "deemed the commencement of another world, inhabited by Antichthones, or men in a position opposite to those in the known hemisphere. The name of Salice, which we learn from Ptolemy to be the native denomination for this island, is preserved in that of Selendive, compounded of the proper name Selen, and the appellative for an island in the Indian language; and it is apparent that the name of Ceilan, or Ceylon, according to the European usage, is only an alteration in orthography. The islands which Ptolemy places off Taprobana to the number of thirteen hundred and seventy, can be no other than the Mal-dives, although known to be much more numerous." D'Anville.

TARENTUM, TARENTUS, or TARAS, a town of Apulia, situate on a bay of the same name, near the mouth of the river Galesus. "The Spartans, it is said, being engaged in a long and arduous war with the Messenians, whose territory they had invaded, began to apprehend lest their protracted absence should be attended with the failure of that increase in their population at home, which was so necessary to supply the losses produced by the lapse of time and the sword of the enemy. To remedy this evil, it was determined therefore to send to Laconia a select body of youths, from whom in due time would arise a supply of recruits for the war. The children, who were the fruit of the intercourse between these warriors and the Spartan maids, received the name of Parthenii; but on their arriving at the age of manhood they found the Messenian war concluded, and being regarded as the offspring of illicit love, and in other respects treated with indignity, they formed the design of subverting the government, in conjunction with the Helots. The plot however, was discovered; but so dangerous did the conspiracy appear, and so formidable was their number, that it was thought more prudent to remove them out of the country by persuasion than to use severity or to employ force. A treaty was therefore agreed upon, by which the Parthenians bound themselves to quit Sparta forever, provided they could acquire possessions in a foreign land. They accordingly sailed to Italy, under the command of Phalanthus; and finding the Cretans, and, as Ephorus states, the Achæans, already settled in that country, and engaged in a war with the natives, they joined their forces to those of the Greeks, and possessed themselves of Tarentum, which Pausanias affirms to have been already a very considerable and opulent town. According to the best chronologists, these events may be supposed to have happened about 700 years A. C. when Numa Pompilius was king of Rome. Possessed of a noble haven place in the centre of its widely extended bay, and having at command those resources which the salubrity of climate and fertility of soil in every variety of production afforded, it seemed destined to become the seat of commerce and wealth, if not that of empire. The proximity of the ports of Istria and Illyria, of Greece and Sicily, favoured commercial intercourse, while the vessels of these several states were naturally induced to profit by the only spacious and secure haven which the eastern coast of Italy presented. It is probable that the constitution of the Tarentines, in the first instance, was modelled after that of the parent state; at least Herodotus has certified, that in his time they were governed by a king. According to Strabo, however, that constitution afterwards assumed the form of a democracy, in consequence of a revolution which seems to have taken place. It was then, as Strabo adds, that this city reached its highest point of elevation. At this most prosperous period of the republic, which may be supposed to date about 400 years before Christ, when Rome was engaged in the siege of Veii, and Greece enjoyed some tranquillity after the long struggle of the Peloponnesian war terminated by the fall of Athens, Archytas, a distinguished philosopher of the school of Pythagoras, and an able statesman, presided over her councils as strategos. Her navy was far superior to that of any other Italian colony. Nor were her military establishments less formidable and efficient; since she could bring into the field a force of 30,000 foot and 5,000 horse, exclusive of a select body of cavalry, called Hipparchi. The Tarentines were long held in great estimation as auxiliary troops, and were frequently employed in the armies of foreign princes and states. Nor was the cultivation of the arts and of literature forgotten in this advancement of political strength and civilization. The Pythagorean sect, which in other parts of Magna Græcia had been so barbarously oppressed, here found encouragement and refuge through the influence of Archytas, who was said to have entertained Plato during his residence in this city. But this grandeur was not of long duration; for wealth and abundance soon engendered a love of ease and luxury, the consequences of which proved fatal to the interests of Tarentum, by sapping the vigour of her institutions, enervating the minds and corrupting the morals of her inhabitants. Enfeebled and degraded by this system of demoralization and corruption, the Tarentines soon found themselves unable as heretofore to overawe and keep in subjection the neighbouring barbarians of Iapygia, who had always hated and feared, but now learned to despise them. These, leagued with the still more warlike Lucanians, who had already become the terror of Magna Græcia, now made constant inroads on their territory, and even threatened the safety of their city. But a more formidable enemy now appeared in the lists, to cope with whom singly appeared out of the question: and the Tarentines again had recourse in this emergency to foreign aid and counsels. The valour and forces of Pyrrhus for a time averted the storm, and checked the victorious progress of the Roman armies; but when that prince withdrew from Italy, Tarentum could no longer resist her powerful enemies, and soon after fell into their hands; the surrender of the town being hastened by the treachery of the Epirot force which Pyrrhus had left there. The independence of Tarentum may be said to terminate here, though the conquerors pretended still to recognise the liberty of her citizens. From this period the prosperity and political existence of Tarentum may date its decline, which was further accelerated by the preference shown by the Romans to the port of Brundusium for the fitting out of their naval armaments, as well as for commercial purposes. The salubrity of its climate, the singular fertility of its territory, and its advantageous situation on the sea, as well as on the Appian Way, still rendered it, however, a city of consequence in the Augustan age. Strabo reports, that though a great portion of its extent was deserted in his time, the inhabited part still constituted a large town. That geographer describes the 'inner harbour, as being 100 stadia, or twelve miles and a half, in circuit. This port, in the part of its basin which recedes the furthest inland, forms, with the exterior sea, an isthmus connecting the peninsula on which the town is built with the land. This isthmus is so completely level, that it is easy to carry vessels over it from one side to the other. The site of the town is very low; the ground rises, however, a little towards the citadel. The circumference of the old walls is great; but a considerable portion of the town, seated on the isthmus, is now deserted. That part of it, however, situated near the mouth of the harbour, where the citadel stands, is yet occupied. It possesses a noble gymnasium, and a spacious forum, in which is placed a colossal image of Jove, yielding only in size to that of Rhodes. The citadel is situated between the forum and the entrance of the harbour.' It is remarked as an unusual circumstance by Polybius, that in this city the dead were buried within the walls, which custom he ascribed to a superstitious motive." Cram. Tarentum, now called Tarento, is inhabited by about 18,000 souls, who still maintain the character of their forefathers, and live chiefly by fishing. Flor. 1, c. 18.—*Val. TARRACINA, a town of Latium, in the country of the Volsci and the vicinity of the Pontine marshes. Its early name, perhaps, when it was yet a Volscian town, was Anxur, and "we learn from Horace that this city stood on the lofty rock at the foot of which the modern Terracina is situated. According to Strabo, it was first named Trachina, a Greek appellation indicative of the ruggedness of its situation. Ovid calls it Trachas. The first intimation we have of the existence of this city is from Polybius; who, in his account of the first treaty which was concluded between the Romans and Carthaginians, enumerates Tarracina among the Latin cities in the alliance of the former. Tarracina subsequently became of consequence as a naval station; its port is noticed by Livy, and it is classed by that historian with those colonies which were required to furnish sailors and stores for the Roman fleet. The garrison of Tarracina joined Cæsar in his march to Brundusium. From Tacitus we learn that it was a municipium; and the efforts made by the parties of Vitellius and Vespasian to obtain possession of this town, sufficiently prove that it was then looked upon as a very important post. The poets invariably call it Anxur." Cram.

TARRĂCO, now Tarragona, a city of Spain, situate on the shores of the Mediterranean, founded by the two Scipios, who planted a Roman colony there. The province of which it was the capital was called Tarraconensis, and was famous for its wines. Hispania Tarraconensis, which was also called by the Romans Hispania Citerior, was bounded on the east by the Mediterranean, the ocean on the west, the Pyrenean mountains and the sea of the Cantabra on the north, and Lusitania and Bætica on the south. Martial. 10, ep. 104, l. 13, ep. 118.—Mela, 2, c. 6. Sil. 3, v. 369, l. 15, v. 177.

TARSIUS, a river of Troas. Strab.

TARSUS, now Tarasso, a town of Cilicia, on the Cydnus, founded by Triptolemus and a colony of Argives, or, as others say, by Sardanapalus, or by Perseus. Tarsus was celebrated for the great men it produced. It was once the rival of Alexandria and Athens in literature and the study of the polite arts. The people of Tarsus wished to ingratiate themselves into the favour of J. Cæsar by giving the name of Juliopolis to their city, but it was soon lost. Lucan. 3, v. 225.—Mela, 1, c. 13.—Strab. 14.

Tartessus, a place in Hispania, the site of which is a matter of so much dispute, that it is not clearly known whether it was a town or a district. It is probable that the ports to which the Phœnicians first were accustomed to trade upon the southern coast received this name, and the jealous care with which they concealed the sources of their commercial profit, encouraged the discordant conjectures of those who represented it now as an island in the farthest west, and now as a river, a town, and a province. According to the opinion of Bossi and Depping, which we embrace, and which assigns to all the Phœnician colonies in Spain the epithet of Tartessus, we may suppose that the whole extent of coast from Calpe, perhaps to the mouth of the Anas, and each of the principal towns by which it was distinguished for a time, were known by this name so long as they were known by name alone. This would reconcile all difference of opinion, and conciliate the reasons which are brought to prove that the appellation of Tartessus belonged to Carteia, with those, equally strong, which make it clear that the island of Gadir and the city of Gades were frequently designated by that term. The Romans likewise mistook it for the island of Erythea; and many supposed, which is not improbable, that a town to which this name peculiarly belonged was situate upon the mouth of the Bætis, opposite the more famous city of Gades. In the time of Strabo it was found impossible to determine this point; and, if there had been once a town, that bore this title, to indicate its site. Mannert supposes that it was the same as Hispalis, the modern Seville. Bossi. St. Spagna.

Tarvana, a town of Gaul, now Terrouen in Artois.

Taurini, the inhabitants of Taurinum, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now called Turin, in Piedmont. Sil. 3, v. 646. "The Taurini probably occupied both banks of the Po, but especially the country situated between that river and the Alps, as far as the river Orcus, Orca, to the east, while the position of Fines, Avilia-na, given by the Itineraries, fixed their limit to the west. The Taurini are first mentioned in history as having opposed Hannibal soon after his descent from the Alps; and their capital, which Appian calls Taurasia, was taken and plundered by that general, after an ineffectual resistance of three days. As a Roman colony, it subsequently received the name of Augusta Taurinorum, which is easily recognised in that of Torino, the present capital of Piedmont." Cram.

Tauromenium, a town of Sicily, between Messana and Catania, built by the Zancleans, Sicilians, and Hybleans, in the age of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse. The hills in the neighbourhood were famous for the fine grapes which they produced, and they surpassed almost the whole world for the extent and beauty of their prospects. There is a small river near it called Tauromenius. Diod. 16.

Taurus, the largest mountain of Asia, as to extent. "The mountains of Taurus, according to all the descriptions of the ancients, extended from the frontiers of India to the Ægean Sea. Their principal chain, as it shot out from mount Imaus towards the sources of the Indus, winded, like an immense serpent, between the Caspian Sea, and the Pontus Euxinus on one side, and the sources of the Euphrates on the other. Caucasus seems to have formed part of this line according to Pliny; but Strabo, who was better informed, traced the principal chain of Taurus between the basins of the Euphrates and the Auraxes, observing that a detached chain of Caucasus, that of the Moschin mountains, runs in a southern direction and joins the Taurus. Modern accounts represent this junction as not very marked. Strabo, who was born on the spot, and who had travelled as far as Armenia, considers the entire centre of Asia Minor, together with all Armenia, Media, and Gordvene, or Koordistan, as a very elevated country, crowned with several chains of mountains, all of which are so closely joined together that they may be regarded as one. 'Armenia and Media,' says he, 'are situated upon Taurus.' This plateau seems also to comprehend Koordistan, and the branches which it sends out extend into Persia, as far as the great desert of Kerman on one side, and towards the sources of the Gihon and the Indus on the other. By thus considering the vast Taurus of the ancients as an upland plain, and not as a chain, the testimonies of Strabo and Pliny may be reconciled with the accounts of modern travellers. Two chains of mountains are detached from the plateau of Armenia to enter the peninsula of Asia; the one first confines and then crosses the channel of the Euphrates near Samosata; the other borders the Pontus Euxinus, leaving only narrow plains between it and that sea. These two chains, one of which is in part the Anti-Taurus, and the other the Paryades of the ancients, or the mountain Tcheldir or Keldir of the moderns, are united to the west of the Euphrates, between the towns of Siwas, Tocat, and Kaisaria, by means of the chain of the Argæus, now named Argis-Dag, whose summit is covered with perpetual snows, a circumstance which, under so low a latitude, shows an elevation of from 9 to 10,000 feet. The centre of Asia resembles a terrace supported on all sides by chains of mountains. Here we find salt marshes, and rivers which have no outlets. It contains a number of small plateaus, one of which Strabo has described under the name of the plain of Bagaudæ. 'The cold there,' says he, 'prevents the fruit trees from thriving, whilst olive-trees grow near Sinope, which is 3000 stadia more to the north.' Modern travellers have also found very extensive elevated plains throughout the interior of Asia Minor, either in the south, towards Konieh, or in the north, towards Angora. But all the borders of this plateau constitute so many chains of mountains, which sometimes encircle the plateau, and sometimes extend across the lower plains. The chain which, breaking off at once from mount Argæus and from Anti-Taurus, bounds the ancient Cilicia to the north, is more particularly known by the name of Taurus, a name which in several languages appears to have one common root, and simply signifies mountain. The elevation of this chain must be considerable, since Cicero affirms that it was impassable to armies before the month of June on account of the snow. Diodorus details the frightful ravines and precipices which it is necessary to cross in going from Cilicia into Cappadocia. Modern travellers, who have crossed more to the west of the chain now called Ala-Dagh, represent it as similar to that of the Apennines and mount Hemus. It sends off to the west several branches, some of which terminate on the shores of the Mediterranean, as the Cragus, and the Masicystes of the ancients, in Lycia; the others, greatly inferior in elevation, extend to the coast of the Archipelago, opposite the islands of Cos and Rhodes. To the east, mount Amanus, now the Almadagh, a detached branch of the Taurus, separates Cilicia from Syria, having only two narrow passes, the one towards the Euphrates, the other close by the sea; the first answers to the Amanian defiles (Pylæ Amaniæ) of the ancients, the other to the defiles of Syria. The latter, with their perpendicular and peaked rocks, are the only ones that have been visited by modern travellers. Two other chains of mountains are sent off from the western part of the central plateau. The one is the Baba-Dagh of the moderns, which formed the Tmolus, the Messogis, and the Sipylus of the ancients, and which terminates towards the islands of Samos and Chios; the other, extending in a northwest direction, presents more elevated summits, among which are the celebrated Ida and Olympus (of Mysia). Lastly, the northern side of the plateau is propelled towards the Black Sea, and gives rise to the chain of the Olgassys, now Elkas-Dagh, a chain which fills with its branches all the space between the Sangarius and the Halys. The summits retain their snow until August. The ancients highly extol the marbles of Asia Minor, but from the Sangarius to the Halys we meet with nothing but granite rocks." Malte-Brun.

Taygĕtus, or Taygĕta, (orum,) a mountain of Laconia, in Peloponnesus. "It forms part of a lofty ridge, which traversing the whole of Laconia from the Areadian frontier terminates in the sea at Cape Tænarum. Its elevation was said to be so great as to command a view of the whole of Peloponnesus, as may be seen from a fragment of the Cyprian verses preserved by the scholiast of Pindar. This great mountain abounded with various kinds of beasts for the chase, and supplied also the celebrated race of hounds, so much valued by the ancients on account of their sagacity and keenness of scent. It also furnished a beautiful green marble, much esteemed by the Romans. In the terrible earthquake which desolated Laconia, before the Peloponnesian war, it is related that immense masses of rock, detaching themselves from the mountain, caused dreadful devastation in their fall, which is said to have been foretold by Anaximander of Miletus. The principal summit of Taygetus, named Taletum, rose above Bryseæ. It was dedicated to the sun, and sacrifices of horses were there offered to that planet. This point is probably the same now called St. Elias. Two other parts of the mountain were called Evoras and Theras. Mr. Dodwell says, 'Taygetus runs in a direction nearly north and south, uniting to the north with the chain of Lycæum, and terminating its opposite point at the Tænarian promontory. Its western side rises from the Messenian gulf, and its eastern foot bounds the level plain of Amyclæ, from which it rises abruptly, adding considerably to its apparent height, which is probably inferior only to Pindus and Olympus. It is visible from Zacynthus, which, in a straight line, is distant from it at least eighty-four miles. The northern crevices are covered with snow during the whole year. Its outline, particularly as seen from the north, is of a more serrated form than the other Grecian mountains. It has five principal summits, whence it derives the modern name of Pentedactylos.'" Cram.

Teănum, a town of Campania, on the Appian road, at the east of the Liris, called also Sidicinum, to be distinguished from another town of the same name at the west of Apulia, at a small distance from the coast of the Adriatic. The rights of citizenship were extended to it under Augustus. Cic. Cluent. 9 and 69, Phil. 12, c. 11.—Horat. 1, ep. 1.—Plin. 31, c. 2.—Liv. 22, c. 27.

Tearus, a river of Thrace, rising in the same rock from 38 different sources, some of which are hot and others cold. "At the head of this river, Darius, in his Scythian expedition, erected a pillar, with an inscription pronouncing the waters of the Tearus to be the purest and best in the universe, as he himself was the fairest of men." Cram.

Teches, a mountain of Pontus, from which the 10,000 Greeks had first a view of the sea. Xenoph. Anab. 4.

Tectosăges, or Tectosăgæ, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, whose capital was the modern Toulouse. They received the name of Tectosagæ quod sagis tegerentur. Some of them passed into Germany, where they settled near the Hercynian forest, and another colony passed into Asia. (Vid. Galatia.) The Tectosagæ were among those Gauls who pillaged Rome under Brennus, and who attempted some time after, to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. At their return home from Greece they were visited by a pestilence, and ordered, to stop it, to throw into the river all the riches and plunder they had obtained in their distant excursions. *Cæs. TĒGĔA, or TEGEA, now Moklia, a town of Arcadia in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tegeates, a son of Lycaon, or, according to others, by Altus. The gigantic bones of Orestes were found buried there, and removed to Sparta. Apollo and Pan were worshipped there; and there also Ceres, Proserpine, and Venus, had each a temple. The inhabitants were called Tegeates; and the epithet Tegæa is given to Atalanta, as a native of the place. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 7.—Fast. 6, v. 531.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 293.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 45, &c.

TELCHINES, a people of Rhodes, said to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many useful arts, and, according to Diodorus, passed for the sons of the sea. They were the first who raised statues to the gods. The Telchinians insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, and Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 365, &c.

TELEBOÆ, or TELEBOES, a people of Greece. "The Teleboæ, or Taphii, as they are likewise called, are more particularly spoken of as inhabiting the western coast of Acarnania, the islands called Taphiusæ, and the Echinades. They are generally mentioned as a maritime people, addicted to piracy. They were conquered by Amphitryon, as the inscription recorded by Herodotus attests:—

'Αμφιτρύων μ' ἀνέθηκε νίων ἀπὸ Τηλεβοάων." Cram.

TELMESSUS, or TELMISSUS, a town of Lycia, whose inhabitants were skilled in augury and the interpretation of dreams. Cic. de div. 1.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 37, c. 16.——Another in Caria.——A third in Pisidia.

TEMPE, (plur.) a valley in Thessaly, between mount Olympus at the north, and Ossa at the south, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. "'It is a defile,' says Livy, 'of difficult access, even though not guarded by an enemy; for, besides the narrowness of the pass for five miles, where there is scarcely room for a beast of burden, the rocks on both sides are so perpendicular as to cause giddiness both in the mind and eyes of those who look down the precipice. Their terror is also increased by the depth and roar of the Peneus rushing through the midst of the gorge.' 'The vale of Tempe,' says Mr. Hawkins, 'is generally known in Thessaly by the name of Bogaz. In the middle ages it was called Lycostomo. The Turkish word Bogaz, which signifies a pass or strait, is limited to that part of the course of the Peneus where the vale is reduced to very narrow dimensions. This part answers to our idea of a rocky dell, and is in length about two miles. The breadth of the Peneus is generally about fifty yards. The road through the Bogaz is chiefly the work of art, nature having left only sufficient room for the channel of the river. This scenery, of which every reader of classical literature has formed so lively a picture in his imagination, consists of a dell or deep glen, the opposite sides of which rise very steeply from the bed of the river. The towering height of these rocky and well-wooded acclivities above the spectator, the contrast of lines exhibited by their folding successively over one another, and the winding of the Peneus between them, produce a very striking effect. The scenery itself by no means corresponds with the idea which has been generally conceived of it; and the eloquence of Ælian has given rise to expectations which the traveller will not find realized. In the fine description which that writer has given us of Tempe, he seems to have failed chiefly in the general character of its scenery, which is distinguished by an air of savage grandeur, rather than by its beauty and amenity.' It may be doubted, however, whether we should not consider the vale of Tempe as distinct from the narrow defile which the Peneus traverses between mount Olympus and mount Ossa, near its entrance into the sea. 'After riding nearly an hour close to the bay in which the Peneus discharges itself, we turned,' says Professor Palmer, 'south, through a delightful plain, which after a quarter of an hour brought us to an opening, between Ossa and Olympus; the entrance to a vale, which, in situation, extent, and beauty, amply satisfies whatever the poets have said of Tempe. The country being serene, we were able to view the scene from various situations. The best view is from a small hill, about one mile south from the chasm. Looking east, you have then Ossa on your right hand: on your left, a circling ridge of Olympus, clothed with wood and rich herbage, terminates in several elevations, which diminish as they approach the opening before mentioned. In the front is the vale, intersected by the Peneus, and adorned with a profusion of beauties, so concentrated as to present under one view a scene of incomparable effect. The length of the vale, measured from the station to the opening by which we entered, I estimate at three miles; its greatest breadth at two miles and a half.' It appears to have been a generally received notion among the ancients, that the gorge of Tempe was caused by some great convulsion in nature, which, bursting asunder the great mountain-barrier by which the waters of Thessaly were pent up, afforded them an egress to the sea; 'This important pass,' says the historian, 'was guarded by four different fortresses. The first was Gonnus, placed at the very entrance of the defile. The next Condylon, which was deemed impregnable. The third, named Charax, stood near the town of Lapathus. The fourth was in the midst of the route, where the gorge is narrowest, and could easily be defended by ten armed men.' These strong posts were unaccountably abandoned by Perseus, after the Romans had penetrated into Pieria by a pass in the chain of Olympus." Cram.

TĔNĔDOS, a small and fertile island of the Ægean Sea, opposite Troy, at the distance of about 12 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Lesbos. It was anciently called Leucophrys. It became famous during the Trojan war, as it was there that the Greeks concealed themselves the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home without finishing the siege. Homer. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21. —Ovid. Met. 1, v. 540, l. 12, v. 109.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Tenos, a small island in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophiussa, and also Hydrussa, from the number of its fountains. It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, universally esteemed by the ancients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was also called Tenos. Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7. —Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.

Tentyra, (plur.) and Tentyris, a town of Egypt, on the Nile, considerably south of Thebes. "It is a place of little consequence in itself, but travellers visit it with great interest on account of a great quantity of magnificent ruins found three miles to the west of it. Bruce, Norden, and Savary, agree in identifying it with the modern Denderah. The remains of three temples still exist. The largest is in a singularly good state of preservation, and the enormous masses of stone employed in it, are so disposed as to exhibit every where the most just proportions. It is the first and most magnificent Egyptian temple to be seen in ascending the Nile, and is considered by Mr. Belzoni as of a much later date than any of the others. From the superiority of the workmanship, he inclines to attribute it to the first Ptolemy, the same who laid the foundation of the Alexandrian library, and instituted the philosophical society of the Museum. As for the zodiacs or celestial planispheres found here, and their high antiquity so much boasted, an able antiquary has shown that they could not have been prior to the conquest of Alexander." Malte-Brun.

Tentyra, (melius Tempyra), a place of Thrace, opposite Samothrace. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 21.

Teos, or Teios, now Sigagik, a maritime town on the coast of Ionia in Asia Minor, opposite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecatæus, who is by some deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an island. Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 5.—Horat. 1. Od. 17, v. 18.

Tergeste, and Tergestum, now Trieste, a town of Venetia, belonging to the Carni, on the bay called from this town the Sinus Tergesticus. Paterc. 2, c. 110.—Plin. 3, c. 18.

Terioli, a small town of Rhætia, in the valley of Venosca, towards the springs of the Adige in Tyrol, which derives its name from this inconsiderable place.

Terracina. Vid. Tarracina.

Tetrapolis, a name given to the city of Antioch, the capital of Syria, because it was divided into four separate districts, each of which resembled a city. Some apply the word to Seleucis, which contained the four large cities of Antioch near Daphne, Laodicea, Apamea, and Seleucia in Pieria.——The name of four towns in the north of Attica. Strab. Vid. Doris.

Tetrica, a mountain of the Sabines, near the river Fabaris. It was very rugged and difficult of access, whence the epithet Tetricus was applied to persons of a morose and melancholy disposition. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 713.

Teucri, a name given to the Trojans, from Teucer their king. The Teucri appear to have been of the earliest race of Phrygians, who were all, as is most probable, of Thracian origin; nor was the connexion perhaps entirely lost at the era of the Trojan war. But if the Asiatics received from Thrace an early colony, we have reason to believe that they soon repaid the debt, and that the Teucri from the Troad extended themselves widely over the countries of Thrace, occasioning the most radical changes, and establishing the most enduring characteristics among the people with whom they were identified. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 42 and 239.

Teucteri, a people of Germany, at the east of the Rhine. Tacit. de Germ. c. 28.

Teumessus, a mountain of Bœotia, with a village of the same name, where Hercules, when young, killed an enormous lion. Stat. Theb. 1. v. 331.

Teutoburgiensis saltus, a forest of Germany, between the Ems and Lippa, where Varus and his legions were cut to pieces. Tacit. An. 1, c. 60.

Teutoni, and Teutones, a people of Germany, who with the Cimbri made incursions upon Gaul, and cut to pieces two Roman armies. They were at last defeated by the consul Marius, and an infinite number made prisoners. Vid. Cimbri. Cic. pro Manil. Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plut. in Mar.—Martial. 14, ep. 26. Plin. 4, c. 14. In the limited sense of a tribe or a nation, the Teutones may be described as above; but as one of the great original stocks from which springs the population of Europe, they claim an extent of country overspreading a large portion of Germany in the widest extent to which that name has ever been applied, while they stretch beyond the era of history in their influence on the formation of nations and of languages. Vid. Europa.

Thalamæ, a town of Messenia, famous for a temple and oracle of Pasiphae. Plut. in Agid.

Thapsacus, a city on the Euphrates.

Thasos, or Thasus, a small island in the Ægean, on the coast of Thrace, opposite the mouth of the Nestus, anciently known by the name of Æria, Odonis, Æthria, Acte, Ogygia, Chryse, and Ceresis. It received that of Thasos from Thasus the son of Agenor, who settled there when he despaired of finding his sister Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and so uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos became proverbial. Its wine was universally esteemed, and its marble quarries were also in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and silver. The capital of the island was also called Thasos. Liv. 33, c. 30.

THAUMACI, a town of Thessaly, on the Maliac gulf. Liv. 32, c. 4.

THEBÆ, (arum,) I. a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, situate on the banks of the river Ismenus. "It was one of the most ancient and celebrated of the Grecian cities, and capital of Bœotia, and it is said to have been originally founded by Cadmus, who gave it the name of Cadmeia, which in aftertimes was confined to the citadel only. Lycophron, however, who terms it the city of Calydnus, from one of its ancient kings, lead us to suppose that it already existed before the time of Cadmus. Nonnus affirms that Cadmus called his city Thebes after the Egyptian town of the same name. He also reports that it was at first destitute of walls and ramparts, and this is in unison with the account transmitted to us by Homer and other writers, who all agree in ascribing the erection of the walls of the city to Amphion and Zethus. Besieged by the Argive chiefs, the allies of Polynices, the Thebans successfully resisted their attacks, and finally obtained a signal victory; but the Epigoni, or descendants of the seven warriors, having raised an army to avenge the defeat and death of their fathers, the city was on this occasion taken by assault, and sacked. It was invested a third time by the Grecian army under Pausanias after the battle of Platæa; but on the surrender of those who had proved themselves most zealous partisans of the Persians, the siege was raised, and the confederates withdrew from the Theban territory. Many years after, the Cadmeia was surprised, and held by a division of Lacedæmonian troops, until they were compelled to evacuate the place by Pelopidas and his associates. 'Philip, having defeated the Thebans at Chæronea, placed a garrison in their citadel; but on the accession of Alexander they revolted against that prince, who stormed their city, and razed it to the ground, in the second year of the 111th Olympiad, or 335 B. C. Twenty years afterwards it was restored by Cassander, when the Athenians are said to have generously contributed their aid in rebuilding the walls, an example which was followed by other towns. Dicæarchus has given us a very detailed and interesting account of the flourishing state of this great city about this period. 'Thebes,' says he, 'is situated in the centre of Bœotia, and is about seventy stadia in circuit; its shape is nearly circular, and its appearance somewhat gloomy. This city is of great antiquity; but it has been lately reconstructed, and the streets laid out afresh, having been three times overthrown, as history relates, on account of the pride and stubbornness of its inhabitants. It possesses great advantages for the breeding of horses, since it is plentifully provided with water, and abounds in green pastures and hills; it contains also better gardens than any other city of Greece. Two rivers flow through the town, and irrigate the whole surrounding plain. Water is also conveyed by pipes, said to be the work of Cadmus, from the Cadmeian citadel. Such is the city. The inhabitants are noble-minded and wonderfully sanguine in all the concerns of life; but they are bold, insolent, proud, and hasty in coming to blows, either with foreigners or their fellow-townsmen. They turn their backs upon every thing which is connected with justice, and never think of settling disputes, which may arise in the business of life, by argument, but by audaciousness and violence. If any injury has been sustained by athletes in the games, they put off any inquiry into the business until the regular time of their trials, which occurs only every thirty years at most. If any one was to make public mention of such a circumstance, and did not immediately afterwards take his departure, but were to remain the shortest space of time in the city, those who opposed the trial would soon find means of assailing him at night, and despatching him by violent means. Assassinations indeed take place amongst them on the least pretence. Such is the general character of the Theban people. There are, however, amongst them worthy and high-minded men, who deserve the warmest regard. The women are the handsomest and most elegant of all Greece, from the stateliness of their forms and the graceful air with which they move. That part of their apparel which covers the head appears to hide the face as a mask, for the eyes only are visible, and the rest of the countenance is entirely concealed by the veil, which is always white. Their hair is fair, and tied on the top of the head. They wear a sandal, called by the natives lampadium; it is a light shoe, not deep, but low, and of a purple colour, and fastened with thongs, so that the feet appear almost naked. In society they resemble more the women of Sicyon than what you would expect of those of Bœotia. The sound of their voice is extremely soft and pleasing to the ear, whilst that of the men is harsh and grating. Thebes is a most agreeable city to pass the summer in, for it has abundance of water, and that very cool and fresh, and large gardens. It is besides well situated with respect to the winds; has a most verdant appearance, and abounds in summer and autumnal fruits. In the winter, however, it is a most disagreeable place to live in, from being destitute of fuel, and constantly exposed to floods and winds. It is also then much visited by snow, and very muddy. The population of the city may have been between 50 and 60,000 souls. At a later period Thebes was greatly reduced and empoverished by the rapacious Sylla. Strabo affirms, that in his time it was little more than a village. When Pausanias visited Thebes, the lower part of the town was destroyed, with the exception of the temples, the acropolis being alone inhabited. The walls however remained standing, as well as the seven gates, which were the Electrides, Prœtides, Neitides, Crenææ, Hypsistæ, Ogygiæ, and Homoloides. Apollodorus, instead of the Neitides, names the Oncaides, but Æschylus has both the Neitides and Oncaides. The latter are therefore more probably the Ogygiæ. Those which he calls Boreæ, or the northern gates, are probably the same as the Homoloian, which led towards Thessaly, and took their name from mount Homole in that country. The Electrides looked towards Platæa, the Neitides to Thespiæ, and the Prœtides to Eubœa. Near the Homoloian gates was a hill and temple consecrated to Apollo Ismenius, and noticed by several writers. Thebes, though nearly deserted towards the decline of the Roman empire, appears to have been of some note in the middle ages, and it is still one of the most populous towns of northern Greece. The natives call it Thiva. 'It retains, however,' as Dodwell assures us, 'scarcely any traces of its former magnificence, for the sacred and public edifices, mentioned by Pausanias and others, have disappeared. Of the walls of the Cadmeia, a few fragments remain, which are regularly constructed. These were probably erected by the Athenians when Cassander restored the town.'" Cram. ——II. A town at the south of Troas, built by Hercules, and also called Placia and Hypoplacia. It fell into the hands of the Cilicians, who occupied it during the Trojan war. Curt. 3, c. 4.—Liv. 37, c. 19.—Strab. 11.——III. An ancient celebrated city of Thebais in Egypt, called also Hecatompylos, on account of its hundred gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter. In the time of its splendour it extended above 23 miles, and upon any emergency could send into the field by each of its hundred gates 20,000 fighting men and 200 chariots. "The ancient city extended from the ridge of mountains which skirt the Arabian desert to the similar elevation which bounds the valley of the Nile on the west, being in circumference not less than twenty-seven miles. The grandeur of Thebes must now be traced in four small towns or hamlets,—Luxor, Karnac, Medinet Abou, and Gornoo. In approaching the temple of Luxor from the north, the first object is a magnificent gateway, which is two hundred feet in length, and the top of it fifty-seven feet above the present level of the soil. Karnac, which is about a mile and a half lower down, is regarded as the principal site of Diospolis, the portion of the ancient capital which remained most entire in the days of Strabo. The temple at the latter place has been pronounced, in respect to its magnitude and the beauty of its several parts, as unique in the whole world. But Luxor and Karnac represent only one half of ancient Thebes. On the western side of the river there are several structures, which, although they may be less extensive, are equal, if not superior, in their style of architecture. The Memnonium, the ruins of which give a melancholy celebrity to northern Dair, is perhaps one of the most ancient in Thebes. There is a circumstance mentioned by a recent visiter, which is too important to be overlooked in detailing the unrivalled grandeur of ancient Thebes. The temple at Medinet Abou was so placed as to be exactly opposite to that of Luxor, on the other side of the Nile; while the magnificent structure at Karnac was fronted by the Memnonium or temple of Dair. Julia Romilla, Cecilia Treboulla, Pulitha Balbima, and many others, attest that they heard the voice of the Memnon, when along with the emperor Hadrian and his royal consort Sabina, whom they seem to have accompanied in their tour throughout the country. One person writes,—I hear (audio) the Memnon; and another person,—I hear the Memnon sitting in Thebes opposite to Diospolis. The neighbourhood of Thebes presents another subject worthy of attention, and quite characteristic of an Egyptian capital,—the Necropolis, or City of the Dead. The mountains on the western side of Thebes have been nearly hollowed out, in order to supply tombs for the inhabitants; while an adjoining valley, remarkable for its solitary and gloomy aspect, appears to have been selected by persons of rank, as the receptacle of their mortal remains. Every traveller, from Bruce down to the latest tourist who has trodden in his steps, luxuriates in the description of Gornoo, with its excavated mountains, and dwells with minute anxiety on the ornaments which at once decorate the superb mausoleums of the Beban el Melouk, and record the early progress of Egyptian science." Russell's Egypt.

THEBAIS, a country in the southern parts of Egypt, of which Thebes was the capital. This was one of the three great divisions of Egypt. Vid. Ægyptus.

THEMISCYRA, a town of Cappadocia, at the mouth of the Thermodon, belonging to the Amazons. The territories round it bore the same name.

THEODONIS, a town of Germany, now Thionville, on the Moselle.

THEODOSIA, now Caffa, a town in the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Mela, 2, c. 1.

THEODOSIOPŎLIS, I. a town of Armenia, built by Theodosius, &c.——II. Another in Mesopotamia. Vid. Resæna.

THEOPŎLIS, a name given to Antioch, because Christians first received their name there.

THERA, I. one of the Sporades in the Ægean Sea, anciently called Callista, now Santorin. It was called Thera by Theras, the son of Autesion, who settled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8. ——II. A town of Caria.

THERAPNE, or TERAPNE, a town of Laconia, at the west of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It was at a very short distance from Lacedæmon, and indeed some authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Castor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they are sometimes called Therapnæi fratres. Paus. 3, c. 14. —*Ovid. THERMA. Vid. Thessalonica. The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermæus, or Thermaicus Sinus, and advances far into the country, so much so that Pliny has named it Macedonicus Sinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

THERMÆ, (baths,) I. a town of Sicily, where were the baths of Selinus, now Sciacca.——II. Another, near Panormus, now Thermini. Sil. 14, v. 23.—Cic. Verr. 2, c. 35.

THERMŌDON, now Termah, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the ancient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine Sea near Themiscyra.——There was also a small river of the same name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hæmon. Strab. 11.—Herodot. 9, c. 27.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Paus. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 659.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 249, &c.

THERMOPŸLÆ, a small pass leading from Thessaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B. C. 480, on the 7th of August, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to five millions. There was also another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. "To the west of Thermopylæ," says Herodotus, "is a lofty mountain, so steep as to be inaccessible. To the east are the sea and some marshes. In this defile is a warm spring, called Chytri by the inhabitants, where stands an altar dedicated to Hercules. A wall has been constructed by the Phocians to defend the pass against the Thessalians, who came from Thesprotia to take possession of Thessaly, then named Æolis. Near Trachis the defile is not broader than half a plethrum, or fifty feet; but it is narrower still, both before and after Thermopylæ, at the river Phœnix, near Anthele, and at the village of Alpeni." Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat., &c.—Paus. 7, c. 15.

THERMUS, a town of Ætolia, the capital of the country.

THESPIÆ, now Neocorio, a town of Bœotia, "forty stadia from Ascra, and near the foot of Helicon, looking towards the south and the Crissæan gulf. Its antiquity is attested by Homer, who names it in the catalogue of Bœotian towns. The Thespians are worthy of a place in history for their brave and generous conduct during the Persian war. When the rest of Bœotia basely submitted to Xerxes, they alone refused to tender earth and water to his deputies. The troops also under Leonidas, whom they sent to aid the Spartans at Thermopylæ, chose rather to die at their post than desert their commander and his heroic followers. Their city was in consequence burnt by the Persians after it had been evacuated by the inhabitants, who retired to the Peloponnesus. Strabo reports that Thespiæ was one of the few Bœotian towns of note in his time. It is now pretty well ascertained by the researches of recent travellers that the ruins of Thespiæ are occupied by the modern Eremo Castro. Sir W. Gell remarks, that the 'plan of the city is distinctly visible. It seems a regular hexagon, and the mound occasioned by the fall of the wall, is perfect. A great part of the plan might possibly be discovered.' Dodwell says, 'the walls, which are almost entirely ruined, enclose a small circular space, a little elevated above the plain, which probably comprehended the acropolis. There are the remains of some temples in the plain: their site is marked by some churches that are composed of ancient fragments.'" Cram.

THESPRŌTIA, a country of Epirus. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called the streams of hell. "It were needless to attempt to define the limits of ancient Thesprotia; we must therefore be content with ascertaining that it was mainly situated between the river Thyamis and Acheron, distinguished in modern geography by the names of Calama and Souli; while inland it extended beyond the source of the former to the banks of the Aous. Of all the Epirotic nations, that of the Thesproti may be considered as the most ancient. This is evident from the circumstance of their being alone noticed by Homer, while he omits all mention of the Molossians and Chaonians. Herodotus also affirms that they were the parent stock from whence descended the Thessalians, who expelled the Æolians from the country afterwards known by the name of Thessaly. Thesprotia indeed appears to have been, in remote times, the great seat of the Pelasgic nation, whence they disseminated themselves over several parts of Greece, and sent colonies to Italy. Even after the Pelasgic name had become extinct in these two countries, the oracle and temple of Dodona, which they had established in Thesprotia, still remained to attest their former existence in that district. We must infer from the passage of Homer above cited, that the government of Thesprotia was at first monarchical. How long this continued is not apparent. Some change must have taken place prior to the time of Thucydides, who assures us that neither the Thesproti nor the Chaones were subject to kings. Subsequently we may, however, suppose them to have been included under the dominion of the Molossian princes." Cram.—Homer. Od. 14, v. 315.—Strab. 7, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

THESSALIA, a country of Greece, whose boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly speaking, "it bordered towards the north on Macedonia, from which it was separated by the Cambunian chain, extending from Pindus to mount Olympus. This latter mountain served to divide the northeastern angle of that province from Pieria, which, as was observed in the former section, formed the extremity of Macedonia to the southeast, and was parted from Thessaly by the mouth of the Peneus. The chain of Pindus formed the great western barrier of Thessaly towards Epirus, Athamania, and Aperantia. On the south, mount Œta served to separate the Thessalian Dolopes and Ænianes from the northern districts of Ætolia, as far as the straits of Thermopylæ and the borders of Locris. The eastern side was closed by the Ægean Sea, from the mouth of the Peneus to the southern shore of the Maliac gulf. Early traditions, preserved by the Greek poets and other writers, ascribe to Thessaly the more ancient names of Pyrrha, Æmonia, and Æolis; the latter referring to that remote period when the plains of Thessaly were occupied by the Æolian Pelasgi. This people originally came, as Herodotus informs us, from Thesprotia, but how long they remained in possession of the country, and at what precise period it assumed the name of Thessaly, cannot perhaps now be determined. In the poems of Homer it never occurs, although the several principalities and kingdoms of which it was composed are there distinctly enumerated and described, together with the different chiefs to whom they were subject: thus Hellas and Phthia are assigned to Achilles; the Melian and Pagasæan territories to Protesilaus and Eumelus; Magnesia to Philoctetes and Eurypylus; Estiæotis and Pelasgia to Medon, and the sons of Æsculapius, with other petty leaders. It is from Homer therefore that we derive the earliest information relative to the history of this fairest portion of Greece. This state of things, however, was not of long continuance; and a new constitution, dating probably from the period of the Trojan expedition, seems to have been adopted by the common consent of the Thessalian states. They agreed to unite themselves into one confederate body, under the direction of a supreme magistrate, or chief, distinguished by the title of Tagus, (ταγὸς) and elected by the consent of the whole republic. The details of this federal system are little known; but Strabo assures us that the Thessalian confederacy was the most considerable as well as the earliest society of the kind established in Greece. How far its constitution was connected with the celebrated Amphictyonic council it seems impossible to determine, since we are so little acquainted with the origin and history of that ancient assembly. There can be little doubt, however, that this singular coalition, which embraced matters of a political as well as religious nature, first arose among the states of Thessaly, as we find that the majority of the nations who had votes in the council were either actually Thessalians, or connected in some way with that part of Greece, while Sparta was struggling to make head against the formidable coalition, of which Bœotia had taken the lead, Thessaly was acquiring a degree of importance and weight among the states of Greece, which it had never possessed in any former period of its history. This was effected, apparently, solely by the energy and ability of Jason, who, from being chief or tyrant of Pheræ, had risen to the rank of Tagos, or commander of the Thessalian states. By his influence and talents the confederacy received the accession of several important cities; and an imposing military force, amounting to eight thousand cavalry, more than twenty thousand heavy armed infantry, and light troops sufficient to oppose the world, had been raised and fitted by him for the service of the commonwealth. His other resources being equally effective, Thessaly seemed destined, under his direction to become the leading power of Greece. This brilliant period of political influence and power was, however, of short duration, as Jason, not long after, lost his life by the hand of an assassin during the celebration of some games he had instituted; and Thessaly, on his death, relapsed into that state of weakness and insignificance from which it had so lately emerged. On the death of Philip, the state of Thessaly, in order to testify their veneration for his memory, issued a decree, by which they confirmed to his son Alexander the supreme station which he had held in their councils. Thessaly was preserved to the Macedonian crown, until the reign of Philip, son of Demetrius, from whom it was wrested by the Romans after the victory of Cynoscephalæ. It was then declared free by a decree of the senate and people, but from that time it may be fairly considered as having passed under the dominion of Rome, though its possession was still disputed by Antiochus, and again by Perseus the son of Philip. Thessaly was already a Roman province, when the fate of the empire of the universe was decided in the plains of Pharsalus. With the exception, perhaps, of Bœotia, this seems to have been the most fertile and productive part of Greece, in wine, oil, and corn, but more especially the latter, of which it exported a considerable quantity to foreign countries." Cram. The mountains of Pindus, Olympus, Ossa, and Pelion, and the river Peneus, distinguish this part of Greece no less geographically than by the poetic and classic recollections connected with those names." Cram.

THESSALIOTIS, a part of Thessaly, at the south of the river Peneus.

THESSALONICA, a town of Macedonia, east of the mouth of the Axius, on the Thermaic gulf. It was "at first an inconsiderable place under the name of Therme, by which it was known in the time of Herodotus, Thucydides, Æschines, and Scylax. The latter speaks also of the Thermæan gulf. Cassander changed the name of Therme to Thessalonica in honour of his wife, who was daughter of Philip. But Steph. Byz. asserts that the former name of Thessalonica was Halia. It surrendered to the Romans after the battle of Pydna, and was made the capital of the second region of Macedonia. Situated on the great Egnatian Way, two hundred and twenty-seven miles from Dyrrhachium, and possessed of an excellent harbour well placed for commercial intercourse with the Hellespont and Asia Minor, it could not fail of becoming a very populous and flourishing city. The Christian will dwell with peculiar interest on the circumstances which connect the history of Thessalonica with the name of St. Paul. Pliny describes Thessalonica as a free city, and Lucian as the largest of the Macedonian towns. Later historians name it as the residence and capital of the præfect of Illyricum." Cram.

THESTIA, a town of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Achelous. Polyb. 5.

THIRMIDA, a town of Numidia, where Hiempsal was slain. Sal. Jug. 2.

THORAX, a mountain near Magnesia in Ionia, where the grammarian Daphitas was suspended on a cross for his abusive language against kings and absolute princes, whence the proverb esse a Thorace. Strab. 14.

THORNAX, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Buphagus, by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccygia, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckoo. Paus. 8, c. 27.

THRACES, the inhabitants of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

THRACIA. "The ancients appear to have comprehended under the name of Thrace all that large tract of country which lay between the Strymon and the Danube from west to east, and between the chain of mount Hæmus and the shores of the Ægean, Propontis, and Euxine, from north to south. That the Thracians, however, were at one period much more widely disseminated than the confines here assigned to them would lead us to infer, is evident from the facts recorded in the earliest annals of Grecian history relative to their migrations to the southern provinces of that country. We have the authority of Thucydides for their establishment in Phocis. Strabo certifies their occupation of Bœotia. And numerous writers attest their settlement in Eleusis of Attica under Eumolpus, whose early wars with Erechtheus are related by Thucydides. Nor were their colonies confined to the European continent alone; for, allured by the richness and beauty of the Asiatic soil and clime, they crossed in numerous bodies the narrow strait which parted them from Asia Minor, and occupied the shores of Bithynia, and the fertile plains of Mysia, and Phrygia. On the other hand, a great revolution seems to have been subsequently effected in Thrace by a vast migration of the Teucri and Mysi from the opposite shores of the Euxine and Propontis, who, as Herodotus asserts, conquered the whole of Thrace, and penetrated as far as the Adriatic to the west, and to the river Peneus towards the south, before the Trojan war. The state of civilization to which the Thracians had attained at a very early period is the more remarkable, as all trace of it was lost in afterages. Linus and Orpheus were justly held to be the fathers of Grecian poetry; and the names of Libethra, Pimplea, and Pieria remained to attest the abode of the Pierian Thracians in the vales of Helicon. Eumolpus is stated to have founded the Mysteries of Eleusis; the origin of which is probably coeval with that of the Corybantes of Phrygia and the Cabiric rites of Samothrace, countries alike occupied by colonies from Thrace. Whence and at what period the name of Thracians was first applied to the numerous hordes which inhabited this portion of the European continent, is left open to conjecture. Herodotus affirms, that the Thracians were, next to the Indians, the most numerous and powerful people of the world; and that if all the tribes had been united under one monarch or under the same government, they would have been invincible; but from their subdivision into petty clans, distinct from each other, they were rendered insignificant. They are said by the same historian to have been first subjugated by Sesostris, and, after the lapse of many centuries, they were reduced under the subjection of the Persian monarch by Megabazus, general of Darius. But on the failure of the several expeditions undertaken by that sovereign and his son Xerxes against the Greeks, the Thracians apparently recovered their independence, and a new empire was formed in that extensive country under the dominion of Sitalces king of the Odrysæ, one of the most numerous and warlike of their tribes. Thucydides, who has entered into considerable detail on this subject, observes, that of all the empires situated between the Ionian gulf and the Euxine, this was the most considerable, both in revenue and opulence: its military force was however very inferior to that of Scythia, both in strength and numbers. The empire of Sitalces extended along the coast from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, a distance of four days and nights' sail; and in the interior, from the sources of the Strymon to Byzantium, a journey of thirteen days. The founder of this empire appears to have been Teres. The splendour of this monarchy was however of short duration; and we learn from Xenophon, that on the arrival of the ten thousand in Thrace, the power of Medocus, or Amadocus, the reigning prince of the Odrysæ, was very inconsiderable. When Philip, the son of Amyntas ascended the throne of Macedon, the Thracians were governed by Cotys, a weak prince, whose territories became an easy prey to his artful and enterprising neighbour. The whole of that part of Thrace situated between the Strymon and the Nestus was thus added to Macedonia: whence some geographical writers term it Macedonia Adjecta. Cotys, having been assassinated not long after, was succeeded by his son Chersobleptes, whose possessions were limited to the Thracian Chersonnese; and even of this he was eventually stripped by the Athenians, while Philip seized on all the maritime towns between the Nestus and that peninsula. On Alexander's accession to the throne, the Triballi were by far the most numerous and powerful people of Thrace; and as they bordered on the Pæonians, and extended to the Danube, they were formidable neighbours on this the most accessible frontier of Macedonia. Alexander commenced his reign by an invasion of their territory; and having defeated them in a general engagement, pursued them across the Danube, whither they had retreated, and compelled them to sue for peace. After his death, Thrace fell to the portion of Lysimachus, one of his generals, by whom it was erected into a monarchy. On his decease, however, it revolted to Macedonia, and remained under the dominion of its sovereign, until the conquest of that country by the Romans. Livy speaks of a Cotys, chief of the Odrysæ, in the reign of Perseus, from whence it would appear that this people still restrained their ancient monarchical form of government, though probably tributary to the sovereigns of Macedonia. Thrace constitutes at present the Turkish province of Roumelia." Cramer's Greece.

THRASYMĒNUS, a lake of Italy, near Perusium, celebrated for a battle fought there between Annibal and the Romans, under Flaminius, B. C. 217. No less than 15,000 Romans, were left dead on the field of battle, and 10,000 taken prisoners, or according to Livy 6,000, or Polybius 15,000. The loss of Annibal was about 1,500 men. About 10,000 Romans made their escape, all covered with wounds. This lake is now called the lake of Perugia. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 765.—Plut.

THRONIUM, a town of Phocis, "noticed by Homer as being near the river Boagrius, was 30 stadia from Scarphea, and at some distance from the coast, as appears from Strabo. Thronium was taken by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war, and several years after, it fell into the hands of Onomarchus the Phocian general, who enslaved the inhabitants. Dr. Clarke conjectured that Thronium was situated at Bondonitza, a small town on the chain of mount Œta; but Sir W. Gell is of opinion that this point is too far distant from the sea, and that it accords rather with an ancient ruin above Longachi; and this is in unison also with the statement of Meletias the Greek geographer, who cites an inscription discovered there, in which the name of Thronium occurs." Cram.

THÜLE, an island in the most northern parts of the German ocean, to which, on account of its great distance from the continent, the ancients gave the epithet of ultima. Its situation was never accurately ascertained, hence its present name is unknown to modern historians. Some suppose that it is the island now called Iceland, or part of Greenland, whilst others imagine it to be the Shetland Isles. Stat. 3, Sil. 5, v. 20.—Strab. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 6.—Tacit. Agric. 10.—Plin. 2, c. 75, l. 4, c. 16.—Virg. G. 1, v. 30.—Juv. 15, v. 112.

THYMBRA, I. A small town in Lydia, near Sardes, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between Cyrus and Crœsus, in which the latter was defeated. The troops of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, besides chariots, and those of Crœsus were twice as numerous.—— II. A plain in Troas, through which a small river, called Thymbrius, falls in its course to the Scamander, Apollo had there a temple, and from thence he is called Thymbræus. Achilles was killed there by Paris, according to some. Strab. 13.—Stat. 4, Sylv. 7, v. 22.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 52, l. 2, c. 1.

THYNI, or BITHYNI, a people of Bithynia; hence the word Thyna merx applied to their commodities. Horat. 3, od. 7, v. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

THYRE, a town of the Messenians, famous for a battle fought there between the Argives and the Lacedæmonians. Herodot. 1, c. 82.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 48.

THYREA, an island on the coast of Peloponnesus, near Hermione. Herodot. 6, c. 76.

THYRIUM. "North of Medeon we must place Thyrium, an Acarnanian city of some strength and importance, but of which mention occurs more frequently towards the close of the Grecian history, where it begins to be intermixed with the affairs of Rome. Its ruins probably exist to the northeast of Leucas, in the district of Cechrophyla, where, according to Meletius, considerable vestiges of an ancient town are to be seen." Cram.

THYSSAGETÆ, a people of Sarmatia, who live upon hunting. Plin. 4, c. 12.

THYSSUS, a river of Sardinia, now Oristagni.

TIBERIAS, a town of Galilee, near a lake of the same name. "Tiberias is the only place on the Sea of Galilee which retains any marks of its ancient importance. It is understood to cover the ground formerly occupied by a town of a much remoter age, and of which some traces can still be distinguished on the beach, a little to the southward of the present walls. History relates that it was built by Herod the Tetrarch, and dedicated to the emperor Tiberius, his patron, although there prevails, at the same time, an obscure tradition, that the new city owed its foundation entirely to the imperial pleasure, and was named by him who commanded it to be erected. Josephus notices the additional circumstance, which of itself gives great probability to the opinion of its being established on the ruins of an old tower, that as many sepulchres were removed in order to make room for the Roman structures, the Jews could hardly be induced to occupy houses which, according to their notions, were legally impure. Adrichomius considers Tiberias to be the Chinneroth of the Hebrews, and says, that it was captured by Benhadad, king of Syria, who destroyed it, and was in afterages restored by Herod, who surrounded it with walls, and adorned it with magnificent buildings. The old Jewish city, whatever was its name, probably owed its existence to the fame of its hot baths,—an origin to which many temples and even the cities belonging to them, may be traced. The present town of Tabaria, as it is now called, is in the form of an irregular crescent, and is enclosed towards the land by a wall flanked with circular towers. It lies nearly north and south along the edges of the lake, and has its eastern front so close to the water, on the brink of which it stands, that some of the houses are washed by the sea. The whole does not appear more than a mile in circuit, and cannot, from the manner in which they are placed, contain above 500 separate dwellings. There are two gates visible from without, one near the southern and the other in the western wall; there are appearances also of the town having been surrounded by a ditch, but this is now filled up and used for gardens. The interior presents but few subjects of interest, among which are a mosque with a dome and minaret, and two Jewish synagogues. There is a Christian place of worship called the House of Peter, which is thought by some to be the oldest building used for that purpose in any part of Palestine. It is a vaulted room, thirty feet long by fifteen broad, and perhaps fifteen in height, standing nearly east and west, with its door of entrance at the western front, and its altar immediately opposite in a shallow recess. Over the door is one small window, and on each side four others, all arched and open. The structure is of a very ordinary kind, both in workmanship and material; the pavement within is similar to that used for streets in this country; and the walls are entirely devoid of sculpture or any other architectural ornament. But it derives no small interest from the popular belief that it is the very house which Peter inhabited at the time of his being called from his boat to follow the Messias. It is manifest, notwithstanding, that it must have been originally constructed for a place of divine worship, and probably at a period much later than the days of the apostle whose name it bears, although there is no good ground for questioning the tradition which places it on the very spot long venerated as the site of his more humble habitation. Here too it was, say the dwellers in Tiberias, that he pushed off his boat into the lake when about to have his faith rewarded by the miraculous draught of fishes. Tiberias makes a conspicuous figure in the Jewish annals, and was the scene of some of the most remarkable events which are recorded by Josephus. After the downfall of Jerusalem, it continued until the fifth century to be the residence of Jewish patriarchs, rabbies, and learned men. A university was established within its boundaries; and as the patriarchate was allowed to be hereditary, the remnant of the Hebrew people enjoyed a certain degree of weight and consequence during the greater part of four centuries. In the sixth age, if we may confide in the accuracy of Procopius, the emperor Justinian rebuilt the walls; but in the following century, the seventh of the Christian era, the city was taken by the Saracens, under Calif Omar, who stripped it of its privileges, and demolished some of its finest edifices." Russell's Palestine.

TIBERIS, TYBERIS, TIBER, or TIBRIS, a river of Italy on whose banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albula, from the whiteness of its waters, and afterwards Tiberus, when Tiberinus, king of Alba, had been drowned there. It was also named Tyrrhenus, because it watered Etruria, and Lydius, because the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were supposed to be of Lydian origin. The Tiber rises in the Apennines, and falls into the Tyrrhene Sea 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. *Ovid. TIBULA, a town of Sardinia, now Lango Sardo.

TIBUR, an ancient town of the Sabines, about 20 miles north of Rome, built, as some say, by Tibur the son of Amphiaraus. It was watered by the Anio, and Hercules was the chief deity of the place; from which circumstance it has been called Herculei muri. In the neighbourhood, the Romans, on account of the salubrity of the air, had their several villas where they retired; and there also Horace had his favourite country-seat, though some place it nine miles higher. Strab. 5.—Cic. 2, Orat. 65.—*Suet. TICHIS, now Tech, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean.

TICINUM, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, "situated on the river from which it took its name, was founded, as Pliny reports, by the Lævi and Marici; but being placed on the left bank of the Ticinus, it would of course belong to the Insubres; and in fact, Ptolemy ascribes it to that people. Tacitus is the first author who makes mention of it. According to that historian, Augustus advanced as far as Ticinum to meet the corpse of Drusus, father of Germanicus, in the depth of winter, and from thence escorted it to Rome. It is also frequently noticed in his Histories. Ancient inscriptions give it the title of municipium. Under the Lombard kings, Ticinum assumed the name of Papia, which in process of time has been changed to Pavia." Cram.

TICINUS, now Tesino, a river of Gallia Cisalpina: "it rises on the St. Gothard, and passes through the Verbanus Lacus, Lago Maggiore. The waters of the Ticinus are celebrated by poets for their clearness and beautiful colour. Great diversity of opinion seems to exist among modern critics and military antiquaries, on the subject of the celebrated action which was fought by Scipio and Hannibal near this river, from whence it is commonly called the battle of the Ticinus. Some of these writers have placed the field of battle on the right, and others on the left bank of this stream; and of the latter again, some fix the action in the vicinity of Pavia, others as high as Soma, a little south of Sesto Calende." Vid. this question fully discussed in Cramer's Italy, 1, 54, et. seqq.

TIFATA, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylv. 4.

TIFERNUM, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them, for distinction's sake, is called Metaurense, near the Metaurus in Umbria; the other Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Samniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. 3, c. 14. Plin. sec. 4, ep. 1.

TIFERNUS, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 10, c. 30.—Mela, 3, c. 4.

TIGRANOCERTA, now Sered, the capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the springs of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immense riches, and no less than 8000 talents in ready money. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

TIGRIS. "This river, the rival and companion of the Euphrates, has its most considerable source in the mountains of the country of Zoph, the ancient Zophene, a part of Armenia. The Euphrates, already of great size, receives all the streams of that country; but, by a singular exception, this, the smallest among them, escapes the destination of its neighbours. A rising ground prevents it from proceeding to the Euphrates. A deep ravine in the mountains above Diarbekir opens a passage for it, and it takes its speedy course across a territory which is very unequal, and has a powerful declivity. Its extreme rapidity, the natural effect of local circumstances, has procured for it the name of Tigr in the Median language, Diglito in Arabic, and Hiddekel in Hebrew; all of which terms denote the flight of an arrow. Besides this branch, which is best known to the moderns, Pliny has described to us in detail another, which issues from the mountains of Koordistan to the west of the lake Van. It passes by the lake Arethusa. Its course being checked by a part of the mountain of Taurus, it falls into the subterranean cavern called Zoroander, and appears again at the bottom of the mountain. The identity of its waters is shown by the reappearance of light bodies at its issue that have been thrown into it above the place where it enters the mountain. It passes also by the lake Thospitis, near the town of Erzin, buries itself again in subterranean caverns, and reappears at a distance of 25 miles below, near the modern Nymphæum. This branch joins the western Tigris below the city of Diarbekir." Vid. Euphrates. Malte-Brun.

TIGURINI, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Switz, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. Their capital was Tigurum. Cæs. Bell. G.

TIMACUS, a river of Mœsia, falling into the Danube. The neighbouring people were called Timachi. Plin. 3, c. 26.

TIMAVUS, a river of Venetia. "Few streams have been more celebrated in antiquity, or more sung by the poets, than the Timavus, to which we have now arrived. Its numerous sources, its lake and subterraneous passage, which have been the theme of the Latin muse from Virgil to Claudian and Ausonius, are now so little known, that their existence has ever been questioned, and ascribed to poetical invention. It has been however well ascertained, that the name of Timao is still preserved by some springs which rise near S. Giovanni di Carso and the castle of Duino, and form a river, which, after a course of little more than a mile, falls into the Adriatic. The number of these sources seems to vary according to the difference of seasons, which circumstance will account for the various statements which ancient writers have made respecting them. Strabo, who appears to derive his information from Polybius, reckoned seven, all of which, with the exception of one, were salt. According to Posidonius, the river really rose in the mountains at some distance from the sea, and disappeared under ground for the space of fourteen miles, when it issued forth again near the sea at the springs above mentioned. This account seems also verified by actual observation. The Timavus is indebted to the poetry of Virgil for the greater part of its fame. Ausonius, when celebrating a fountain near Bourdeaux, his native city, compares its waters to the Timavus. The lake of the Timavus, mentioned by Livy in his account of the Histrian war, is now called Lago della Pietra Rossa. Pliny speaks of some warm springs near the mouth of the river, now Bagni di Monte Falcone. The temple and grove of Diomed, noticed by Strabo under the name of Timavum, may be supposed to have stood on the site of S. Giov. del Carso. Cram.

Tingis, now Tangier, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania. "The position of the ancient city was on the right, or opposite side of the creek to the modern, and also more inland." Plut. in Sert.—Mela, 1, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 1.—Sil. 3, v. 258.

Titaresus, a river in Thessaly, called also Eurotas, flowing into the Peneus, but without mingling its thick and turbid waters with the transparent stream. From the unwholesomeness of its water, it was considered as deriving its source from the Styx. Lucan. 6, v. 376.—Homer. Il. 2, en. 258.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8. c. 18.

Tithorea, one of the tops of Parnassus, on which was the town of Tithorea or Neon. "The ruins of Tithorea were first observed by Dr. Clarke, near the modern village of Velitza. 'We arrived,' says that traveller, 'at the walls of Tithorea, extending in a surprising manner up the prodigious precipice of Parnassus, which rises behind the village of Velitza. These remains are visible to a considerable height upon the rocks. We found what we should have least expected to find remaining, namely, the forum mentioned by Pausanius. It is a square structure, built in the Cyclopean style, with large masses of stone, laid together with great evenness and regularity, but without any cement.'" Cram.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

Tmarus, a mountain of Thesprotia, called Tomarus by Pliny.

Tmolus, I. a town of Asia Minor, destroyed by an earthquake.——II. A mountain of Lydia, now Bouzdag, on which the river Pactolus rises. The air was so wholesome near Tmolus, that the inhabitants generally lived to their 150th year. The neighbouring country was very fertile, and produced plenty of vines, saffron, and odoriferous flowers. Strab. 13, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 84, &c.—Ovid. Met. 2, &c.—Sil. 7, v. 210.—*Virg. Minerva had there a rich temple, which Cæpio the consul plundered, and as he was never after fortunate, the words aurum Tolosanum became proverbial. Cæs. Bell. G.—Mela, 2, c. 5.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.

Tomos, or Tomis, a town situate on the western shores of the Euxine Sea, about 36 miles from the mouth of the Danube. The word is derived from τεμνω, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus. Tomos was the capital of lower Mœsia, founded by a Milesian colony, B. C. 633. Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 14, v. 59. Trist. 3, el. 9, v. 33, &c.

Torone. "Torone which gave its name to the gulf on which it stood, was situated towards the southern extremity of the Sithonian peninsula. It was probably founded by the Eubœans. From Herodotus we learn that it supplied both men and ships for the Persian armament against Greece. When Artabazus obtained possession of Olynthus, he appointed Critobulus commander of the town. Torone was situated on a hill, as we learn from Thucydides, and near a marsh of some extent, in which the Egyptian bean grew naturally. It was famous also for a particular kind of fish. The gulf of Torone, Toronicus, or Toronaicus Sinus, is known in modern geography as the Bay of Cassandria." Cram.

Trachinia, a district of Thessaly, which "is included by Thucydides in the Melian territory. It was so named from the town of Trachin or Trechin, known to Homer, and assigned by him to Achilles, together with the whole of the Melian country. It was here that Hercules retired, after having committed an involuntary murder, as we learn from Sophocles, who has made it the scene of one of his deepest tragedies. Trachis, so called, according to Herodotus, from the mountainous character of the country, forms the approach to Thermopylæ on the side of Thessaly. Thucydides states, that in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, 426 B. C. the Lacedæmonians, at the request of the Trachinians, who were harassed by the mountaineers of Œta, sent a colony into their country. These, jointly with the Trachinians, built a town to which the name of Heraclea was given." Vid. Heraclea. Cram.

TROJA, a city, the capital of Troas, or, according to others, a country of which Ilium was the capital. It was built on a small eminence near mount Ida, and the promontory of Sagæum, at the distance of about four miles from the seashore. Dardanus, the first king of the country, built it, and called it Dardania, and from Tros, one of its successors, it was called Troja, and from Ilus, Ilion. Neptune is also said to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon. This city has been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil; and of all the wars which were carried on among the ancients, that of Troy is the most famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks, to recover Helen, whom Paris, the son of Priam, king of Troy, had carried away from the house of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cause of Menelaus, and every prince furnished a certain number of ships and soldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ships. Homer mentions them as being 1186, and Thucydides supposes that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which these ships carried is unknown; yet as the largest contained about 120 men each, and the smallest 50, it may be supposed that no less than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was chosen general of all these forces; but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counsellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. The most celebrated of the Grecian princes that distinguished themselves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulysses, Diomedes, Protesilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Nestor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was opposed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received assistance from the neighbouring princes in Asia Minor, and reckoned among his most active generals, Rhesus, king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Assyrians and Æthiopians. After the siege had been carried on for ten years, some of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to ashes. The poets, however, support, that the Greeks made themselves masters of the place by artifice. They secretly filled a large wooden horse with armed men, and led away their army from the plains as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horse into their city, and in the night the Greeks that were confined within the sides of the animal, rushed out and opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greatest part of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Christian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 408 years before the first Olympiad. Some time after a new city was raised, about 30 stadia from the ruins of old Troy: but though it bore the ancient name, and received ample donations from Alexander the great, when he visited it in his Asiatic expedition, yet it continued to be small, and in the age of Strabo it was nearly in ruins. It is said that J. Cæsar, who wished to pass for one of the descendants of Æneas, and consequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to transport there the senate and the Roman people. The same apprehensions were entertained in the reign of Augustus, and according to some, an ode of Horace, Justum & tenacem propositi virum, was written purposely to dissuade the emperor from putting into execution so wild a project. "The little peninsula which forms the ancient kingdom of Priam, has been minutely explored by various learned travellers; but they have not agreed in fixing the localities of the individual places celebrated in the immortal work of Homer. Chevalier and others have supposed that Troy must have occupied the site of a village called Roonanbashi, and there he thought he found the sources of the Scamander. Dr. Clarke found in that place not two fountains merely, one hot and one cold, as has been said, but numerous fountains all warm, raising the thermometer to 60° of Fahrenheit. They do not form the source of the Scamander, which lies forty miles in the interior. He also discovered, on entering the plain of Troy, first the Mender, which its name and every other circumstance clearly fixed as the Scamander. He found also the Thymbrius, under the modern appellation of Thymbroek, though other inquirers conceive it to be the Simois. This last he thought he recognised in the Calliphat Osmak, which runs into the Scamander by a sluggish stream across an extensive plain, and the plain thus becomes that of Simois, on which were fought the great battles recorded in the Iliad. The Ilium of the age of Strabo, we know was situated near the sea, and he says that it was four miles in a certain direction from the original city. In this distance and direction, Dr. Clarke discovered two spots marked by ruins, which from different circumstances, seem very likely to have been old and new Troy. The grandeur of the scenery, viewed from this plain, is almost indescribable; Samothrace, on one side, rearing behind Imbrus its snow-clad summit, shining bright, and generally on a cloudless sky; while, on the other side, Garganus, the highest of the chain of Ida, rises to an equal elevation. These scenes are well fitted to impart the most feeling interest to the descriptions of Homer, when read or remembered on the spot. Whatever difficulty may exist as to the minutiæ, all the prominent features of Homer's picture are incontestably visible; the Hellespont, the isle of Tenedos, the plain, the river, still inundating its banks, and the mountain whence it issues. A fertile plain, and a mountain abruptly rising from it, are two features which are usually combined in the sites of ancient cities. From the one, the citizens drew part of their subsistence, while the other became the citadel to which they retired on the approach of danger. The ruins of Abydos, on the shore of the Hellespont, lie farther to the north than the Castle of Asia, a fortress of small strength. Lamsaki is only a suburb of the ancient Lampsacus, the ruins of which have been lately discovered at Tchardak."—*Malte-Brun. Tyrus, or Tyros, a very ancient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians, on a small island at the south of Sidon, about 200 stadia from the shore, and now called Sur. There were, properly speaking, two places of that name, the old Tyros, called Palætyros, on the seashore, and the other in the island. It was about 19 miles in circumference, including Palætyros, but without it about four miles. Tyre was destroyed by the princes of Assyria, and afterwards rebuilt. It maintained its indepen dence till the age of Alexander, who took it with much difficulty, and only after he had joined the island to the continent by a mole, after a siege of seven months, on the 20th of August, B. C. 332. The Tyrians were naturally industrious; their city was the emporium of commerce, and they were deemed the inventors of scarlet and purple colours. They founded many cities in different parts of the world, such as Carthage, Gades, Leptis, Utica, &c. which on that account are often distinguished by the epithet Tyria. The buildings of Tyre were very splendid and magnificent; the walls were 150 feet high, with a proportionable breadth. Hercules was the chief deity of the place. It had two large and capacious harbours, and a powerful fleet; and was built, according to some writers, about 2760 years before the Christian era. "A fate still more desolating has overtaken Tyre, the queen of the seas, the birthplace of commerce, by which early civilization was diffused. Her palaces are supplanted by miserable hovels. The poor fisherman inhabits those vaulted cellars where the treasures of the world were in ancient times stored. A column, still standing in the midst of the ruins, points out the site of the choir of the cathedral consecrated by Eusebius. The sea, which usually destroys artificial structures, has not only spared, but has enlarged, and converted into a solid isthmus, the mound by which Alexander joined the isle of Tyre to the continent." Malte-Brun.—Strab. 16.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela, 1, c. 12.—Curt. 4, c. 4.—*Virg. VANDALI, a barbarous people of the northern parts of Germany, connected in the remotest ages with the Goths, but early separated from them, and divided into the principal hordes of Heruli and Burgundians. The Vandalic tribes, on the invasion of the empire by the Goths, reunited with those barbarians, and took part in all the ravages committed by them in the civilized countries of Europe. They fixed themselves, for a time in Spain, and, crossing over into Africa, were among the first of the Germans who effected the establishment of an empire within the limits of provinces claimed by the emperors of Rome.

VATICĀNUS, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great esteem. It is now admired for ancient monuments and pillars, for a celebrated public library, and for the palace of the pope. Horat. 1, od. 20.

VEIENTES, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribes they composed were called Veientina. Vid. Veii.

VEII, a powerful city of Etruria, at the distance of about 12 miles from Rome. It sustained many long wars against the Romans, and was at last taken and destroyed by Camillus after a siege of ten years. At the time of its destruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its situation was so eligible, that the Romans, after the burning of the city by the Gauls, were long inclined to migrate there, and totally abandon their native home, and this would have been carried into execution if not opposed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. Ovid. 2, Fast. v. 195. —Cic. de Div. 1, c. 44.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 143. —Liv. 5, c. 21, &c.

VENEDI, a people of Germany. "They extended along the shores of the Baltic, to a considerable distance in the interior country; and if their name be remarked subsisting in that of Wenden, in a district of Livonia, it is only in a partial manner, and holding but a small proportion to the extent which that nation occupied. Passing the Vistula, the Venedians took possession of the lands between that river and the Elbe, that had been evacuated about the close of the fourth century by the Vandals, whose name is seen sometimes erroneously confounded with that of the Venedians. But the difference is definitively marked by the language. The country that the Venedians occupied in the tenth century was that of the Pruzzi, whose name present use has changed into Borussi. We find this name indeed in Ptolemy; but it appears there very far distant, on another frontier of Sarmatia, towards the situation which he gives to the Riphean mountains." D'Anville. It may be observed, that whatever affinity really existed between the Vandals and the Venedians, the former being a Gothic people, can only be connected with the latter, either on the return of the Gothi from Scandinavia, where the Vandalic stem may have been detached, or at a very late era, when the more northern tribes began their last inroads on the frontiers of the empire. The purer Venedi dwelt by the Vistula, and those which mingled more with the latter Scandinavians may be called Gotho-Venedi.

VENĔTIA, "the northeast angle of Italy, formed by the Alps and the head of the Adriatic gulf; to which the name of Venetia, was assigned, from the Heneti, or Veneti, an ancient people respecting whose origin considerable uncertainty seems to have existed even among the best informed writers of antiquity. The poetical as well as popular opinion identified them with the Heneto-Paphlagones, enumerated by Homer in the catalogue of the allies of Priam. This people having crossed over into Europe under the command of Antenor, expelled the Euganei, the original inhabitants of the country. Strabo was inclined to believe the Veneti to be Gauls, as there was a tribe of the same name in that country; but this opinion is at variance with the testimony of Polybius. Herodotus, who was well acquainted with the Veneti, designates them by the generic appellation of Illyrians. They were the last people who penetrated into Italy by that frontier. This fact is sufficiently evident from the extreme position which they took up, and from their having retained possession of it undisturbed, as far as history informs us, till they became subject to the Roman power. The history of the Veneti contains little that is worthy of notice, if we except the remarkable feature of their being the sole people of Italy, who not only offered no resistance to the ambitious projects of Rome, but even at a very early period, rendered that power an essential service. According to an old geographer, they counted within their territory fifty cities, and a population of a million and a half. The soil and climate were excellent, and their cattle were reported to breed twice in the year. Their horses were especially noted for their fleetness, and are known to have often gained prizes in the games of Greece. When the Gauls had been subjugated, and their country had been reduced to a state of dependance, the Veneti do not appear to have manifested any unwillingness to constitute part of the new province. Their territory from that time was included under the general denomination of Cisalpine Gaul, and they were admitted to all the privileges which that province successively obtained. In the reign of Augustus, Venetia was considered as a separate district, constituting the tenth region in the division made by that emperor. Its boundaries, if we include within them the Tridentini, Meduaci, Carni, and other smaller nations, may be considered to be the Athesis, and a line drawn from that river to the Po, to the west: the Alps to the north: the Adriatic as far as the river Formio, Risano, to the east: and the main branch of the Po to the south." Cram.

VENTA (BELGARUM), I. a town of Britain, now Winchester.——II. Silurum, a town of Britain, now Caerwent in Monmouthshire.——III. Icenorum, now Norwich.

VĔRŌNA, a town of Venetia, on the Athesis, in Italy, founded, as some suppose, by Brennus, the leader of the Gauls. C. Nepos, Catullus, and Pliny the elder, were born there. It was adorned with a circus and an amphitheatre by the Roman emperors, which still exist, and it still preserves its ancient name. Plin. 9, c. 22.—Strab. 5.—Ovid. Am. 3, el. 15, v. 7.

VESŪVIUS, a mountain of Campania, about six miles at the east of Naples, celebrated for its volcano. The ancients, particularly the writers of the Augustan age, spoke of Vesuvius as a place covered with orchards and vineyards, of which the middle was dry and barren. The first eruption of this volcano was in the 79th year of the Christian era under Titus. It was accompanied by an earthquake, which overturned several cities of Campania, particularly Pompeii and Herculaneum: and the burning ashes which it threw up, were carried not only over the neighbouring country, but as far as the shores of Egypt, Libya, and Syria. This eruption proved fatal to Pliny the naturalist. From that time the eruptions have been frequent, and there now exists an account of twenty-nine of these. Vesuvius continually throws up a smoke, and sometimes ashes and flames. The perpendicular height of this mountain is 3780 feet. Dio. Cass. 46.—Varro. de R. 1, c. 6.—Liv. 23, c. 39.—Strab. 5.—Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Plin. 6, ep. 16.—Ital. 12, v. 152, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 224.—Mart. 4, ep. 43 and 44. "It appears to have been at first known under the name of Vesevus; but the appellation of Vesvius and Vesbius is no less frequently applied to it. Strabo describes this mountain as extremely fertile at its base, but entirely barren towards the summit, which was mostly level, and full of apertures and cracks, seemingly produced by the action of fire; whence Strabo was led to conclude, that the volcano, though once in a state of activity, had been extinguished from want of fuel. The volcano was likewise apparently extinct, when, as Plutarch and Florus relate, Spartacus with some of his followers sought refuge in the cavities of the mountain from the pursuit of their enemies, and succeeded in eluding their search." Cram.

There was also another of the same name in Etruria, which led from Pisæ to Dertona.—— II. Appia, was made by the censor Appius, and led from Rome to Capua, and from Capua to Brundusium, at the distance of 350 miles, which the Romans call a five days' journey. It passed successively through the towns and stages of Aricia, Forum Appii, Tarracina, Fundi, Minturnæ, Sinuessa, Capua, Caudium, Beneventum, Equotuticum, Herdonia, Canusium, Barium, Egnatia, to Brundusium. It was called, by way of eminence, regina viarum, made so strong, and the stones so well cemented together, that it remained entire for many hundred years. Some parts of it are still to be seen in the neighbourhood of Naples. Appius carried it only 130 miles, as far as Capua, A. U. C. 442, and it was finished as far as Brundusium by Augustus.——III. There was also another road, called Minucia or Numicia, which led to Brundusium, but by what places is now uncertain.——IV. Flaminia, was made by the censor Flaminius, A. U. C. 533. They extended in Savoy as far as the position of Geneva; which was one of their cities." D'Anville.

VINDILI, an extensive people of Germany, stretching from the Vistula to the Elbe. They comprehended a great number of powerful tribes, and it is probable that a great many races of very different origin may have been included by the Romans in the vast population which, without observing their affinities or their differences, the Romans classed under the name of Vindili. The Vandalic blood, no doubt, greatly predominated among these extensive tribes.

VINDONISSA, now Wendish, a town of the Helvetii, on the Aar, in the territory of Berne. Tacit. 4, Hist. 61 and 70.

primitive name was also associated. Ruins preserve the memory of its ancient magnificence to the place, which is inhabited only by a few herdsmen, and called Warkel, which signifies the site or position of a city; or otherwise Gradisca, denoting the same thing." D'Anville.
